Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

She was the daughter of Adam and Hepzibah Brooks, and was born in Scituate, Massachusetts, on the nineteenth day of the Fourth Month, 1830.

When she was quite young her parents removed to the neighborhood of Philadelphia, but of this period of her life we have very little knowledge, until the commencement of her diary, in the sixteenth year of her age. It is difficult for those who only knew her in later life and remember her plain, simple appearance, to realize that she was particularly fond of a gay dress, and was, she said, very determined "never to be a Friend." It does not appear, however, that she felt easy on these points, and soon, "like Paul, when the Unseen One spoke," her heart responded, and she "lay a learner at the Saviour's feet." But her will was strong and she passed through many deep exercises and sore conflicts of spirit before she was truly willing to bear the cross and become, as she afterwards did in a conspicuous manner, a meek and lowly disciple of the dear Saviour, and a rightly commissioned advocate of his glorious "cause of Truth and righteousness in the earth." As a minister she was weighty in spirit, sound in doctrine, and remarkably favored to give expression to her concern in a clear and concise manner. Her voice was pleasant, and she endeavored herself to those among whom she labored, particularly the young, by her ready sympathy and loving charity.

As a teacher, in which occupation so many years of her life were spent, she was much beloved, and many, even some who are not members of her own Society, look back with interest and satisfaction to the time spent in her school. The following extracts from a letter addressed to her by a former pupil, give such a beautiful picture of her love of, and exercise for, the little ones entrusted to her, it is thought it may be interesting, and perhaps instructive, to others who have the care of little children. The letter is dated Eleventh Month 8th, 1884, and says, "The time spent in thy school was a happy time. How my childish life is recalled, as I sit in the same room, after my children are gone. I think few persons understood my contrary character when I was a child, and I do know that, when others thought me the quietest,

I was having long, hard struggles with myself, always my worst enemy. Little things gave me most impressive lessons. I have always wanted to tell thee that I have never forgotten one afternoon that thee spent with me at school. I had done something in school for which thee thought best to keep me in. I remember that, after the other children had all gone, thee called me up to thee and took me upon thy lap, talking to me earnestly about the sinfulness of not obeying the "still, small voice," and telling me about the good there is in store for those who love the Lord. I do not know how long I sat there, but I know that it was growing dusk when thee put me down and kneeled down and prayed for me. Then thee kissed me and let me go, and I remember with what a sense of awe, a sweet, solemn hush, I left the room. I think I can never forget that afternoon."

D. B. W. was remarkable for her implicit faith, child-like faith in and nearness to her Saviour, taking all her joys and sorrows to Him, seeking his counsel in all her engagements, both temporal and spiritual. She would sometimes say, "He promised it," with unquestioning faith. She said she had a long, hard conflict to find her Saviour, but when she did find Him, He never seemed to leave her. When she sought Him, He was always to be found, and she did seem wonderfully clear of the doubts and fears of which so many of the Lord's dedicated ones have largely to partake to the very end. The first entries in her diary are written with child-like simplicity, showing very crude ideas on most subjects, particularly on those of a religious nature, but it was thought it may be interesting to trace her progress from this child-like condition to that of a "young man, a strong man, and finally a pillar in the Church that shall go no more out."

She went to Cantwell's Bridge, Delaware, to teach school, and thus commences her diary:

1846. Third Month 28th.—Started from Philadelphia at eight o'clock and arrived at Port Penn at one. Waited at the tavern until four, when Joshua Fennimore came after me, and arrived home about six o'clock.

29th.—Went to church with the family. We had a very good sermon, the text was Hebrews, second chapter, second verse. The bishop will be here the first Sunday in May. The minister gave the persons who were not members an invitation to come forward for confirmation, and to those who were unwilling to do it he said, "Why will ye die?"

30th.—Commenced this day with a walk upon the hill, and began school at the usual time, nine o'clock. Got along very well with our studies. It was a pleasant day.

Fourth Month 1st.—Proceeded with the usual business of the school. Walked to a small white house at the corner. I find botany a very interesting study.

2nd.—Took a long walk into the woods; gathered some maple blossoms and small white flowers. I tried to analyze them, but could not. Left one to analyze hereafter.

4th.—This farm was an extensive forest about seven or eight years ago. It was owned by a company called the "Fish Company." Mr. Fennimore bought it of Joseph Burr, who, from what I understand, purchased it of the company.

5th.—I did not go to church to-day. Read in the Bible and United States History and wrote in the afternoon.

8th.—It has been raining to day, but seems pleasant now. Did not take any walk. Cophered considerable and studied some. Invincible means inexhaustible.

9th.—Continued the same course as usual and helped to set out some flowers. Tried to analyze a daffy, but there was no description like it in the botany. Took a walk to the Pea Patch with the children.

Learned from Mrs. Fennimore that, when we could stand on the ground and put our right foot on the head of our shadow it is noon; also that when a direct line can be drawn from the top of the shadow of a tree to the sun, it is noon, but if the shadow slanted either to the right or left, it is before or after noon. I cannot understand the last sign.

10th.—I pursued my usual course. It is "Good Friday," so-called from the day on which our Saviour's crucifixion took place, it being the sixth day of the week.

12th.—It storms to-day. It is "Easter Sunday," so-called from its being the day on which Christ ascended into heaven, or the day on which He rose from the dead, being the third day after his death. It seems strange to me why the Quakers never notice any of these days, nor teach their children to notice them in the least.

13th.—Took a short walk this morning and gathered some spice-wood blossoms. They are very pleasant to the taste and good to make a tea for horses shedding their hair. The blossom is yellow, the wood is of a greyish color. The blossom grows in clusters, up and down the stems, like the maple.

16th.—Rose early this morning and took a walk before breakfast. The folks think I shall be liable to take the chills from the morning dew.

17th.—Took a long walk with the children at noon. Gathered a variety of flowers, of which I do not know the names. We met with a snake in the woods. It being a black snake we did not run far from it.

18th.—Took no walk, but helped to sweep the yard, which is very good exercise.

19th.—My birth-day. I am now sixteen years old. It being Sabbath-day I went to church with the family. We had a very good sermon. The text was taken from St. John, fifth chapter, and fourth verse, "And ye will not come unto Me, that ye might have life."

I am now just entering my seventeenth year. I have five scholars, and expect three more tomorrow. I hope that I shall be enabled to rouse their energies and strengthen their memories by the help of Him who sees all our actions and knows all our thoughts and feelings.

1847. Third Month 13th.—I have neglected my Journal a long time. Now I hope to continue it steadily. I have been going to school during the past winter, and am now teaching school at Cinnaunson, New Jersey. I hope to get along well with my school by having help from God, for without Him I am certain I can do nothing. I hope He will grant me his mercy and show me my sins, for I feel that I have done a great deal that is wrong.

19th.—I have not behaved myself properly in school this day. I have given myself up to too much mirth, especially when the second class was reading. Have had to punish one boy a little. May I become more sedate.

20th.—Went home in the morning.

21st.—Being very stormy, we did not go to meeting. Mother was not very well either. I read considerable in the Bible. After it I got to thinking about myself, and I thought I would become part plain, and then I would get plainer when I got older. But a thought came into my mind that I should be like Ananias and Sapphira, of whom we read in the Bible.

24th.—Have been quite well to-day and have got along very well with my school, and have been enabled to keep rather more of a sober countenance.

28th.—Being First-day, I did not go home, but remained at Friend Thomas', and read a great part of the time, and I find, according to what I read, that I am very vain, and I am going to try to break myself of such a sin, for I found it was a very predominant sin in me. I fear there is some envy in me which I should guard against. I must remember, at the same time, that I can do nothing of myself.

30th.—I have been enabled to keep my countenance more sober than usual to-day, and I hope I may put my trust in Him who will always lead me rightly.

31st.—I have had trouble in my school to-day, and do not know what to do with some I have now here, but hope to do rightly by them, and that I may never have any more trouble with them.

Fourth Month 12th.—I have resolved that I will try not to laugh once during the coming week in school; that I will set down every departure from my resolution, and also that my conduct be reserved at the school-house. I have not succeeded quite so well as I expected, but think I shall be able to free myself from my fault by close application to my plan.

I was reading yesterday, in the life of Henry Martyn, a missionary in India. I found by some things that I was far from being in the right course as to my soul, and I hope to improve by all I read and hear. I find that I do not consider myself enough in debt to Him.

13th.—I have laughed more to-day than yesterday, and I do not know what it is that makes me so neglectful of my duty.

In Liberia the chimpanzees are called by the natives "old-time people." Prof. O. F. Cook states that they dig land-crabs out of their burrows and crack them on stones, and are also said to crack nuts between stones, "quite man-fashion," and to grasp the python or boa by the neck and bruise its head with a stone. In a footnote in Science it is added that Major Battersby mentions that in the Barbadoes a capuchin monkey captures crabs in a similar way. "His method is to knock it about with his paw by quick pats until it is sufficiently dazed to give him a chance of smashing its claw with a large stone."

Trees of Formosa.

Tallow tree (Sillinia acbifera). The berry of this tree, after the covering falls off, is about the size of the pea, whitish in color and hangs in clusters from the branches. The tallow is extracted from the berry by pressure, and is made into candles, which, when painted red, are used for idol worship, especially in Buddhist temples. The leaves of the tree resemble those of the Canadian poplar, but in autumn they assume the red and yellow tints of the soft maple.

Camphor (Lourus camphora). Camphor-trees are the largest in the forests. On measuring one, I found it twenty-five feet in circumference. There is in my possession a plank which a hundred years ago was the end of a native chief's house. It is a single piece, of more than eight feet square, and on it are many aboriginal carvings. Camphor-gum does not run like sap from the sugar-maple, nor does it exude like pitch from the pine. It is procured in the following way: An adze half an inch broad and with a handle two feet long, is used as a gouge. With this the roots, stumps and branches of the tree are chipped. These chips are collected and placed in a sort of covered steamer, over boiling water. In due course the gum is distilled and sublimates on the inside of the vessel like hoarfrost. The process of distilling is continued until a sufficient quantity is collected, when it is put up in tubs for export. As the demand is great in European countries, the camphor industry is one of the most important on the islands.

Paper-plant (avalia papyrifera).—The so-called rice-paper is made from the pith of this plant. The roll of pith, varying from half an inch to three inches in diameter, is cut into pieces according to the width of paper desired. It is then placed upon a very smooth tile, shaped somewhat after the fashion of a slate, with a brass frame, the thickness of the paper, raised above the edges. The operator, having made the pith perfectly smooth and cylindrical, rolls it backward over the tile with his left hand, and with his right paces it concentrically, with a long, sharp, thick-bladed knife. The knife rests on the brass frame, which serves as a gauge and is drawn steadily back and forth. A beautiful paper is thus cut, which is used in making artificial flowers, or is exported to Hong Kong, where it is used in the manufacture of sun-hats. Chinese artists find large employment in painting cards of this paper, which are readily disposed of to European and American tourists.

Banian (Ficus Indica).—There can be no doubt that the banian is a long-lived tree. Of all the several hundred trees now in the college grounds at Tamsui, I planted every one from small branches, two inches through and five or six feet long. These were cut from large trees, which survived centuries of tropical storm. The banian is an evergreen, with rootlets running from the branches, which, if not interfered with, eventually reach the ground, take root, and grow as a support to the tree. The process of extension and reduplication may go on until the branches, supported by their self-produced pillars, cover a vast area and the original tree becomes an evergreen canopy, under which thousands may find shelter.

Varnish Tree (Rhus vernicefera).—The exudations from this tree become an excellent varnish, but it must be used in a dark room, and the varnished article must be left there until it is thoroughly dry. It is very poisonous, and the effect on different persons is very singular. I was once in a cabinet-maker's establishment remaining only a few minutes, but such was the effect of the varnish-poison that for three days afterwards my fingers were swollen to three times their normal size, my face had a dropsical appearance, and my eyelids could scarcely be opened. It was not so painful, but it was very irritating and intensely disagreeable. The natives now eat the fruit, though, doubtless, in days gone by, they dipped their arrows in the excretion to make them deadly weapons.

Bamboo (Bambusa arundinacea).—There is one large species which is split and made into baskets, hoops, etc. Another kind grows to about the size of a large fishing-rod. There is still another, with small and feathery leaves, which is planted for hedges. The young shoots are cut off and used for pickles. Boats, houses, bridges, baskets, chairs, hen-coops, bird-cages, jars, water-vessels, pipes, lamps, beds, masts, doors, hoops, mats, paper, are all made from this indispensable grass. The savages also make ear-rings out of it, and the only musical instruments they possess. It is to the Chinese what the cocoonist is to the South Sea Islander and the date-palm to the African. It rarely flowers or produces seed, so that when flowers are seen, those who are very superstitious declare that some great change will certainly soon take place.

Sedge. Ka-pek-sun (Cyperus).—This is a sedge found in drains, water-courses and rivulets. The shoots, in the autumn, are used daily at meals. The root, when sliced is of a whitish color, with black spots. It is truly a well-flavored, palatable vegetable.

Tobacco (Nicotiana tabacum).—On the eastern coast tobacco grows sometimes ten feet high. I never saw a living creature put to death more expeditiously than was a venomous serpent one day when we were erecting Oxford College. He was found under a heap of tiles. One laborer pinned him to the ground with a pole. Another took from his tobacco-pipe a small quantity of nicotine and put it to the mouth of the reptile. Instantly his snakeship drew himself up, stretched himself out, shuddered, and, being released, turned his whitish belly upward and expired. I would have thought this incredible had I not witnessed it. It should be stated, however, that the said pipe was an heir-loot for four generations. No wonder the nicotine was somewhat rank.—G. L. Mackay's Formosa.

A Reminiscence.

Reading the article, "Recollections of Anti-Slavery Times," in THE FRIEND of Fourth Month 25th, 1896, so refreshed in my memory some of the sad scenes of my early manhood, and the many sad statements that I have listened to from the lips of fugitives, that my mind was at once prepared to take it all in as being entirely in keeping with the feelings that very naturally attend on such a condition. Who of us would not scale a board-fence or leap over a dye-kettle to escape a merciless pursuer? I feel a freedom to inform Graceanna Lewis that, in my early manhood, my home was on what I will call a side-track of what was ironically called the underground railroad. This appellation I have understood to have been given by the defunct slave-hunters, because of their utter inability to get any clue to the objects of their pursuit, though I have known them to come so close that the fugitives could recognize the voice of their would-be masters, as they rode briskly on the public highway in the dark, while the shivering blacks crouched behind the bushes in the fence-corner, scarcely out of reach of their padded whips. The writer can easily imagine how he drew it made on the pantry and bread-crust to provide for Rachie, for I well remember the time when we had to make up a hurried lichen for fifteen, men, women and children, and, more than that, we had to provide a conveyance for them to our next station, for were their former conductors must needs turn back, so as to make sure of getting to their respective homes ere daylight opened on them. Immediately after the repast was over, the great creek was to cross, and it was so swollen by the melting snow and rain that it could not be forded. We having foreseen this, a messenger had been dispatched timely to inform our friends at the next station that we were in need of help, if they pleased to meet us at such an hour at — Ford, provided to carry so many men, women and children. All worked well, the connection was made, the fugitives were set safely over the creek, at the same dangerous place that Jacob and Annie Branson passed through, and it is presumed that their would-be owners never heard of them, as they travelled only at night. It was vastly interesting to the writer to hear those dear people relate the adventures of their escape. As all had to cross the great Ohio River, some have told me of making a raft of the rails from massa's fence, others of knowing where a skiff was wont to be left, locked to a tree, and they would provide for detaching it. Others have floated themselves over on great cakes of ice. What many form, called on by such adventurers, could but respond, "As I would ye should do to me, do I even so to you."

FOR "THE FRIENDS."

The Tendency of Bible or First-Day Schools Among Friends.

There seems to be of late a growing tendency toward the establishment and maintenance of the above schools within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and perhaps of other Conservative Friends' Yearly Meetings in America. Of course, it is a well-known fact that those Yearly Meetings known as the "Fast" bodies have had them for nearly a half century, and those who separated in 1827 for about twenty years. London and Dublin Yearly Meetings have them also.

There doubtless has been a degree of honest intention and earnest desire to do good in the promoters of Bible schools, but that these schools have been subversive of our principles and have tended to disturb the harmony and to cloud the testimony of the Society is painfully apparent. An incident related of Christopher Healy when he was at one time travelling on his Master's errands in England, seems applicable to the condition of things in later days, and it savors so much of prophetic utterance and has such force of meaning, that it may not be amiss to relate it. It is stated that on one occasion he was at the house of a woman member in that country, and she offered an excuse for her daughter's absence by informing him she was out, attending a Bible Society. "Yes," replied Christopher, "Bible society, missionary society, temperance society and—out of Society." A little humorous, perhaps, but none the less a true and sad fact, which has been too much verified by the fruits of such organizations in later days.

That there have been at times a true religious concern on the part of rightly exercised Friends to engage in something of the nature of what might be termed a First-day school, though differing widely as to the methods commonly adopted at the present day, the writer by no means questions. Even in our own time we might point to Friends who felt that the Great Head of the Church had called them to the work of gathering certain children of those both within and outside of our Society into their homes, for the purpose of reading to them the Holy Scriptures and other approved religious writings, with times of silent waiting, and vocal ministry by way of exhortation or otherwise, as they felt drawn to give, in the life and authority vouchsafed by the Divine Master, who had thus called them into his service. They would at times have the children to memorize selected portions of Scripture or religious poetry or prose. Such service, when rightly called for, at the hands of consistent, faithful, devoted servants and handmaidens, has ever been approved and encouraged by Friends. And when such concerns are presented to Friends for their approval and support, it is to be expected that they treat them as any other religious labor, for there is no rule in our discipline limiting service which the Great Shepherd calls for at our hands. To a greater or less extent, secular schools conducted by Friends have always had an allotted portion of time of each week devoted to a recitation of portions of Scripture. Our objections are not to anything of this character, but to something more subtle in its workings.

It is needless to go into an extended explanation of the belief of Friends in the Scriptures and in the propriety of diligently reading those excellent writings, which oftentimes are truly a comfort to the faint and struggling traveller Zionward. Our views along this line have been reiterated times without number, for we have always esteemed them holy writings, precious alike for their glorious promises and for their solemn warnings, handed down to us through a kind and merciful Providence, and that they are indeed "able to make us wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus;" so that we, through the comfort and consolation of them, might have hope, in seeing what was the reward of faithful saints of old who, perseveringly and with a whole heart, denied themselves in the fading pleasures and selfish gratifications of this life, to obtain a surer and a greater inheritance. I will add one quotation from the discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, extracted from the minutes of 1792, showing the esteem of that body for the Holy Scriptures and its desire that all Friends might become thoroughly familiar with them. It is as follows: "We tenderly and earnestly advise and exhort all parents and heads of families that they endeavor to instruct their children and families in the doctrines and precepts of the Christian religion as contained in the Holy Scriptures, and that they excite them to a diligent reading of those excellent writings."

The testimony Friends bear against the study of the Scriptures is against seeking to comprehend their deep spiritual meaning by the natural wisdom and will of man. These are methods too commonly and almost inevitably practised and encouraged by the system of First-day schools. The testimony we bear against these methods is the same we have always borne against worship and ministry performed in man's will and outside of the movings and drawings of the Spirit of Truth. We believe it requires the savor of Divine life, the anointing of the Holy One, to prepare and enable us to do work for Him in any religious sphere whatever, either within or outside of the Church. We cannot accept a double standard—one which condescends to the views and methods of people unacquainted with us, and the other which recognizes the essentiality of the pointings of the Divine finger. That would, it seems to us, be incompatible with Truth and would betray a weakness and a stultifying want of confidence in our own principles.

We cannot suppose that if "prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake (and wrote) as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," the interpretation of these sacred precepts and prophecies can come from a lower source. We surely must have a measure (be it never so small) of that same light in which they were written, before we can comprehend them to our spiritual advancement.

If we were to lower our testimony against the common methods of Bible study, we must, to be consistent, lower our testimony against will-worship and man-made and man-timed ministry. If we may, at our pleasure and at a set time, study the Bible to profit, as we do a book of natural history or philosophy—for that is the too easy assumption of all associated efforts in merely confederate organizations—and thereby unlock the hidden treasures of spiritual knowledge and wisdom, why may not by the same method preach the Gospel, and thereby convert the world? What would be the need then for silent waiting? And would it not then be an idle whiling away of our time to seek in meditation and prayer in our silent gatherings for that which is thus assumed to lie open to us in Sacred Writ, and which may be obtained for the mere study? There is no difference, it seems to us, between studying spiritual truths by natural comprehension in the Scriptures and studying how to apply and preach those truths for the edification, comfort and conversion of our hearers. If these were the methods ordained by the Great Head of the Church for receiving and delivering the message of life and salvation to a lost and undone world, we must conclude that the most learned in natural knowledge who would thus apply themselves would be the most competent workers and the most pious saints of Christ on earth. The testimony of the Apostle Paul would thus be without any truth, viz: That the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God; that the world by wisdom knew not God, and that He takes of the weak things and the foolish and the base things of the world, yea, things which are despised, "hath God chosen," saith the apostle, and things which are not, to confound the wise and bring to naught things that are, so that no flesh might glory in his presence. With this comports that loving declaration of our Saviour, "I thank thee, O, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent and revealed them unto babes; for so, Father, it seemed good in thy sight."

While we believe the Lord has given us faculties to reason out natural truths and to solve problems for the sustenance and maintenance of our physical being, we cannot believe He has given us these faculties to seek and comprehend spiritual truths, and thereby open up to us the way of life and salvation. He has promised us his Spirit for the latter purpose to guide and lead us into all truth.

"The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, . . . neither can he know them, because they [the things of God] are spiritually discerned; but he that is spiritual judgeth all things" (1 Cor. ii: 14, 15).

We know too well this tendency of the common system of First-day schools to seduce our members from the support of our principles, and to produce schism within our borders, to be induced to withdraw our disapprobation from, and our protest against them. We believe we should lose ground and go back to what Friends were called out of if we were to do so.

From the precatory lesson of the Bible class comes the customary opening and closing prayer by those at other times not heard in our meetings, then the usual hymn-singing and the address to the scholars, and finally, the stated religious "experience" meeting. This is as far as we in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have yet gotten, but who can say there is no more to follow? When this system of Bible schools becomes thoroughly entrenched within our borders, the next question probably is, "Will the Yearly Meeting adopt it and carry it on (as other Yearly Meetings do), as part of its religious concern?" We may console ourselves with the fancy that there is no danger whatever, that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has kept well to the ancient principles and testimonies of Friends thus far, and we hope she will continue to do so. This certainly is the great desire and prayer of the writer; but we must do more than wish and hope in an indifferent manner. Each one of us must be faithful to what is shown to him or to her. If we saw to the wind we must expect to reap the whirlwind.

There is already an organization in our midst antagonistic to the regular order of the Society respecting ministry and worship as still upheld among us. It is composed almost wholly of members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and is known as "The Women Friends' Foreign Missionary Society." It is organized to send religious workers to Japan, China and other foreign countries, without consulting the regular established order of Society. I venture to say that the overseers of our various meetings to which these members belong rarely deal with them for this transgression of discipline. The said society contracts with persons to go out in a religious capacity (though partly secular, I will admit), and guarantees them support, and their object is to establish mission stations, which, to a large degree, are carried on at variance with our views on worship and ministry. Moreover, most of those who are the promoters and sympathizers of this work are such as [do not value] our testimonies to plainness and simplicity in dress and speech. Some of them seem as much conformed to the fashions, customs and maxims of the world as any worldlying. At the same time they claim to be Friends in religious persuasion and in name. Surely it seems that the time is nigh at hand for Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to give no uncertain sound as to their testimony in these respects.

"He that despiseth the day of small things shall fall by little and by little." I. J. R.

A CURIOUS SUPERSTITION.—One curious superstition, which we heard of as existing amongst several of the tribes inhabiting the banks of the Niger, between this and the delta, is a belief in the possibility of a man possessing an alter ego, in the form of some animal, such as a crocodile or hippopotamus. It is believed that such a person's life is bound up with that of the animal to such an extent that, whatever affects the one produces a corresponding impression upon the other, and that if one dies the other must speedily do so too. It happened not very long ago that an Englishman shot a hippopotamus close to a native village. The friends of a woman who died the same night in the village demanded and eventually obtained five pounds as compensation for the murder of the woman.—Hausaland.

CASTLES IN THE AIR.—CLOUDS.

There are beautiful castles in the air this eve,
Floating across the sky,
And the sinking sun a halo paints,
With its golden and crimson dye.

Far over one glossy hill-top
Is a wondrous castle fair,
With silvery spires of nothing
And domes of colored air.

A long and golden ladder
Leads from a palace gay
To where a dim old dungeon
Rolls in clouds of mist away.

And far away in the shadow,
With only a crest of bright,
A ruined fortress is tottering,
And sinking into the night.

And just above, on the margin
Of a parting sun-beam's ray,
Is a tower of glory and, it seems,
Of everlasting day.

But every moment changes
The scene of beauty there.
And now the tower is gray,
But grander, though less fair.

Whole cities I see yonder,
Walls of iron, with gates of pearl,
Arches rising high above them,
Glorious banners o'er them furled.

And far down, near the horizon,
Lies a mosque of flaming fire.
Every breath rolls up the smoke
And lifts the bright flame higher.

Then I think of other castles,
Once brighter than the clouds,
That fell crumbling to ruin,
Lost hopes their only shrines.

And my heart grows sick and heavy
With the thought of aims long past.
My castles were too brightly built,
And like these they could not last.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Some Common Plants and Others.

In a walk around Moorestown in the early part of the Seventh Month, I was struck with the abundance of a plant, that I had known for seventy years, the Pepperglass (Lepidium Virginicum), and the biting taste of whose small flat seed pods remain among my early reminiscences. It belongs to a well-marked natural family in which the four petals of the flower are placed opposite each other in pairs, their spreading limbs forming a cross. Hence this order is called Cruciferae. The species are very numerous, and all have a pungent or acrid juice, but none are poisonous. The seed vessels are pods, either short and flat ones as in the Pepperglass, or longer as in the Mustard and Radish. The Lepidium is a symmetrical plant. The stem is slender, yet stiff and upright; and from the upper part small branches grow which are terminated by little white flowers. These are succeeded by round flat pods each supported on a slender stem, strung along the main branches, which continues to grow at their upper extremity, until they reach a length of several inches. A plant lying before me has about five hundred of these pods on it, so that abundant provision is made for the seeding of the Pepperglass.

Belonging to the same family, Cruciferae, I found some wild Mustard, with yellow flowers and rounded pods of an inch or more in length.

As I walked along the railroad bank my attention was attracted by a bright yellow flower growing in the sides of a ditch. It was one of a numerous class of plants which continues for a considerable time to flower at the summit of a growing stem, while the seed vessels which succeed the bloom are arranged along the lower part of the stem. The seed vessels of this plant are interesting objects being cubical in shape with the lower end rounded. Hence is derived its common name Seed box (Ludwigia alternifolia). It is much branched, the leaves are narrow and pointed; and altogether it is a rather attractive plant.

Equally curious was the seed-vessel of a plant growing near by, which from its helmet shape is called Skulcapp (Scutellaria). It belongs to the Mint family (Labiatae), which have square stems, opposite aromatic leaves, often dotted with small glands containing a volatile oil on which depends the warmth and aroma of these plants. The species I saw was the Entire-leaved Skulcapp (Scutellaria integrifolia). The flowers are beautiful, about an inch long, bright blue at summit and pale on the lower part of the tube. Indeed, a friend recently sent me some specimens which were white throughout, but this is not a very common variety.

I passed some of the flowering stalks of the common Garlic (Allium vineale). From the form of its flowers it is placed in the Lily family. One peculiarity of the plant is that in the cluster which terminates the stem, the flowers are often intermingled with bulbs. So that it propagates itself by these as well as by seed.

A still more interesting plant to me was a species of Lily family growing on the side of the railroad, which I had never seen before. It was about four feet high, with narrow and long grass-like leaves, and numerous greenish-white flowers arrayed in a few crowded racemes. At first sight it reminded me of the conspicuous bloom of the Black Snake Root, so common in the rich woodlands and clearings of Chester County, Pa. Gray in his botany gives as its habitat, low ground in Pine barrens. As about fifteen of these conspicuous plants were growing together within a few feet of each other, it was a matter of surprise how it was that I had not noticed them in previous seasons, especially as they continue for several weeks in bloom. If they were new comers, it is difficult to explain from whence they came, as several zealous botanists of lower New Jersey had never met with the plant in the course of their researches. But there are many mysteries connected with the travels of plants. This plant is not frequent enough to have obtained a common name, but botanically it is known as Zygadenus leianthoides.

Observing a man in a field by the railroad examining some Lima bean vines, I asked him if the pods were yet formed. He came bringing a young pod of an inch or more in length. A small round hole had been eaten into it, opposite the seed. He said the mischief was done by a small green worm, similar in appearance to a young cabbage worm, and that the pod would drop off without maturing its seeds. The year before his crop of Lima Beans had been almost ruined by these worms. J. W.

WHATSOEVER comes to the soul in a simple and peaceful manner, is God's light guiding it, but what comes to you through argument and disquietude must be gradually put away, while you turn lovingly to God.—Fenelon.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

New England Yearly Meeting, held at Westerly, Rhode Island.

The Yearly Meeting of New England convened on Sixth Month 13th, 1896, the Select Meeting and Meeting for Sufferings having met the day previous. Meetings for Divine worship were held in joint session on First-day forenoon and afternoon. These meetings were felt to be seasons of spiritual refreshment, in a very marked degree. The Great Head of the Church condescended to be very near and to bless those assembled with celestial showers to their joy and rejoicing, fulfilling his promise in Holy Writ, "For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them."

In the morning meeting of First-day, after a time of solemn silence, prayer was offered, humbly acknowledging the weakness of poor, finite man, and earnestly craving the blessing of preservation, to be kept as in the hollow of his own holy hand, where none can make afraid, and that if it pleased the Lord to use his poor servants in the line of the ministry, they might minister as in the ability which God giveth and not in man's wisdom, that He would condescend to be with the Friends of this place in their annual assembly, be with them in their various sittings, enabling them to conduct the business to his own honor and praise.

The meeting was afterwards addressed from the text, "I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service. And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewings of your mind, that ye may prove, what is that good and acceptable, and perfect will of God."

The poor mouthpieces were permitted to draw from the inexhaustible store-house of God's love in a wonderful manner, and to hand forth to those assembled spiritual food, to their joy and rejoicing, fulfilling the ancient promise that He would open the windows of heaven and pour out a blessing, "that there shall not be room enough to receive it." We believe many hearts were humbled and contrited, and tears of joy and gratitude were observed on faces for the blessings of the day, so freely offered by a kind, merciful Creator. An elderly person certainly voiced the sentiments of many present, after the meeting was over, when she said, "I think we have had a real George Fox meeting this day," one that the Great Head of the Church was pleased to own and bless.

Second-day morning, Sixth Month 15th, 1896.—The regular meeting for transacting the business of the Yearly Meeting, convened at nine A. M. John W. Foster and Job S. Gidley served the meeting as Clerk and Assistant. Epistles were now read from Canada, Ohio, Western, Iowa, and Kansas Yearly Meetings, with which New England is in correspondence.

They contained words of wisdom, encouragement and comfort, calculated to strengthen their brethren and sisters in New England to build upon the true foundation, Christ Jesus, who is the way, the truth and the life. The Clerk then informed the meeting there was a paper on the table from a body of Friends with which this meeting was not in correspondence. The meeting concluded to refer it to the committee having charge of preparing essays of epistles to Yearly Meetings they were in correspondence with, and to report their judgment on the subject at the next sitting. After a few committees were appointed to audit the Treasurer's account, etc., the meeting adjourned to four o'clock this afternoon. The meeting convened at about the hour adjourned to. The representatives reported they were united in offering the names of John W. Foster as Clerk and Job S. Gidley as Assistant Clerk to the meeting this year. These nominations were satisfactory to the meeting, and they were accordingly appointed to their respective places. The committee on epistles then reported they had examined the paper given them by the Clerk, that it was an epistle from London Yearly Meeting to New England Yearly Meeting, that they had conferred together, and were united in judgment that it be read in this meeting. It was accordingly read. The meeting concluded to acknowledge the reception of the paper in a kind and courteous manner, and, if way opened for it, to extend to the Friends of London Yearly Meeting that were desirous of maintaining all our doctrines and testimonies in their original foundation, words of tender sympathy and encouragement, and explain to London Yearly Meeting that New England Yearly Meeting does not see how she could consistently open correspondence with her at this time, under existing circumstances. It was finally left with the Meeting for Sufferings to prepare an essay of epistle, and have it signed by the clerks of men's and women's meeting.

During the consideration of the state of Society, as shown by the reading of the Queries and Answers, excellent counsel was given, calculated to encourage Friends to greater dedication of heart to all the requirements of a kind, merciful Saviour, who, as many could testify, was not an hard master, but a kind, loving, tender, compassionate Father, not willing that any should be lost, but that all might repent, return and be saved with an everlasting salvation. Friends were encouraged not to enter into business that would not admit of their attending their mid-week meetings. That it was somewhat in the way of the cross to some Friends to go to meeting in the middle of the week, to leave their business affairs, but they were reminded by a dear aged Friend that King David would not offer a sacrifice unto the Lord that cost him nothing, and that if we, of this day and generation, were truly concerned for the salvation of our immortal souls, we would not feel it tiresome or a cross, but a great privilege to come and sit down with our brethren in worshipping Almighty God. He wanted them to be faithful to their Lord and a blessing would attend it, he firmly believed. Parents were encouraged to bring up their children in plainness of speech, behavior and apparel, and to be especially guarded as to the kind of literature that entered their homes. They were advised to early acquaint the dear children with the literature of our own Society, how early Friends had to suffer for our doctrines and testimonies, and that they counted not their lives dear unto themselves (citing Mary Capper), that they might lay down their heads in peace at the close of life, feeling that they had been obedient to their loving Lord, in all that He required of them.

Heads of families were encouraged to collect their children around them in the morning of each day, while their minds were fresh, and read a portion of the Holy Scriptures, observing a time of silence, that each might approach the Father of all our sure mercies, for his blessing that maketh truly rich. Also, the practice of retiring alone and reading the Sacred Writings and waiting upon the Lord, who in his own good time will reveal their hidden meaning, was spoken of as a practice that would yield solid comfort and satisfaction. Allusion was made to our doctrines and testimonies, that they were founded in the Truth, and we cannot afford to let any of them fall to the ground. Time and observation have shown, that where one testimony has been lowered or let fall, it only paved the way for other and greater departures until in many places, there seems but little left.

The subject of the ministry as professed by Friends, was clearly explained. That it is the prerogative of the Head of the Church, to dispense to whomsoever He will, both men and women, those gifts which He designs for its edification. Early Friends saw in the light of the Lord, that no man's talents or learning, nor any human ordination, can constitute any one a minister of Jesus Christ, it requires a special call and qualification, dispensed by the Head of the Church to the sanctified members whom He separates for the work of the ministry. This gift can only be exercised under his putting forth; not in the will or time of man, but in the Lord's time, He giving the authority, and supplying him with what he is to deliver to others, without money and without price.

The various subjects claiming the attention of the Yearly Meeting were conducted in much harmony and brotherly condescension; nothing occurring to mar the solemnity of the occasion. It was concluded to hold a meeting for Divine worship, in joint session, on Fourth-day to convene at eleven A. M. The closing meeting proved a memorable one to many. There seemed to be a hungering and a thirsting for something better than this world can give, and the Great Head of the Church condescended to be very near, overshadowing the assembly as with his ancient wing of goodness, to the comfort and soul-satisfaction of his humble followers.

Prayer was offered, acknowledging the many favors we had been blessed with, and humbly craving that each might bear to his home and friends a sense or share of gratitude for the many favors bestowed upon us, unworthy as we were of the least of his blessings, and that as we were soon to part, and in all probability not all to meet again on earth, we might so live that when it shall please Him, with whom we all have to do, to say it is enough, and He should sever the silver cord, we might all gather around the throne of God, singing his praises forever. Amen.

Afterwards the language of Holy Writ was revived: "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." That the Friends might remember for their encouragement, that the Lord could work with few or many his wonders to perform. That if they were faithful to their God, He would cause one to chase a thousand, and two to put ten thousand to flight. But they must remember it was not the sword of Gideon, but "the sword of the Lord," and then Gideon.

A dear aged Friend then addressed the company, "That he had come among them in great weakness; that he could adopt the language of the Psalmist, 'I am a worm and no man,' but that he wished to bear his testimony to the goodness and love of God to his humble, dependent children. Finally commending them to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified." (Closing, farewell in the love of God.)

The meeting closed to meet again at the usual time next year, if consistent with the Divine will.

TEUTOBURGERWALD, Fifth Month 27th, '96.

You know of course all about the Teutoburgerwald? What! you don't mean to tell me that you do not? How very surprisingly ignorant you are! But since you have been honest, I will be too, and tell you that up to the last few months I was as ignorant of its existence as you. It is not marked upon the maps of Germany given in the school geographies, but when I tell you that it is a range of low mountains, still largely forest clad, extending from northwest to southeast in the western part of North Germany, you will have a rough idea of this physical feature which has so important an influence in the peculiar development of this section of country, both politically and in connection with the introduction of Christianity into the land.

I will tell you one thing, a more beautiful region can hardly be imagined, especially now that everything is green, the fruit trees in bloom, and the whole landscape smiling and gay. Most attractive of all to me, are the quaint, red tiled roofs of the villages, that are constantly showing themselves among the mass of foliage and bloom, and then as this region has played so important a part in the history of the country, there are numerous ivy covered ruins and towers, as well as well-preserved castles and palaces. Among the latter none that I have seen are half so beautiful as many a private house—in Germantown, for instance—but when one speaks of historic interest there is no comparison.

If you look at the map again and picture how it was in the old, old times, when the Germanic tribes were half savage, warlike, but still from deepest heart a brave, freedom-loving people, with a religion that was no worship of idols, but one in which the Creator of the nature that so stirred with awe and reverence their simple child-like hearts, was to them a being so incomprehensibly high and mighty that none dared express their idea of Him by any work of hand, and whose temple could be nothing less stupendous than the forests themselves, with their heaven-reaching archways and soaring columns, for such a people it is easy for us to understand how a range of forest clad mountains like these could serve as a barrier from encroachments from without, and how the Christian Church was forced to battle so long and fiercely before she could enclose within her fold all these wild children of the North. To root out their religion was impossible, it was too deeply interwoven with the very foundations of their natures, all that the church could do was to give a new meaning to the rites and ceremonies they found. Thus the temples they builded of stone must suggest the vaulted archways of the forests in which they were wont to worship, and no North Saxon could be made to feel safe in a house unprotected by horse skulls ranged on its roof, for the horse being sacred to Wodan, their chief deity, must be sacrificed to him; and these skulls showed that the house-owner had performed his duty in this respect. All the change the early fathers could bring about in regard to this custom was to reduce the number of skulls to two, and they to be so placed as to form a cross over the gable of the house. In this way, both the rule Teuton and his teacher were satisfied. It is a remarkable fact that to this day in many of the more rural districts the peasants still carry on this custom, and that no new house is built without these ornaments—naturally imitations, out of wood—being placed over the gable. But I am wandering from my subject. I wished to say that it was in this region that in 9 A. D. the Teutonic leader, Herman or Armin, as he is often called, succeeded in completely defeating the Romans under Varius, the nephew of Augustus, and so kept back from the people of the North the influence of the Roman civilization, which affected so materially the people of southern Germany, France, Austria, and other places where their power penetrated. Later in 823, Charlemagne gained here a decisive victory over the Saxons, and later his son Louis the Pious founded bishoprics and built chapels, thus enabling the Catholic fathers to take a deeper hold upon this intense Wodan worshipping race. Even for centuries later the Christians were forced to take refuge among the mountains and to carry on their rites in secret.

The most interesting remains of these early hiding places are to be found a mile or two west of the little town of Horn, where we spent this afternoon. At this place the range of hills, formed of a soft sandstone, has been eaten through by a stream, and there, jutting out in bold, rugged outline, is left exposed rock masses that rise perpendicularly for a hundred or more feet, forming a natural wall, though with frequent breaks and narrow openings. The whole is made most picturesque, through the dense growth of ferns and shrubbery that have fastened themselves in the rocks and gnarled trees whose fantastic roots have formed a perfect net-work in their reaching out for a hiding place in the more kindly earth far below. But it is not the natural beauty that gives these rocks such a deep, fascinating interest for the beholder, for here, as elsewhere, it is the human interest that holds us most—the thought that here, human hearts have throbbled in rapture, in fear, in pain and suffering, gives the spot a magnetic charm that no simple natural beauty could offer.

In the under part of the rock mass are excavations evidently used as places of meeting. There was a stone step where the preacher had stood as he spoke to his faithful followers, and in the stone floor an excavated basin must have held the water with which the converts were baptized.

Outside, a rude rock mass, with much worn niches cut in the sides, shows where the preacher mounted to the smoother top, where he was able to address a larger audience in the open air. Upon the face of the rocks is a rude carving said to be the oldest specimen of sculpture in North Germany, representing the crucifixion—or rather the descent from the cross. It is divided into three parts, the centre showing the group about the cross, above, God the Father receiving the Spirit of Christ, in the form of a little child, while below Adam and Eve upon their knees are looking upward to the Christ who shall deliver them from the bondage of sin and death, which is represented by a double serpent enclosing them in its folds.

But most interesting of all are two separate chapels cut out of the solid rock fully a hundred feet from the ground—here were altar and rude seats, in one open to the sky, while the other was sheltered by the overhanging rock. Since the latter part of last century access has been easy to these chapels by means of steps cut in the stone, while evidence is there that in former times the worshippers ascended by means of wooden ladders made fast to the face of the rocks. The opening between the separate huge masses are for a considerable distance walled up artificially, with evidence in one place of a gate that could be opened or closed; all going to show that people in danger of their lives had once sought shelter here, and yet, after all, nothing exact is known of the history of these excavations, but as that leaves room for the imagination to have full sway, one can almost say that this lack of certain knowledge gives them an added charm.

The town itself is old and picturesque, and at present in holiday dress owing to the "Schützen fest" that the people were celebrating to-day. The houses were decorated with wreaths and garlands reaching across the streets, bearing designs made of flowers. This is one of the old, old customs still kept up by the peasants, though it has long ago lost its real significance. It is now simply a merry-making time, while formerly it was held to bring together all the fighting men of the community to see who was the truest marksman. The one proving himself as such was to be their leader. This practice is still carried out, and we met a carriage with six horses and outriders in gorgeous costumes, the whole covered with garlands, on its way to the grounds where the celebration was going on, to bring back in triumph the "Schützenkoenig" to the town. We could hear the music and see the bright costumes of the peasant dancers, as they sported on the green.

But I have begun at the wrong end, for I ought to have told you first of the Hermans Deukmal (monument), that we visited this morning. There was an inconspicuous sculptor in Hanover that so long ago as 1830 conceived the idea of erecting an enormous monument in honor of Herman in the Teutoburgerwald. To this end he wandered over Germany, striving to rouse the people to a sense of sufficient national pride to donate the required funds. Returning home and having settled in his own mind the most suitable spot for its erection, namely, the summit of the highest mountain in North Germany, about twelve hundred feet in height, he gave the Duke of Lippe, who owned the ground, no peace until the coveted right was granted him to begin the work. He himself built the roads and transported the material necessary for the construction, and what is far more, he designed and executed unaided the entire monument. This work covered a period of several decades, during which he lived in a tiny house, which still stands near by, with his wife and family. Then came a pause—without more money and the help of men who must be paid, he could not bring the parts together, but for many years the huge dismembered body lay around among the stone blocks that were to form the foundation of the statue, and formed an excellent place in which his own children and those of the neighborhood could play hide and seek. Naturally enough he came to be regarded as a man of one idea, if not altogether insane. But nothing, reproach, neglect or poverty, daunted him in the purpose to which he had dedicated his life. He quietly waited his time, and when the nation had been stirred to a sense of its own greatness after the victorious termination of the Franco-Prussian War in 1872, he again appealed for aid, and the cry was heard and cheerfully responded to.

In 1875, on the sixteenth of Eighth Month, in the presence of the Emperor William and the nobles of the court was the monument unveiled.

Two marble slabs with an inscription on each tell where the Emperor and the former poor, now honored, sculptor stood during the ceremony, which included as well the knighting of the latter, so that he became no longer Ernst Baudel, but Ernst von Baudel. Shortly after this he died, his work was completed, the dream of his life fulfilled. How few of those who have cherished ideals, whether more or less worthy than those of poor Ernst von Baudel, could have said so much as that in the evening of their lives? His life can at least impress us anew with the truth of the old saying that when one will one can. Of the statue itself one must admit that few of those possessing knowledge of such things find it a work of high artistic merit, though imposing in the extreme. The foundation is a dome-shaped building, thirty-two meters high and proportionally large in circumference, while the bronze figure it supports measures to the point of the uplifted sword twenty-six meters and weighs seventy-six thousand five hundred and sixty-five kilo (you can figure that out in pounds yourself; it goes beyond my ability). It is easy to imagine that such a structure forms a landmark over the entire country, and the view from the balcony above, around the dome, is one unrivalled in this part of the country for extent and variety.

I need scarcely say that it was sometime yesterday that I began my letter, and that long before I had written so much, the train came that took us to Pymont, the pretty little German watering-place so famous in this part of the country for its mineral springs and its miles of avenues of enormous trees. For many centuries the residence of a prince, it has besides its castle most handsome parks, in which the trees are something wonderful. We have been out this afternoon again, and I will employ the few minutes left me before the stage comes in to say another word about Pymont. It is so quiet, so peaceful here, and so purely German. The principal street where all the world congregates every afternoon is a very wide avenue with immense horse chestnut trees on both sides, whose branches meet above and form a dense shade. Booths, with all sorts of articles for sale, are arranged along the sides. At one end of the street is a large pavilion where the principal spring bubbles up and where, from morning till night, people may be seen sipping water through a straw. In the centre is of course an orchestra stand, and there in the morning at six and in the afternoon at four, the concert begins.

The avenue itself is swept several times a day, and during the season is, especially in the afternoon, a living mass of humanity, either promading under the green shelter, or sitting alone or in groups, the women crocheting or knitting, the men smoking, and both drinking, either coffee or beer.

But this is tiresome, and besides I must go, though I wanted to tell you about these quaint Saxon houses that we saw so many of this morning, whose entrance looks for all the world like barn doors, and when one happened to be open and we could look in, there were the carts and other utensils standing about, and high up among the rafters hung the hams and bacon, not to forget the sausages. I imagine in the fall, after the fresh supply is laid in, the display would be more imposing. E. S. KITE.

terity, was derived in this wise. She had heard John Simpson very instructively in the ministry, and particularly so in explaining the mysteries of the Revelations, and on an expected visit from him, looked forward to it as an occasion of spiritual instruction in respect to the sublime truths which had so interestingly engaged his mind in the ministry. She was disappointed to find him drawn to speak familiarly of his farming operations, and to abstain from those high and serious matters her own mind was dwelling upon; and among other things he narrated was the occurrence of a disorderly contest among his hands in the harvest field, whereby they injured his wheat. He started to arrest their proceedings, determined to turn some of them out of the field in a hurry, but was himself arrested on the way by a voice which inwardly spoke to him in the language, "John, govern thyself, before thou art rightly qualified to govern others." He sat down until his own mind was quieted, then went to the men, addressed them upon the impropriety of wasting the grain bountifully bestowed for our sustenance by a merciful Creator, and was heard with respect and submission, all steadily resuming their work. She concluded this to be the lesson she most stood in need of as one of the heads of a large family of various dispositions, saying, "I felt the necessity of keeping self under proper control in order for the right regulation of those about me. And the incident was often recalled to in silence for my own improvement, and sometimes recommended to others for their advantage."

WHAT MORAL LAPSES PROVE.—Not the righteousness, but the evil way of men, is the Bible's best corroborator. If there is any one truth which is unmistakable in the Inspired Word, it is that man is weak and prone to evil. Every fresh instance of a trust violated, every revelation of crime or moral lapse, does not, as some half-hearted Christians seem to think, cast suspicion upon the genuineness of God's Word, and the essential truth that man needs a Saviour. What such disclosures of human fallibility really do prove is just these truths of man's weakness and his first need. And yet the revelations of crime and moral degradation in the circles of those who have long been trusted and respected, ought not to force us unduly into suspicious attitudes toward those whom we have trusted. The only exception to this, perhaps, is in ourselves. Every new disclosure of the weakness and evil side of men may well lead us to hold a suspicious attitude toward ourselves, and to set a closer watch upon the one life over which we have the first control—our own. If the moral failure of one who has been trusted could lead each one to turn his back instantly upon his first temptation, there would be no need for any one to distrust his neighbor. But this the world will not do, or does not do, and while the world thus fails, the truth of the Bible is demonstrated anew, and the world has fresh evidence with each recurring downfall of men, that man needs a Saviour.

The intricate machinery of a large mill got out of order one day, and none of the engineers or operatives or mill superintendents could discover the cause. Nearly a thousand dollars a day was lost by the owners through the enforced idleness of the mill, and a practical machinist in a neighboring city was sent for. When he arrived upon the scene he made a short examination, and in five minutes remedied the defect and started the machinery up again. Later he sent in his bill for five hundred dollars for services. The mill owners, considering this a large charge, asked for an explanation, and the machinist sent back an itemized bill something like this: "For one day's work, $250; on for $250; for knowing how to repair the machinery, $495." The mill owners saw the force of the man's logic, and paid his bill without further opposition.—Selected.

There is great danger at the present time of our religion degenerating into a mere public meeting religion. We live on "movements," "organizations," "excitements" and restless dissipations of energy. We have "Sunrise prayer-meetings," "Junior Endeavor prayer-meetings," "Women's prayer-meetings," "Men's prayer-meetings" and "Old Folks' prayer-meetings." The Lord's Day, from early morn till late at night, is occupied with public-meeting religion, and while this external machinery is duplicated and multiplied, the inner fires are dying out, because they are not fed by secret prayer and communion with God. Fall back on our base of supplies, is the order that should ring along the line of battle, for scattered forces mean a weakened army.—The Cynosure.

BEAR in mind that the wages of sin is death, but that the gift of God is eternal life.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 25, 1896.

A letter from a friend in a distant Yearly Meeting where a mixed state of things exists, speaks of a Quarterly Meeting which the writer had attended, where much was said that was very objectionable, yet at times the Divine Power was felt to be near, and was very comfortable to the little flock gathered in his name. One of the "fast" ministers present said in a conversation that it was on the lines of ignorance to speak of the necessity of silent waiting in meeting. He was always ready and only waited for an opportunity to speak. In reply, he was reminded of the language of the Apostle Paul, "Let him that ministereth, wait on his ministering."

It is cause for sorrow both for his own sake and that of the Church that persons should arise among us, who are so far astray from our original doctrines. William Penn says of the early preachers among Friends, that "They could not run when they list, or pray or preach when they pleased, but as Christ their Redeemer prepared and moved them by his own blessed Spirit, for which they waited in their services and meetings, and spoke as that gave them utterance." And he adds, that through the power and spirit of the Lord Jesus they became very fruitful, and thousands were turned to the Truth through their testimony. He further testifies, that without this secret Divine power of Christ, there is no quickening and regenerating of dead souls.

This is the doctrine which the Society of Friends has held from the beginning; and from it our manner of holding religious meetings necessarily flows.

Thus Robert Barclay, writing on this subject says: "When assembled, the great work of one and all ought to be to wait upon God; and returning out of their own thoughts and imaginations to feel the Lord's presence. As everyone is thus gathered, and so met together inwardly in their spirits, as well as outwardly in their persons, then the secret power and virtue of life is known to refresh the soul, and the pure motions and breathings of God's Spirit, are felt to arise; from which as words of declaration, prayers or praises arise, the acceptable worship is known, which edifies the Church and is well pleasing to God."

A friend recently placed in our hands a work on the Indwelling of the Holy Spirit, written by Andrew Murray, who we suppose is a clergyman as the title Rev. is prefixed to his name. The book contains many testimonies to the truth of the great principle so firmly believed in by our own Society that the Spirit of Christ does abide with those who open their hearts to receive Him in the way of his coming, and faithfully obey his commands, and so far it is acceptable and profitable. Yet there are parts of it which seem to us to show the effects on the mind of the writer of a theological training, especially in drawing distinctions of a refined character, which are more curious than edifying.

It clearly states that the "Scriptures were spoken by holy men of old as they were moved by the Holy Spirit, can only be understood as they are taught by the same Spirit." Yet it seems to assume that it is necessary to have the inspired words of Scripture in the mind, so that they can be unfolded to us. This is a limitation of the work of the Spirit, which we cannot accept.

Again in the analysis of the work of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit in man's redemption, the author treats on ground where we fear to follow him.

The book is one which we hope may be useful to some, by calling them to more spiritual values that they now hold, but it seems to us that our own members will find it an unsafe substitute for the deeply spiritual writings of some of the early Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Venezuela's brief, prepared by Counsel Morrow, has been presented to the Venezuelan Commission and the British Mission. "For the first time a true transitional line in accordance with the evidence is laid down and Lord Salisbury's contention as to the settlements is shown to be a mere diplomatic quibble, utterly unsupported by law or fact, and unworthy of any consideration by the Commission." Counsel Morrow demonstrates that the Schonburgk line, as held by Lord Salisbury, was a forgery perpetrated by the English Government twenty years after Schonburgk's death.

During the last fiscal year 353,267 immigrants arrived in the United States, of whom 212,496 were males and 140,771 females. There were 26,800 illegals, 23,000 inmatricants, of whom 2,010 were paupers and 776 contract laborers.

A committee of the bolting silver Republicans, after a conference at Colorado Springs, issued a manifesto on the 20th inst., announcing that they will support Bryan and Sewell.

There are about 50,000,000 silver dollars in circulation, and 378,000,000 coined and ready for use, which the Government would be glad to put in circulation, but cannot. And yet some people think all that this country needs to make it prosperous is plenty of silver dollars.

The Kansas Court of Appeals has declared ineffective the law under which divorces have been granted in that State for twenty-five years. It is estimated that from 35,000 to 50,000 divorces are affected. The decision affects property rights and the custody of children.

The right of a creditor to use a postal card in making a statement of indebtedness came up before United States Commissioner Foote, in Chicago, last week, and was upheld.

Ex-Governor William E. Russell, of Massachusetts, was found dead in his bed at a fishing camp near Little Pabos, Quebec, on the morning of the 16th inst. Heart disease is supposed to have been the cause.

Recent hail and wind storms have seriously damaged the peanut crop in North Carolina and Virginia.

The most appalling disaster which has occurred in Cleveland, except the vladact accident last winter, when a hotel street car plunged 100 feet into the river, occurred at 8 o'clock p. m. on the 16th inst. While a flat-bottom ferry boat, loaded with between forty and fifty laborers, was crossing the old river channel, it was capsized, and all the men thrown into the channel, and between fifteen and twenty drowned.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 395, which is 63 more than the previous week, and 117 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 315 were under five years of age; 294 were males and 201 females; 121 died of cholera infantum; 49 of consumption; 41 of marasmus; 39 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 30 of typhoid; 21 of apoplexy; 21 of pneumonia; 20 of inflammation of the brain; 19 of heart disease; 19 of immitation; 16 of cancer; 15 of old age; 12 of Bright's disease; 12 from casualties; 12 of uremia; 11 of paralysis; 11 of diphtheria; and 10 of nephritis.

FOREIGN.—In the House of Lords, on the 17th inst., Lord Salisbury laid upon the table of that body the papers relating to the boundary dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela. Lord Salisbury, in presenting the documents, said that negotiations between Great Britain and the United States in regard to the Venezuela matter were still in progress. The Government, he added, did not believe that the claim made by Venezuela was a suitable subject for arbitration, but when the facts in the case, as regarded the past history of Venezuela, were fully ascertained, he thought that the diplomatic question involved could be referred to arbitration. He further stated that concurrently with the negotiations which were in progress with the United States in regard to the dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela, negotiations were also going on between the British and American Governments contemplating the establishment of a tribunal for the general arbitration of questions which might arise between the two nations. This, however, he said, was a matter which required great care and circumspection.

Reports from various cities indicate that the demand for bicycles in England and the other European countries is equal to the home demand. The inability of English manufacturers to meet the demand is opening up a market for American wheels, and as they are superior in weight, strength and appearance, the demand for them is increasing. English papers now devote considerable space to bicycle news, and the rivers are deserted now that wheeling has prevailed.

Two thousand "Latter-Day Saints" (Mormons) missionaries are said to be in England just now.

The Chronicle publishes a dispatch from Constantinople saying that four hundred Armenians have been massacred in the Diarbekis district. The town was destroyed, the date on which the massacre occurred is not given.

The Christian Deputies in the Cretan Assembly declare that a diplomatic settlement of the Cretan troubles is impossible.

The mothers of a detachment of soldiers who were about starting from Saragossa for Cuba, have made a protest to the Government against their sons being sent away. The Government authorities ascribe the protests to the influence of agents of Cuban filibusters, and are determined to find and prosecute all such persons.

Li Hing Chang, the Chinese Viceroy, who is to spend three or four weeks in England as the guest of the nation, is expected to arrive shortly. The amazing deception which the Germans practised upon themselves in attributing to Li Hing Chang the power to purchase warships, raise loans, conclude contracts and order material of all sorts, to be fallen into by his British entertainers. He will be the guest of the Foreign Office, have an audience with the Queen, and see the dock-yards and the ship-building yards, but the Foreign Office is under misapprehension as to the limitation of his powers. He has no authority to conclude any contract for anything. It is learned from an authoritative source that he has certain draft conventions prepared while he was in Russia, relating to loans, railway extensions and customs, with others suggested in Berlin, and that he is ready to receive and discuss divers proposals in Paris, London and the United States. But Peking must decide upon the terms.

It is considered that Japanese men are among the best needle-workers in the world, their only equals being the women of Russia.

Particulars reached Chihuahua, Mexico, Seventh Month, 14th, of the fall of a meteor in the small mountain range of Sierra Gorda, near the city of Mexico, was of immense size, and as it descended through the air it was a molten mass of metal. It made its descent at noon, and was accompanied by a report louder than that made by a cannon. It struck the top of a mine and demolished the building, killing two children, and one buried itself in the ground to a great depth. The larger part of the meteor broke off when it struck, and it will be sent to the National Museum at the City of Mexico. There has been no rain in that section for nearly a year, but within twenty minutes after the fall of the meteor the sky became overcast with clouds and a heavy fall of rain took place.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1847. Fourth Month 14th.—Have got along well with my school to-day, and have not been led to mirth, and I feel very grateful to God for protecting me, for certainly I could not have done it myself.

15th.—I have had something like praise to-day, and hope that I shall not think too much of it, for it is my feeling, if I am praised, to never do so well again. I thought that the reason was, that I had never given the praise to God, as I ought to have done.

16th.—I have not got along very well in my school to-day. Neither do I know what the matter is with myself, but I think I have trusted too much to my own powers. The passage of Scripture which says, "Let him who thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall," has often come into my mind during the day, but I did not rightly notice its warning voice, so I feel as though I have done very wrong.

19th.—My birthday. I am seventeen years old. I do not know that I have improved much in anything.

Sixth Month 4th.—It is a stormy day, and I have got to school rather early, so will employ my time in writing. I think I do not give satisfaction to the parents, and do not know what the cause is. I think I have tried a great deal, but suppose they think I do not learn them enough. It is a bad feeling to think you cannot satisfy when you try, but it is my own fault, and I will try more. I wish I could do as well as the teacher did last summer.

Seventh Month 3rd.—I have had but five scholars to-day. Had a call from the superintendent. He gave me a license to teach in any school in the county of Burlington. He examined me a little, but not much. Am glad to get my license, and think he is very kind to come to me as he did.

15th.—My school has increased to fifteen, and I get along very well with it.

1849. Fifth Month 21st.—(Parkersville, Pa.) Time rolls on. I find I have not written in this, my journal, to tell anything of myself for more than one year. I have passed through much and learned much since then. The Lord has been graciously pleased to visit my soul. The first that I felt of his quickening presence was in a meeting at Burlington, while I was teaching school at Cinnaminson.

Stephen Grellet, formerly of France, was the person whose ministry first brought me to a conviction that it was required of me to put away my gay attire, put on plain clothes, and become a Friend again, for I had strayed far from the paths of peace and from the simplicity of Friends.

I do sincerely desire that thou, oh Lord, should carry on the work which thou hast commenced, and make me every whit clean, and let me be thy dear child. Oh Lord, be pleased to incline my heart to serve thee always. Be pleased to let me again see Stephen Grellet, and let him feel peace for serving thee (for) thus awakening me to my helpless state.

After finishing a comfortable summer at Cinnaminson, I returned home, wishing to take another school if one could be found for me. In this the Lord was pleased to direct me and provide a place for me at a time when I least expected it and least deserved his mercy. I could but see it was the Lord that had overruled all things and made all things work together for my good. Oh, how should I praise the Lord for all his goodness to me. How ought I to serve Him continually. But I do not. Oh, look upon me, make thy fire to burn in my heart, and quench all sin within me. Consider my afflictions from sin, and make me every whit clean through thy adorable mercy to a poor sinner. Bow my soul in humble gratitude to thee and to Jesus Christ, my Saviour.

I have spent a very pleasant winter with Samuel and Hannah Bolton as teacher of their children. Long shall I remember their kindness to me while there, and at my departure. Oh Lord, be pleased to bless their endeavors to do right, and prosper them, if it is thy holy will. I love them all as well as when I left their home with their assurance of love for me.

For about one year I was desirous of becoming a scholar at Westtown, knowing that I needed more education if I intended to follow teaching, and also feeling that was the place into which I could go to learn God's will concerning me and to cast off my gay clothing, for I had now begun to feel that my gay apparel was like a black sheep on my back. I was really ashamed to be seen with it in the presence of any whom I considered the children of God. It seemed to me that they all knew that I was disobeying my Heavenly Father. At last I was permitted to enter those walls, and put one year there learning of my wicked nature and of that God who had so graciously called me.

Though I was diligent in my studies and learned them well, improving as much as could be expected, yet the value of my Westtown days depended chiefly on my instruction in his holy will. I had many kind friends while there, but one of the teachers in particular always seemed to know my thoughts and understand my actions. I do love her very much. She has been instrumental in procuring this Parkersville situation for me. I do not feel that she can ever be paid, but may she be made happy with the feeling that she has been of lasting service to me.*

Fourth Month 23rd.—Commenced school in Parkersville. May I have strength to persevere in the right. I feel as though I could not teach all the branches intended.

Fifth Month 27th.—It seems as if I should succeed if I keep under a quiet, waiting spirit upon God.

Ninth Month 20th.—A quiet day. Hope I may learn righteousness.

21st.—I got along better. It is my Heavenly Father alone who helps me thus to do. God does draw my heart nearer and nearer to Him, and enables me to take up my cross. Oh, Lord, be thou the potter and I the clay. Carry on thy work in my heart.

Tenth Month 10th.—John Parker and Phoebe Carpenter married, Birmingham. Had no school.

Eleventh Month 1st.—Brother Silas was married to Rebecca Price.

3rd.—Came to Westtown. Grateful I ought to be.

From 3rd to 14th.—All silent and quiet. Poor wicked I. God is good to me and makes me feel my sins. Teachers Sarah Bailey and Elizabeth Walter went to Monthly Meeting. The girls were very not still in school. A silent meeting, but good things came into mind. How I sin by not being obedient. I ought to try to be more willing to take up the cross. David Cope spoke in meeting on the eleventh. I must take up the cross of Christ. My Heavenly Father is drawing me with his love.

15th.—I have not tried rightly to-day. Oh, that I could continually yield meek and humble obedience to all my Heavenly Father commands.

19th.—New teacher, Rebecca Bidle, and new assistant, S. Howell, came on Seventh-day.

26th.—Felt sadly from misconduct of the girls. How I ought to watch.

Twelfth Month 1st.—First day of winter. Clear, mild day, like the Lamb.

2nd.—A silent meeting. Could not get humble enough to do rightly.

3rd.—Teacher asked me to take the reading school. Hard task for humility.

4th.—Yesterday I talked with teacher E——, and since then am getting naughty. Am losing my good feelings. I hardly know why.

6th.—Meeting quiet. Sallie Howell taken with hemorrhage of the lungs. I go astray from my God because of my disobedience.

8th.—The committee came out to-day. I am anxiously looking for good.

9th.—My God followeth me with mercies, and is willing to receive me, though often departing from Him as the prodigal. Bless his holy name, oh, my soul; be obedient. Oh, Holy Father, help me to obey.

13th.—A silent meeting. It seems to me that the cross is put upon me. My Heavenly Father is good to my soul. Magnify Him.

1850 First Month 1st.—May I become this year more devoted to God and serve Him.

* Believed to be Elizabeth Walter Hoopes.

2nd.—Teachers E. R. and Margaret are going to attend Susan Lightfoot's wedding.

12th.—Teacher E.—'s parents and sister here. My heart wished I could be as good as he (William Walter) and do right.

15th.—This morning, as I rose from my bed, these words came to me, "Praises to his holy name, He will lead the way." But I was not obedient after this precious promise.

19th.—I often turn my thoughts to God, but cannot turn them rightly without help.

20th.—E. Evans and H. Wood, S. Morris and daughter were here. E. Evans spoke to me. How grateful I ought to be to my Heavenly Father, but believe I am not. I want sincerely to be thine, oh, Holy Father, but I am so wicked sin follows me. My thoughts are all sin and wrong. I must try.

24th.—Silent meeting, but my Heavenly Father is good to me to tell me what I ought to do in case of (some) reading.

1850. Second Mo. 3.—I have had such peace, but I have been afraid it is not for me to have.

8th.—I am afraid I am going all wrong. Pride seems to cover me instead of humility. I have been led to see that I know nothing of myself. When will my proud, my wicked heart get right?

17th.—Committee here. William Evans spoke to us. It has been shown me, one great thing that I have desired to know—what is required.

21st.—Death of one of our school-mates, Sarah M. Brown, diseased brain.

22nd.—Quarterly Meeting. Dear teachers, E. W. and M. H. went with the corpse.

24th.—Sometimes now I am afraid I was not so faithful last summer as I could have been if I had been more attentive and obedient to my Divine Teacher. May I be brought low, very low, even to nothing. Even now I am not giving my heart to God.

27th.—I have been very, very bad. I have spoken to Cyrus (Mendenhall, clerk) very perfly.

Third Month 1st.—First day of spring. May I be better. Not fruitful.

10th.—David Cope here. Spoke under great exercise. It came to me.

12th.—Oh, now that I know the way for me, I am not walking in it, I am going wrong, I do not obey (I believe) in being watchful.

14th.—Silent meeting, but I was drawn into communion.

17th.—I have not sought the Lord this day, I fear, as I ought. Silent meeting.

18th.—I feel to-night dependent alone upon my Heavenly Father. Oh, I am going contrary to what is right. Why do I?

21st.—I hardly know whether I was good or not. I am afraid not. Teacher asked me a question which it was hard to answer.

31st.—Hannah Warner spoke. May I be grateful for all. I will try to wait more and more upon the Lord, for "they that wait upon Him shall renew their strength." I have need of strength to help me to do aright.

Having been appointed to teach at Parkersville, she says:

Fourth Month 24th.—Commenced school at Parkersville. May I be kept in fear all summer, and not be lifted up. Oh, Holy Father, help me and teach me thy holy will, what I must do or not do; make me obedient.

28th.—I wore a plain bonnet to-day the first. Oh, Holy Father, lead me, teach me, be my Father if it please thy holy will.

Fifth Month 1st.—How glad I am, and how thankful I ought to be that little Johnnie (one of her pupils) did not get hurt at school, instead of at home. Committee here. Thank thee for their kindness, May I be faithful; make me so.

4th.—Thank thee, oh, Holy Father, for directing me. It does seem to me thou didst lead me, draw me to thee.

8th.—School full, forty-four. May I be taught and enabled to keep a sober, serious countenance. I do want to do it.

13th.—More pleasant school. May I be grateful to my Holy Father.

24th.—Quarterly Meeting. A good time. How I have been encouraged to think the Holy Father will help me to be faithful to my charge. (To be continued.)

WARRE, KANSAS, SEVENTH MONTH 5th, 1850.

Dear Editors and Friends:—No doubt many of our Pennsylvania friends are wondering what has become of the six or seven hundred weight of goods they so kindly sent to Kansas for the "flood sufferers" last spring. Well, at last we can acknowledge the goods have really come into the possession of those to whom addressed, but not until after repeated appeals to the railroad company from East St. Louis to this place, as it was free only to East St. Louis, but finally our general agent, Fletcher, at Kansas City, read our card forwarded to him, and he then notified us that he would have the goods cancelled, and so he did, and since that time we have been very busily engaged in allotting to each of the families of the more needy ones what was most needed and most suitable, as some do not seem to know how to be as careful of fine clothes as others. We gave to the former the most substantial, while to the latter who will take good care we have handed out the nicer garments (though not so many), and took care not to forget the "food for the mind," namely, the nice lot of books and tracts which came in the box of clothes, and almost as important was that plentiful supply of our kind "Elkinton Bros." and "Peun Soap," which came in very opportunely, as our sufferers do not always suffer from the overplus of good, clean water, and in such cases the soap is very useful indeed, and was gratefully received, and we hope its cleansing influence will be felt here, causing some to look more neat and cleanly.

One poor colored man, as he trudged off with his donation, after offering his "thousand thanks," came back and said, "Tell them kind people I have never seen them, and never may, but I hope I may meet them in heaven." Another said, "Oh, if them good folks only knew the good they have done to us, and how thankful we feel, it would do them good. Thank them for me, for I cannot write to them. Still another poor flood sufferer, who is of a religious character (though once the reverse), said, "I have nothing to repay this kindness with but my daily prayers, and in that way I shall always remember the ones who gave to us, and my prayers shall follow them." Another said, "The Friends are the only denomination who have ever given me a helping hand in trouble, and they are friends indeed." We might enumerate others, but it would make our acknowledgment of your kindness too lengthy to be of interest. Suffice it to say all (so far) seem very grateful indeed, and many who are not Friends, express their surprise and gratitude that you should for one moment remember them, in this benevolent way, whom you have never seen. But we still have another class, whom we have to deal with in quite a different way, namely, those would-be-needy ones, who are always ready (where there is something to be had for nothing), as a call at our door has just proven. To these we call to be a little reserved.

Among some here who want some of the articles, and are willing to give an equivalent in worth back in other suits, we have traded in two cases, and then given the latter to those less careful, and to whom good but coarser garments seemed more suitable, but more of them for the above. And the bonnets, as well as some of the plainer goods, will be placed among some of the more needy of Friends, especially shawls and some coats and wraps. The goods have been put into bundles and names put thereon, using each as nearly according to their needs as our knowledge of their necessities demanded. Some have gone out and some yet remain to be sent out as soon as opportunity admits.

And now, with many thanks, both to your ever ready collectors and yourselves, from all whom you so kindly benefited, not only after the last fall's flood, but also this spring's flood, we now close, and hope all may prove satisfactory to both donors and receivers.

M. A. STEVENSON.

The Dangers of a Supported Pastoral System.

WM. C. ALLEN.

A general view of the present condition of the Society of Friends reveals some extraordinary lapses, one of the most conspicuous of which is here referred to.

The writer has never met ministers within the Society of Friends, among those who receive pecuniary compensation for their services, but who, when pressed for a candid opinion, confess that they do not fully approve of a paid pastoral system. They acknowledge that it does not meet the high ideal furnished by Christ, and advocated by the early Friends. They admit the dangers to spiritual growth that are connected with it, yet say they see no other course to pursue than to adopt such a method. It has fastened its teeth into the body and cannot be well removed. So they accept it as frequently not of their own choice, yet to their minds as something unavoidable.

A great sympathy is to be felt for those Friends who believe themselves called into the ministry, and who have very little of this world's goods wherewith to support their families. The little ones must be fed and clothed; a reasonably presentable appearance is properly desirable; and the sharp struggle to meet obligations has to be maintained. In the midst of all this stress comes a mental wear and tear which may lead to the assumption that if Christ calls into his ministry, he may permit a livelihood to come from the offerings of those who are the recipients of spiritual labor.

This belief, although natural, is fraught with danger. The minute a minister becomes installed as a pastor and receives pay therefor, that moment he loses some of his freedom in the Gospel. He may or may not be tempted to guard his utterances lest he wound the feelings of those from whom he learns to expect his living. Anyhow he is handicapped with that temptation, as compared with the preacher who is not supported.

Again, he is threatened with the loss of one of the most valuable attributes, which can adorn a really anointed preacher of Jesus. In the very nature of things he can never know many of the daily temptations which are the common lot of nine-tenths of those to whom he ministers. He can never fully realize the daily discouragement nents which confront those, who unlike himself, are obliged to struggle in a sometimes pitiable world, for the very necessities of life. Being assured of even a limited income, he is in danger of dismissing from his mind a full sense of his daily dependence and of the unquestionably close association that exists between material and spiritual things. He is less likely to fully sympathize with those with whom he has to deal. On the other hand, if employed in the ordinary avocations of life, he will be more qualified to enter into the joys and sorrows and practical Christian experiences of those who love the Lord, but who have many temporal anxieties to contend with. The alternate hopes and fears, the woe-dement, the cry "why is it so, why is it so?" are all better known and more tenderly dealt with by those ministers, who themselves pass through the fires which are frequently intended to burn out the impurities that mar God's better plans.

There is another danger. The moment a minister is supported, he is required to put all his time into church work; indeed he is generally recompensed with the distinct understanding that he does so. But what is the result?

Experience shows that under such circumstances he is always expected to preach. In fact, his part of the contract would generally not be fulfilled if he did not. The flock would consider it very strange if he did nothing for them at the hour of worship. Accordingly a regular course of exercises is arranged and depended upon. Hymns are often selected before the time of service. After awhile the best singers are selected and so are virtually constituted into a choir. A pulpit, symbolic of a one-man ministry, taking the place of the raised seats for officers of the meeting. The supported pastor now conducts the marriage ceremony and arrogates to himself the function of pronouncing Friends man and wife; so tending to lower in the view of some the correct legal status of other Friends who cannot comply with such interference with our ancient and beautiful custom. A sermon and its subject is frequently decided upon before hand. Christ as the great effective source of matter and utterance is practically forgotten. The intellectual part is naturally pushed to the front, and the spiritual is correspondingly passed to the rear. A collection in the middle of the services seems to be introduced into such congregations, as easily as night follows day. How often have I seen the solemnity of such occasions marred by a good brother, who in his desire to keep in touch with his flock, has descended to witticism in hopes of doing so. As the supported ministers are expected to preach whether they feel any direct call or not, their words often lack the force, the intuition, and the tendering power which always comes from that man or woman who is Divinely inspired from one season to another by God alone.

But if a supported pastorate weakens the minister, the effect on the congregation is still more perceptible. Forcing the religious activities largely on one individual, takes from the congregation a sense of its collective responsibility. One man taking the lead and being expected to do so, tends to create an unfortunate subservency to his teachings and actions on the part of the flock. Watchfulness over one another for good is relinquished as being the work of the pastor. Individual gifts are neglected. For instance, those upon whom God may have conferred the gift of the ministry, frequently cannot exercise it, except in a secondary manner at the conclusion of the services. So in a modern Friends' meeting, the anomalous position may be reached of a pastor speaking when at that time really not authorized to do so; and upon the same occasion another Friend, within whom the Divine message has been kindled being unable to deliver it to the people. The grand ecclesiastical democracy which Fox proclaimed is shaken to its centre, and the inevitable tendency is a division into clergy and laity.

Again, it is observable that the wealthy city congregations practically secure the services of the brighter and more scholarly ministers, whilst poor meetings are obliged to content themselves with what they can get. The spiritual and natural gifts are unequally distributed; and ministers are tempted to work not just in places that the Head of the Church may designate, but as they are influenced by the pecuniary rewards that are proffered them.

Some confess all these disadvantages, but claim that they must be overlooked in order to build up Friends' meetings. Is this position tenable? Shall we lower a high standard of Christian practice, hoping thereby that good will come?

Some of these dear Friends may ask, what shall we do when we give our labor to the Church, and receive no income therefrom? How about our little families? To such the reply may be made, trust God for all that. Those who are paid very little can easily give that little up, and obtain an income from other sources by the exercise of physical or mental labor of a secular character. Those who receive larger support will doubtless find that if from conscientious motives they refuse pay for their ministry they too, will in no wise suffer. There have been not a few notable instances of just such experiences, on the part of salaried pastors, who gave up their incomes when becoming converts to the doctrines held by Friends. Such, as did Paul, can work with their own hands, and God is able to bless them therein. When abroad, they can from Scriptural precedent, accept the free-will offerings of their Friends, and still keep within the lines drawn by Christ and his apostles. I have yet to read of a single instance in all Quaker history where an unpaid preacher has come to want. Divinity never formed a law, and then created circumstances making it impossible for that law to be obeyed. So, it has ever seemed that those ministers, who in faith freely preached the Gospel which had been freely given them were always granted all needful things by Him in whom their confidence was placed.

Some argue that they receive such small support that it amounts to very little anyhow. But do not these generally take all they can get? If they only receive fifty dollars per year, is that not enough to balk a previously honored testimony? Does not taking even small gifts tend to encourage receiving larger recompense elsewhere? Why then should they close their hands over one dollar, unless given for needful support when travelling abroad in the service of their Master?

Let us not then call all paid preachers "hirelings." That is a term not to be applied to men, many of whom are earnest laborers in the great vineyard of the Lord. Neither let us go to the extreme of refusing any necessary assistance to ministers, when rightly called into God's service. I believe the present tendency toward salaried pastorates, is in some places a reaction from the absence of proper aid, which has too often been observable in the past. But let us not permit this reaction to lead into forgetfulness of the fact that a free Gospel ministry was recommended by Christ, confirmed by the apostles, and practised by the early Friends. Let us recollect that Paul, after all his learning and culture acquired in Gamaliel's school, worked at a trade as he travelled from city to city. Quaker literature reveals the same procedure on the part of many of the most effective preachers in the early days of the Society.

A belief exists that the paid pastors the early Friends so vigorously denounced, were different kind of men from many of the salaried preachers of our own day. Unquestionably not a few of the clergy of the established Church two hundred years ago, were notoriously unfitted for the office they sought to fill. But does that change the principle involved, when comparing conditions between then and now? It is true, that upon specific occasions Friends reproved some of the clergy for their doings. But we find that it was the system they most earnestly contended with. They condemned the system, largely on the ground that Christ declared that the Gospel was to be freely proclaimed. But even ignoring this basic principle, are conditions now so very different from what they were two hundred years ago? Then there were both spiritually minded, and mercenary men, among supported ministers; so are there now. Then some undoubtedly won people to the Lord Jesus, whilst others manifestly had no qualifications to do so; such is the case to-day. Then some worked to save souls, whilst others made the ministry a source of personal profit and preferment; modern paid pastors are found in both categories. We are bound to believe that the same evils, flowing from the same system, are all about us in this year 1896. Christ's Gospel should be just as undefiled now as in the seventeenth century; and the system which was then subject to certain dangers is open to the same abuse to-day.

The rise of the Society of Friends exhibited the undisputed fact that it was possible for a religious organization to increase membership without the aid of supported pastors. It is just as practicable to-day; but not where there are superficial seekers after the truth. It is only possible where men and women are struggling out after the revealed and heaven-sent light which is so much better than the spiritual apathy and darkness that surrounds them. It is only possible to those who want to discard a vengeful religion, and cast aside everything like sacerdotalism in their effort to learn the mind of God direct from himself. These longings were conspicuous in the early Friends. When we as a people once more become so minded, we too will cease retrograding towards the formality from which our fathers counted themselves so happy to be delivered.

There are people all about us who are hungering for better spiritual food than a superficial Christianity can offer. Unfortunately many of these seekers after the Truth regard the great mass of church work as a scheme to attract and which is patronized largely for its social and temporal advantages. They do not attend the usual places of worship, excusing themselves by saying that they cannot financially afford to do so; or because most salaried pastors and prearranged services do not touch their religious sensibilities. Especially in the western country this class predominates. Too frequently these people eventually drift into agnosticism, or acquire a contempt for things Divine.

The unpaid minister is the best calculated to win them to Christ. It seems to them that an unpaid preacher has small incentive to advance his personal interests. They feel that what he has to say must come from deep heart-felt conviction. Accordingly they are ready to listen to him. His power to influence them is unquestioned and almost beyond human computation. Convince a doubter of your sincerity and half his mind and heart are won. So those Friends who ignore their birth-right and who enter the broad fields where paid workers toil, little realize that a still greater and more tillable ground is being forsaken at their very doors.

There is need that one denomination still loyally adhere to the doctrines of the early Friends. It will not do to say that the time and need for maintaining old-fashioned Quaker views have gone by. Rather let us look beyond such reasoning up to the higher realms of duty, and to a perfect adherence to the unmixed design of God! I would that in this as in other things we might again plant our banner on the upper heights where our fathers unfurled it to the world. If every regularly supported minister within our borders would in living faith re-adopt the apostolic and ancient Quaker practice, what a noble object would our sect present? One hundred thousand Friends in America without a paid pastor, would be a tremendous aid to all Christendom in helping it toward the pure faith and perfect Gospel freedom that its Saviour taught!

At Kennet Square John Heald was led to minister to those who he believed were religiously disposed, tender in spirit, and of honest intentions, but whose companions were disposed to draw them into bad habits and a dissipated course. These, when turned out of the right way, had felt sorrow, and had resolved to do better in the future; but by giving way to temptation, they had become weaker and weaker, and were in great danger of giving out wholly. The meeting proved to be a solid and tendering season.

If this simple record should meet the eyes of any whose consciences testify that they are in like condition, yielding from time to time to the power of temptation, or to the persuasions of companions or friends, whose influence leads them away from the safe path of self-denial and watchful obedience to the voice of God in their hearts, even though they be not led into gross evils or the vices of dissipation, may all such be persuaded to turn with full purpose of heart to the Lord, their Redeemer, and faithfully follow the leadings of his Spirit. Why should their souls be starved for want of spiritual sustenance, when in the Father's house there is bread enough and to spare. Why should they pass through life uneasy in mind, and often self-condemned, when they might partake of that heavenly peace and comfort dispensed at times for the refreshment of the flock of Christ, and be animated with the glorious hope of partaking in that joy unspeakable and full of glory, which is set before us as the prize at the end of the race?

HEREIN lies the fundamental difference between the spiritual religion and that which depends on forms and performances which man can enter upon and undertake in his own power. He who would grow in grace and in that knowledge which leads to eternal life, must patiently and diligently wait on the Lord in his own heart, and faithfully follow in the way that He leads.

NOW.

A night of danger on the sea.
Oleanness and foulness and Wave after wave comes thundering
Against the strong stone pier;
Each with a terrible recoil,
And a grim and gathering might,
As blast on blast comes howling past,
Eager and ever wilder than the east,
All through that awful night.
Well for the ships in the harbor now,
Which came with the morning tide;
With unstrained cable and anchor sure,
How quietly they ride!
Well for the bark that heeled at eve,
That watched with breathless fear;
It was sheltered first ere the tempest burst,
It is safe inside the pier!
But see! a faint and fitful light,
Out on the howling sea!
'Tis a vessel that seeks the harbor mouth,
Is in death agony.
Though the strong stone shores are open wide,
She has missed the only way;
'Tis all too late for the storm drives fast,
The mighty waves bend her to her past,
And against that sheltering pier shall cast
Their wrecked and shattered prey.
Nearer and nearer the bark is borne,
As over the deck they dash,
Where sailors five are clinging fast
To the sailless stump of the broken mast,
Awaiting the final crash.
Is it all too late? is there succor yet?
Those perishing men to reach?
Life is so near on the firm built pier,
That else must be death to each.

There are daring hearts and powerful arms,
And swift and steady feet,
And they rush as down to a yawning grave,
In the strong recoil of the mightiest wave,
Treading that awful path to save
Who they trust to homeward street.
Over the howlers and foam they rush
Into the gashly hollow;
They fling the rope to the heaving wreck,
The aim was sure and it strikes the deck,
As the shouts of quick help follow.
Reached, but not saved, here is more to do,
A trumpet note is heard!
And over the rage and over the roar
Of billow thunders on the shore,
Rings out the guiding word.
There is one chance, and only one—
All can be saved; but how?
"The strong and stout arms!" the mast
"At the trumpet-signal, 'NOW'!"

There is a moment when the sea
Has spent its furious strength—
A shuddering pause with a sudden swirl,
Gathering force to come again to hurl
Billow on billow in whirl on whirl;
That moment comes at length:
With a single shout the "NOW" peals out,
And the answering leap is made,
Well for the simple hearts that just Loosing the mast with fearless trust
The strange command obey!
For the rope is good and the stout arms pull
Ere the brief storm-hill is o'er;
It is but a swift and blinding sweep
Through the waters, wild and dark and deep,
And the men are safe on shore—
Safe! though the fiercest of the deep pursue—
Safe! though the waves dash high;
But the ringing cheer that rises clear
Is pierced with a sudden cry:
"There are but four drawn up to shore,
And five were on the deck!"
And the straining gear that conquers gloom
Still traces, drifting on to doom,
One man upon the wreck.

Again they chase in sternest race
The far-recoiling wave,
The rope is thrown to the losing mark,
But reaches not in the watery dark.
The one they strive to save,
Again they rush, and again they fail,
Again, and yet again:

SELECTED.

The storm yields back defiance loud,
The breakers rear a rampart proud,
And roar, "I win, in vain!"
Then a giant wave caught up the wreck,
And bore it on its crest;
One moment it hung quivering there
In horrible arabesque.
And the lonely man on the savage sea
A lightning flash up,
Still clinging fast to the broken mast
That he had not dared to quit,
Then horror of dark darkness fell,
While eyes flashed inward fire,
And over all the roar and dash,
Through the great blackness came a crash,
A token sure of dire.
The wave had burst upon the pier,
The wreck was scattered wide,
Another "NOW" would never reach
The corpse that lay upon the beach
With the receding tide.

Susanna Fayle.

The decease of this dear Friend having recently occurred, the following memoranda of her visit to this country, kindly furnished by one who had been interested in her movements, it is believed will be acceptable to many. The circumstances attending her death and funeral are related in greater detail than usual; but as she was unexpectedly removed, and far from her native land, this will probably be interesting to her friends and relatives.—Ed.]

Susanna Fayle (age about sixty-eight), was the daughter of Samuel and Ellen Fayle, of Ireland, who were Friends of consistency and good standing.

She came to Philadelphia on a religious visit about the first of Fourth Month, 1896 (this being her second visit), with a certificate from her meetings in Ireland, liberating her for religious service in the limits of Philadelphia and New York Yearly Meetings. It was the general impression that her work was likely to be pretty much confined to the cities of Philadelphia and New York.

I met with her a few times at Samuel Emlen's, who had invited her to make her home at his house, and suggested to her visiting one or two invalids, which she did. She spent a day with Elizabeth Russell, with whom she had been acquainted many years, as they were school girls together.

The first meeting after her arrival that I remember being with her, was at Twelfth St., of a week-day evening, when she was engaged in a petition to the Saviour in a way that was acceptable to me, being as satisfactorily expressed as any petition of the kind that I remember. She was at our Yearly Meeting, and in the Meeting of Ministers and Elders on Seventh-day, sympathy and unity with her was expressed, and she encouraged to pursue her prospect. Prior to this, however, she opened in the Western District Monthly Meeting a prospect to visit some of the families of that meeting, of those more in the central part of the city, and as she mentioned in the men's meetings that it was those in the city that she wished to visit, the question was asked, had not the minute letter be worded so as to allow of her visiting those members that did not live in the city, but she said No.

It appeared to be her design to do what she could at visiting before New York Yearly Meeting, and then return to Philadelphia from New York after accomplishing what might be done there. She was asked if it might be minuted that she would take up the work of visiting in he fall, she replied, she could not see as far as he fall.

After she was taken sick, she spoke as if it was about as much as she expected if she could attend a session or two of the sittings of New York Yearly Meeting. Since her death her cousin Emma Fayle told me that Susanna told her that she did not expect to attend New York Yearly Meeting, but several times during her sickness expressed the desire that she could attend a meeting or two in New York. There is good reason to believe, that it was not only the meetings of Friends to which she was drawn, out to work of a more public character, or to the authorities of the city of New York.

On the First-day morning of our Yearly Meeting week, she was at meeting at Orange Street, and she spoke on the crucifixion in a way that I had hardly ever heard before, and the jury arose on this occasion, "Is she preaching her funeral sermon?"

At our Quarterly Meeting in the Fifth Mo., he spoke, although in so weak a condition that it seemed a very great strain upon her, so much so that I felt I could say to her, This is too much for thee, thy strength is not sufficient for it. I felt she was most certainly injuring herself, and it could only be by Divine interposition if she did not break down altogether. The subject matter of her discourse was very remarkable. It seemed to embrace the affairs of the nation, or as if she was speaking to the people at large on the state of the country, desiring that sectional lines should not be viewed with feelings of prejudice, but evidently aiming that the peaceable nature of the Redeemer's Kingdom should be advocated.

I have been told that she did not have a great deal to say in the Women's Yearly Meeting, but in the Women's Quarterly Meeting, she spoke impressively. It was not long after his that she was taken sick with bronchitis, and very much lost her voice. Dr. Rhoads telling me that she closely bordered on pneumonia, and since her death I have understood that the doctor said that one of her lungs had never entirely healed, and yet both Dr. Rhoads and Dr. Cheaves of Mt. Pocono said that they did not discover that there was anything wrong with her heart, but the unexpected death leads them now to think that the immediate cause of her death was disease of the heart in some form or other.

A trained nurse was employed for four weeks, and she got so that she rode out a time or two, but not to as good results as was hoped for. She having several times expressed the belief that she would not see her home again, made Sarah Emilen feel all the more like having the responsibility shared, and they sent a message by cable to Emma Fayle that they wanted her to come and take up the nursing of her cousin Susanna.

I understood from Emma that she and Susanna had lived together for thirty years. Emma made herself ready in about twenty-four hours, and took the steamer, arriving in Philadelphia about the sixth of Sixth Month, and was at Samuel Emilen's about four weeks when the doctor advised Susanna being taken to the mountains as likely to be beneficial. The physician went with her on the third of Seventh Month, and report was made, that although S. Fayle was very tired on arrival, she yet on the whole was doing well. She, however, did not get down stairs for a week from the time of her arrival at her boarding-house.

On the night of the eighth inst., she suffered much, but was down-stairs and on the porch on the tenth, and slept much better than usual on the succeeding night. On the morning of the eleventh inst., her cousin remarked to her that she had done so nicely during the night that she ought to get along pretty well. She responded, "She did not feel very nice." She however, got down-stairs and staid on the porch until about twelve o'clock, when she made her way up-stairs very slowly and seemed in great discomfort; the doctor was sent for, who delayed coming, although telephoned for several times during the afternoon; it was thought the telephone did not work, and the doctor did not get there until some time after the death of Susanna Fayle, perhaps an hour or more.

After S. F. went up-stairs and took her bed, although they were so concerned that they were very anxious to have the doctor, yet she was not so prostrate but that she had her cousin Emma to read to her, and after a time told her she had better get down-stairs and turn round and take the air, and Emma did so; but not feeling easy in her mind she returned without much stay, and was seated at the window about fifteen minutes and Susanna talking to her whilst she was sitting there. She heard a noise that seemed strange to her, and looked around and saw S. F.'s eyes were set, although they seemed bright (I suppose it was the death rattle that she heard). Emma hurried down-stairs to get assistance, and returning immediately with one of the household, saw there was a dark settling under the eyes, and the lips purple. They took what means their knowledge or ability enabled them to do, but without avail, and Susanna passed away about twenty minutes after four o'clock.

Emma Fayle knowing that Samuel and Sarah Emilen expected to be away from home, telegraphed to Dr. Rhoads, "Susanna Fayle passed away this afternoon; advise me." He took the telegram to Samuel Emilen, who with his wife had returned home sooner than they expected. Samuel, after spending two hours without avail in endeavoring to find how he could get a passage to Mt. Pocono, sent a telegram to Emma Fayle "No train to-morrow; will go Second-day, nine A. M. train. I suggest embalming the body and sending it to Germantown Junction (Care of Nice & Kirk, undertakers)."

This telegram, however, did not reach Emma Fayle until seventeen hours had passed over, during which time a telegram was received by Samuel Emilen, "A Funeral Second-day afternoon, three o'clock." Samuel sent me a message conveying the information of the message received from Emma Fayle.

I went in the evening to Samuel Emilen's, who still had not heard anything new. I told him that Ephraim Smith had expressed a willingness to go with him on the morrow to Mt. Pocono if it would be any comfort or satisfaction to him, which I was also willing to do, and Richard Cadbury expressed the same, and Samuel and Sarah Emilen felt that it would be satisfaction to them, as they might want to advise us, for the knowledge of the actual condition or arrangement concerning the funeral was quite vague.

About an hour after I left S. E.'s, he told me the next day that he received a telegram from Emma Fayle that Susanna Fayle desired to be buried where she died, and that the funeral would be Second-day afternoon.

Seventh Month 13th. Ephraim Smith, Richard Cadbury and myself took the nine A. M. train, and were joined by Samuel and Sarah Emilen, and their daughter Sarah Emilen Moore, at Germantown Junction. On the way Samuel remarked that he did not see how any person could throughout a two month's sickness be more sweet and pleasant in spirit, and her remarks were very bright. He had told me before that his wife and Susanna Fayle loved each other very much.

On arrival at Mt. Pocono a carriage was in waiting to take us to the cottage of Francis, Mary and Margaret Dorsey, where our departed Friend finished her course.

We were shown into the room where the corpse lay, and there was a sweet and pleasant expression of countenance, and the leave-taking of the corpse was a season of solemnity. After a few remarks had been made, Samuel Emilen knelt in prayer and expressed himself in a way that I was very willing for Emma Fayle to hear. He craved for her the Divine presence and support, as she returned across the great deep to her friends in Ireland, and also expressed thankfulness for the comfort in the belief that the dear departed one had gone to a better inheritance. Those in the room were Samuel and Sarah Emilen and their daughter, Ephraim Smith, Richard Cadbury, Frances Dorsey and myself; we remained together there until I thought it was timely for those of us to retire who were not needed to put the corpse in the coffin, which at the time we were in the room had not been done, it not being the practice as I understood it in Ireland to have the coffin open after the corpse had been put in and then it is closed.

The opportunity in the chamber was a solemn and satisfactory one. When the undertaker came with the coffin the body was taken from the bed on which it lay and placed in it and taken to the hearse. One who assisted told me that it was time it was moved, and whatever we might have wished for in a different management, the only thing left after our arrival was to have the body interred without further unnecessary delay.

Richard Cadbury, Ephraim Smith and Sarah Emilen Moore felt obliged to return to Philadelphia, which foreclosed them going to the place of interment. Emma Fayle, Samuel and Sarah Emilen, Frances Dorsey and myself followed the hearse in a six-seated carriage with a driver, the undertaker riding with the driver on the hearse. The road was good and part way through the woods some three or four miles to the burying ground called the Monroe Cemetery in the township, as I was told of Paradise Park in Monroe County. We had a sweet and peaceful feeling as we rode along, and at the graveside I expressed myself that I was very willing that the bereaved relative should inform her friends at home that such was the feeling of those who were present at the burial.

Some remarks were made on the comfort some could have in that they had been endeavoring to do their work in its time and season, for we had not a few examples that our time was limited, and often more so than we were wont to think, or to that import. The little company stood around the grave about as long as seemed best, the ground a little damp, and the weather close, and we retired.

Returning to Mt. Pocono S. and S. Emilen and myself stayed there over night, and next day we proceeded together as far as Manunka Chunk with Emma Fayle, whose mind was set on returning to Ireland on Fourth-day's steamer. Samuel Emilen had asked her if she did not feel like staying awhile, but she felt decided, and I encouraged S. Emilen not to insist, for I thought she might reach her home with her heart set on it, as it seemed to be, but if she turned aside there might be a reaction.

S. and S. E. went to their home at Germantown, and I proceeded on to New York with Emma Fayle, where we were met on arrival by Walter Moore, S. Emilen's son-in-law, who had made an arrangement with the steamship company for the return ticket of Susanna Fayle to be transferred, but we failed in obtaining permission for Emma to go on board that night. State room number eighty-five was secured, lodgings were taken at the Palace Hotel, nearly opposite the dock, and in the course of the afternoon I went out to see David S. Taber to tell him of the circumstances connected with the sickness and death of Susanna Fayle, in which he seemed much interested.

I asked David S. Taber to request some woman Friend to visit Emma Fayle at the hotel. Mary Kimber and one of the name of Simms, a daughter of David White, of North Carolina came, and one of them expressing a willingness to call in the morning to see Emma Fayle on board the steamer, and Walter Moore also expecting to be there an hour or more before the ship sailed, Emma said she did not feel it necessary for me to stay on her account, and I came home.

Southern Florida.

Going from Kissimmee to Ocala by the Southern or Plant system route, we pass through an interesting country. First: from here to Plant City we see a number of small towns, from the country in the vicinity of which are furnished large quantities of the winter vegetables and fruits, many carloads of which are shipped to the northern markets while the snow and frost still hold the earth around Philadelphia in its icy chains—especially strawberries, cabbage, tomatoes, etc. Celery also is getting to be quite a business. Floridians having lost their orange and lemon crops, have turned their attention more to diversified industries, while their citrus trees are growing again. There will be a very small crop this season, and if another freeze does not come, a good many next year, as trees around Kissimmee are growing finely.

After leaving Lakeland we go a northerly direction through Dunellon, etc., and then easterly to Ocala. This route takes us among many of the fine phosphate mines, and we see from the cars in passing along many large piles—I might almost say hills—of the precious fertilizer, which has been dug up and is now ready to be transported to distant markets, and much of it to foreign countries. As this is a large and important industry of great extent, I propose to speak more of it at another time. I wish to write to-day more particularly of the great springs which are found in South Florida.

One of the most beautiful, though by no means so large as some others, is the "Blue Spring" on this route, between Lakeland and Dunellon, rightly named from the fine tinge of greenish blue of its waters, though all of our large springs have more or less of the same hue.

One of these springs can be seen in passing up the St. John's River on steamboat—also called "Blue Springs." The largest I have ever seen is the "Silver Spring," northeast of Ocala, where such a vast quantity of water boils up in one place that it becomes a navigable river, and steamers formerly did ply, and I think they do still, from Palatka on the St. John's up this stream, called the Oklawaha River, and land their passengers right over the spring. Formerly these steamers ran up the river by night, and partly for the interest of their passengers, and partly to pilot their craft up the crooked stream, they kept a fire of pine knots burning on the deck on the bow of the boat, presenting in many places a wierd and picturesque scene. I believe electricity has now superseded this. In passing from Kissimmee northward there are a number of these large springs. About two miles from Apopka are the "Clay Springs"—very fine ones, and the surroundings are very interesting, which cause them to be much visited by picnic and bathing parties. Northeast of Apopka about seven miles are the "Palm Springs." Here are three large springs, all in a row, and within half a mile. These form a large stream and are the main source of the Wekiva River, which empties into the St. Johns. These are only a few of these wonderful fountains, spouting up from "the bowels of the earth," as it were. Sometimes in this country a stream is lost, and then after its subterranean passage appears again. Near Norristown below Conschocken is the "Spring Mill." Here, as they have abundance of fall, a mill is turned by this copious spring, but it is a small stream compared with those I have spoken of. It is in a limestone region, and the water through a long course of years has probably dissolved the lime rock and formed a passage for the stream. The great cave, the "Mammoth," of Kentucky, and many others are in the limestone, which is to some extent soluble in water, and the drippings from the roofs have formed those beautiful stalactites and stalagmites which are the wonder of visitors. In the same way we account for our larger springs. South Florida is underlain with lime rock, probably built up through the ages by those industrious little fellows, the coral insects.

When we sink our artesian wells, of which we have many in these parts, we come at last to the coral rock which is porous and contains abundance of water.

How wonderful are the works of the great Creator. How insignificant in comparison is man. "When I consider the heavens, the work of thy fingers," said the psalmist, "the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained, what is man that Thou art mindful of Him or the Son of man, that Thou visitest him." I. M.

A nice sense of honor in matters connected with money is very important. Polly is treasurer of the society and has the care of the funds. She must never for an instant, or in any emergency, lend these funds to other people, or borrow them for her own use. I knew a girl—Polly was her name, by-the-way—who was induced, being treasurer of a certain guild, to lend her brother, for one day, the money she had in her care. The brother was older than Polly, and a very persuasive person. He said: "Why should you hesitate? I'll bring it back to you to-night, and it will oblige me very much if I can take that fifty dollars and pay a bill I owe before noon to-day." Foolish Polly permitted her scruples to be over-ridden. The money was not brought back, and but for her father's kindness in making it good, she would have been disgraced as a dishonest treasurer. She told me long afterwards that the lesson had been burned in on her mind never to take liberties with money which she held in trust.—Harper's Round Table.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Submission of Soul to God the Fruitful Ground of Living Gospel Ministry.

The remarks in THE FRIEND upon William Tallock's paper in the Quarterly Examiner, has led me to pen what had place in my mind as the fruitful source of spiritual decay within our borders as a religious Society.

There have been in past days those in our midst whose growth and spiritual experience has had a leavening power upon and over their fellow members. Their introversion of soul bespoke itself in unmistakable ways as they came into contact with those about them, and their speech betokened knowledge in heavenly things that no intellectual capacity could impart, but was evidence of a Divine and inner nature that sprang from God. The superficial had little place with these, the fewness and fullness of their words betokened a mind centered and surrendered unto God. The sense of God filled the soul of such and constricted to utterance, however broken and feeble, to the praise and glory of the one great name and his redeeming power through Christ, and the refreshing of thirsty seeking souls, hungering for the Bread of Life. And as their ministry came from the stirring in them of the life of God, so did it tend to reach unto and raise up the like life in those who gathered about them. Life stirred life, and life begeth life.

Is it so now? Is there the same life-giving utterance, as an evidence of the truth of Holy Scripture, baptizing into the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, by the preaching of the Word from the Word of Life.

Apart from God there can be no true ministry of the World. The feeblest one in the flock and family of God yielding all up to Him and in obedience following Him, may become a blessing to very many. It is the sense of inability that prepares for the Master's use, and that leads to placing our all at his feet. And it is there we learn the lessons needed to be known to make meet for service in God's harvest field.

There is a sense of sadness comes over the mind in the thought of how some in one way and some in another have made ship-wreck of faith and a good conscience. Pride of heart whether it be by intellectual or material possessions that doth blind the eye of the mind and harden the heart toward God has in it a saddening thought, for what can the end be with such.

There is a faith that goes deeper than the surface, that has its dwelling place in God, even as it springs from Him. It is this faith I would fain draw all to, if such was in my power, even as I see in gathering of the same for my own soul.

I regret the disposition to build up or to feed a man-made ministry which, however it may please and gratify the natural or intellectual man, can never satisfy or help to sanctify an immortal soul.

I also regret the spiritual apathy that exists among us, and of which I have not unfrequently been made very sensible, and which often blocks up the stream of life and hinders its flowing from those whose spirit is burdened by the oppression of the power of evil prevailing over the spirits of their fellows.

What, it may be truly asked, will such do in the end who are triflers with the grace and goodness of God. There is a source of responsibility resting upon those in particular who are in the ront rank in Society, and who make a high profession, that they act not in and by their own spirit, but in and by the Spirit of the Lord. For as leaders of the people, if they stray away from God in their spirits how shall they be able to teach of his ways when they walk not in the path of the Spirit's leading. These lambs hasten not fed will be charged upon such who have taught but not by the Spirit of the Lord. I desire not to have the blood of any resting upon my head, and therefore in the fear of the Lord I thus write, whether ye will bear or shether ye will forebear that I may be clear. O ye shepherds of the flock oversee these in the fear of the Lord, and have a guard upon your own spirits that ye grieve not in yourselves or by another the Spirit of our God. He is gentle toward the feeble ones. How dearest thou with such? And merciful toward the erring ones. Art thou unforgiving? We have need to take heed to the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made us shepherds, and see that by his Spirit we do feed these his little ones.

I am pleading for the yielding of our all to God renewedly day by day, that we may be kept fresh and green in life. Not attempting to gather more than for our daily needs, but lay by day gathering as God would have us gather at his footstool in secret and in silence of soul before Him. A silence that embraces the very feet of Him that redeems and saves, and weets with the tear of love and contrition as one of old, the soul's beloved.

That we may become such as thus do praise and give thanks to God by the humble dedication of all to Him, will still be my prayer, and may the feeble writer of this be counted worthy to be found now and ever among the faithful, though the very least, yet one of God's little ones, clothed in garments clean and in raiment white by the spotless One.

Difficulties With Bearers.

Arranged to pay thirty-five carriers eight thousand cowries, or six shillings a-piece, for the carriage of our loads, weighing from eighty to ninety pounds each, to Kano, a distance of nearly a hundred miles. After having agreed to these terms, our prospective carriers went away, but ere long returned with the preposterous demand that the whole of their wages should be paid prior to starting. In the end I offered to pay them a proportion of their wages at the close of each day during the march. This they at first refused, but on the intervention of the owner of our house, or rather his son, a man named Ali, they at length agreed to accept my offer. During the course of a speech which Ali made to them on this occasion, I heard him say, "We Hansas are all liars, but these English are not. If they say they like any one, they do so; or if they say the opposite, they mean the opposite." It is thus arranged that we are to start early to-morrow morning.

The day following was a typical day of attempted African travel. Our carriers had faithfully promised to start early in the morning. We got up at half-past four, and made ready the loads. The carriers appeared about a quarter past six. Then began a series of disputing, lying and thieving, which lasted nearly five hours, at the end of which time, having stolen five thousand six hundred of our cowries, they refused to start to-day at all. It would be difficult to imagine a more ideal scene for the exercise of patience. Really some one should paint a picture for the Academy to be called "Patience," with an African traveller sitting in a blazing sun, with about fifty of the most ill-looking black specimens of humanity around him, each endeavoring to outdo his neighbor in the shamelessness of his demands. We had agreed to pay our carriers one thousand cowries each as food-money, previous to starting. Whilst engaged in doing so, we handed them a sack containing fifteen thousand, as food money for fifteen men. During the operation of counting, they stole from this sack five thousand six hundred cowries, and then called our attention to the fact that the sack only contained nine thousand four hundred. We were compelled to make up the pretended deficiency. They then assured us that they would start without fail the next morning.—Hausaland.

Canada Yearly Meeting.—Canada Yearly Meeting was held this year as usual at Pickering, Ont., from the nineteenth to the twenty-third day inclusive, of Sixth Month, and whilst on our part we must need acknowledge our unworthiness, and that nothing to us belongs but blushing and confusion of face, yet do we thankfully record the loving-kindness and long suffering mercy of the God of all consolation and comfort, who in pity to our low estate, was yet pleased to refresh us together, spreading over us his canopy of love, strengthening us out of Zion to go on our way rejoicing. We would that a larger number of our members were more zealously concerned for the welfare of Zion, as to come and partake of this so often made to those present as a feast of tabernacles, a school of loving-kindness and long suffering mercy of the God for more whole heartedness toward the Lord in this day of self-seeking, the love of ease, and in the fading pleasures and profits of this world, which with time shall all pass away.

The Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders reports the decease of several of its members, who have been exhorted to come to Jesus in a right age and whilst we mourn their loss and miss them from their accustomed place, yet is our sorrow not unmingled with joy for their sake, remembering the voice from Heaven that cried, "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them." (Rev. xiv. 6). Their memory still remains a joy to us, always.

Epistles of fraternal greeting were received from those Yearly Meetings with whom we are so closely united in the bonds of the Gospel, in unity of faith and practice. As believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, God's witness to the truth in our hearts, evidenced to us that the language contained in them, was that of those who had themselves been taught in the school of Christ. And as we thus together Zionward went on our way, we rejoiced in spirit that others also were constrained to walk in the straight and narrow path that leads to life eternal. A loving epistle was also received and read in open session, from our beloved aged friend Huldah M. Beede, of Providence, R. I., to whom the Women's Yearly Meeting sent an acknowledgment.

A few dear Friends from other Yearly Meetings were present with us, whose labors and Christian counsel all tended to our edification.

An unadvised epistle, signed by the Clerks of London Men's and Women's Yearly Meeting came to us through the Clerk of this Yearly Meeting. After prayerful and serious consideration, it was decided to acknowledge this informal document, accept the brotherly spirit of overture and reconciliation which prompted it, and reply to it as Truth may direct. A reply thereto was accordingly prepared and approved, and the Clerk was directed to forward the same to the Clerks of London Yearly Meeting. Since London Yearly Meeting has solicited this correspondence, it is to be hoped that she will as courteously treat the reply, and assign it a place among those of the other Yearly Meetings with which she "keeps up a correspondence."

It is indeed our earnest desire that Friends everywhere may be one, and this will surely be so, as we are built upon the Rock Christ Jesus, the loved platform of Truth, being led and guided by his Spirit, which "leads into all truth," and gives to all those who learn of Him, the badge of "Love one to another." It is, we are persuaded, as men follow the teachings of man and not Christ, that they are led out of Christ's Fold, and thus straying apart become separated from Him and one from another, in place of abiding in his love, we see the shepherds hear the Shepherd's voice and follow in his footsteps.

The Queries and Answers thereto were read, noting in a few exceptions the frailty of men, but bespeaking a good degree of consistency on the part of our members, and a godly care for offenders on the part of the church.

The time, for which the Friends appointed to act as a Yearly Meeting, having expired, a new appointment was made by filing up the places of those removed by death.

The usual abstract of the exercises of the meeting was embodied in a "Minute of Advice to all our Members," and directed to be inserted in the printed minutes.

It is well known that owing to our late troubles Friends in Canada Yearly Meeting financially suffered heavily, and it is cause of thankfulness on our part that owing to the help of kind sympathizing Friends elsewhere, together with a regular quota on all our meetings, we are now so nearly out of debt on our Yearly Meeting property, there remaining two hundred and fifty dollars due.

But that which above all is cause of rejoicing to us has been and is the evident owning presence of our Lord and Saviour, who has knit our hearts together as that of one man, has led us into the paths of humility and peace, and called his own blessed Name in our midst above all; He has in an especial manner at our close, we would count, and contrited the hearts of the youth, who were with us at this season; and our prayer has been, that He who gathereth not, who called and guided the fathers and mothers in former ages, may give to their vanquished and rearward, and this God, who is faithful, will surely do, as they continue faithfully to serve Him.

Though comparatively few in number, yet were not our hearts cast down, but songs of thankfulness arose to Him who doeth all things well, after the counsel of his own purpose and will; who refines his people in the furnace of affliction, and watches always over his people for good. So did we lovingly part our hearts filled with gratitude to the Giver of every Good. A CANADA FRIEND.

P. S.—A copy of Canada Yearly Meeting Minutes will be forwarded to any one addressing the Clerk, GEORGE BORKER, Thornbury, Ont.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 1, 1896.

Among the proofs that in parts of our Society where the fast element seems to rule, there are yet preserved those who have not lost all their attachment to the principles and practices of Friends, is a letter recently received by our publisher from a Friend in Michigan. The letter says:

"My husband and myself, as well as a great many others, do not enjoy many things that are going on under the name of "Friends' Meetings" of late years. It seems those who keep quiet have to be ruled and carried by those who do the talking, into many things that are very inconsistent with Friends' manner of doing things, so much creaturely activity that the still, small voice is not heard or heeded by very many, to all appearance. All other denominations, it seems to us, are learning more of the guidance of the Holy Ghost, in their different gifts and callings, and often have more silent waiting upon God than our people do. Our desire is to be kept in the right way, avoiding both right hand and left hand errors.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 24th of Seventh Month came the silver party nominated Bryan and Sewall by assistance. The Populist convention nominated Thos. Watson of Georgia for Vice President, and William J. Bryan, of Nebraska, for President. The platform adopted the principles of the recent Chicago Democratic convention, together with measures particularly in the supposed interest of labor.

The National Conference of sound money democrats in Chicago have decided upon the appointment of a National Committee of one from each State to meet in Indianapolis on Eighth Month 7th for the purpose of issuing a call for a National Convention, the time to be not later than Ninth Month 21st.

On the 24th of Seventh the United States Treasury gold was about $11,000,000. About $17,000,000 in gold, tendered by New York banks, have been put in the Treasury cash, and about $500,000 remains to be made up. Other cities tendering gold, which was accepted, are as follows: Philadelphia, $2,750,000; Chicago, $2,500,000; Boston, $1,000,000.

The United States Circuit Court at St. Paul has declared the Iowa anti-liquette law to be unconstitutional. The ground taken was the same as in the "liquor original package case."

The Brooklyn directory has this year 243,691 names, 7,711 more than appeared last year.

The best of the wheat and rye planting in the West, which is not definitely located, is using fax straw successfully for fuel. The straw costs one dollar a ton, and two tons of it are said to be equal to a ton of the best coal. It can be burned in ordinary coal grates.

According to a recent report made by the New York State Board of Transportation, the street railroads of the State are operated by electricity.

The idea of the magnitude of the coal resources of Huertano County, Colorado, may be formed when it is stated that there are about 40,000 acres, and each acre contains 100,000 tons, or a total of 4,000,000,000 tons—an amount almost beyond comprehension.

A cloudburst in Bensens Creek, four miles from Frankfort, Kentucky, caused a flood on the 21st ult. At least six persons were drowned, and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad was washed away.

On the 24th the "heaviest rainfall of a quarter of a century" occurred at Pittsburg and vicinity. The same day an immense cloudburst swept a portion of Golden, Col., away shortly after 6 o'clock p. m. The loss of life is unnumbered. It is estimated that the next day a second cloudburst and flood occurred at Morrison, Colorado, and was attended by further loss of life. Twenty-six dead bodies were recovered. The money recovered at Golden by the cloudburst of the previous day was three.

A Denver dispatch says that one of the effects of the late snow-drifts in Colorado is to cut off several of the large mining camps from railroad connection with the sources of their food supply. "General depopulation of the towns and the suspension of mining until railroad repairs can be made is not improbable."

Milwaukee has 39,000 young men; by actual count on Seventh Month 12,000 of them were found in the saloons. (And "the fortifications of the saloons are the pillars of the church.")

A large number of two-dollar notes, "raised" to resemble $10 notes, have recently been passed in Chicago.

The weekly Iowa weather crop bulletin shows the crop in that State to be almost ruined by rust. A majority of the fields are not worth cutting, and the total output will be less than one-third the heavy yield of last year.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 507, which is less than in any other week, and 1/30 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 248 were under five years of age; 261 were males and 246 females; 37 of heart disease; 48 of consumption; 33 of heart disease; 32 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 23 of marasmus; 22 of infantile paralysis; 19 of cholera; 17 of old age; 14 of Bright's disease; 13 of convulsions; 12 of pneumonia; 12 of paralysis; 12 of cancer; 10 of diphtheria, and 9 of apoplexy.

FOREIGN.—On the 22nd of last month Princess Maud of Denmark and Prince Charles of Denmark were married in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace, London. The Queen, with her children and their families, was present. The Archbishop of Canterbury officiated.

The London correspondent of the New York Times says: "Without exception, the labor leaders here regard the strike of the miners as a national calamity, and as a result of the strike, the country is suffering from a famine by reason of the strike with despair and disgust. They say that the wage-earning class is the one of all others which would be smashed first by such an upheaval as free silver would provoke, and that it would be the last class to recover from the catastrophe. The English Socialists, the Hyndmanites, the Socialists, and the Socialists, denounces the silver delusion as childish, and he declares that the impise behind it is one of naked regulation of debts. From no class of either working people or social reformers here does the silver-Populist movement, as it has defined itself, get respect or sympathy.

In the recent sweep of the Bois de Boulogne for usquebuta characters, a tramp with a strange history was taken. He had been a sailor and master of a sailing vessel, had undertaken to explore Abyssinia, and had ended by becoming chief cook to King Menelik, a great homesick home, and had ended by coming on reaching France had been unable to find work.

Don Carlos, the Spanish pretender, is still handsome, but visibly older in face and manner. Those who know him say that he now has no thought of the Spanish throne, and that the subject of pretense is distasteful to him.

The excavations in Pompeii have just brought to light two bronze statues—one of a hare and the other of a serpent—that evidently served as ornaments on a fountain. Several bronze vases have also been discovered.

A formidable revolt against the Turks is going on in Macedonia. A strong feeling of indignation has been stirred up in Berlin on account of alleged atrocities of the Turks, and the German papers urge interference by the Powers.

One gets an idea of the magnificent distances of the Canadian continent, by learning that a Russian general who was in a hurry to get to St. Petersburg from Vladivostok, found the time-saving route was to go across Yakohama by steamer, then by another steamer across the Pacific to San Francisco, by rail to Los Angeles, and by steamer to Europe. The gap between the San Francisco sections of the Trans-Siberian Railroad is so many hundred miles in length that the general would have lost time in traversing the wilds of that vast country, where horses furnish all the transport.

The Politische Correspondenz learns from St. Petersburg that the transportation of convicts to Siberia is slowly being brought to an end. General Dubowski, who was the Government official of Siberia, has urged in high quarters the acceleration of this measure, and it is expected that an imperial order to this effect will be issued shortly.

An accident, resulting in the loss of fifty lives, has occurred on the railway between Bombay and Delhi. The train was crowded, and the general was thrown from the rails and a number of the coaches wrecked. Most of the killed were natives.

Chinese advices to the 8th inst., received at Vancouver, are to the effect that the Mohammedan rebels have annihilated 6,000 Imperial troops.

The stronghold of the Matabeles in the Matoppo

Hills, south of Bulawayo, has been taken by the British forces.

A despatch of the 26th inst. from Bulawayo says that the Matabele have repulsed the British forces under command of Captain Nicholson in the Matoppo Hills, that the British troops in Cape Colony have been ordered to take the field.

The party of American manufacturers which sailed from New York Seventh Month 1st, via Southampton and London, arrived in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS are warned against a colored man, giving the name of Jacob Conover, who claims to be connected with the Institute for Colored Youth. His representation that he is authorized to solicit money for the Industrial Department is false, as he is unknown to the managers of the Institute.

GEORGE VANCE, Jr., Secy.

CORRECTION.—In the account given of New England "Anti-Slavery" meetings, the name "Mary Capping," should have been "Mary Dyer." Mary Dyer was hanged in Boston for preaching as a Friend. On the gallows she was abjured by her early pastor to repent, and not to be so deluded and carried away by the "deceit of the devil." She was accused of "heresy" and had been in prison; to which she replied, "Yea, I have been in Paradise several days, and added, 'No ear can hear, no tongue can utter, no heart can understand, the sweet incense and the refreshing of the Spirit of the Lord, which I now feel.'" She was accompanied from the prison by the gallows by a band of soldiers, and drums were beaten before and behind her, that none might hear her speak.

DIED, at his home near West Chester, Pa., Sixth Month 27th, 1898, CURTIS H. WARRINGTON, in the forty-first year of his age; a member of West Chester Particular and Birmingham Monthly Meetings of Friends.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1850. Fifth Month 25th.—Oh! may I be what I ought. May I have that sober, serious look that so becomes a teacher, setting a good example.

Sixth Mo. 13th.—My poor soul has been visited this day. William Walter spoke to it from God.

23rd.—Eliza Parker, from Philadelphia, spoke to us in meeting. I was instructed. May I be grateful and obedient for such favors.

30th.—I was humbled this day. I tried, but could not humble myself. I could not thank Him for all his protection in my own will, but at last He made me do it, and brought my great spirit low.

Seventh Month 3rd.—Went to Susan Temples' home to-day. She was very kind to me; gave me "Memoir of Jane Beattie."

25th.—Quiet in meeting. The best day. May I be thankful. May I be my Heavenly Father's little child and be obedient.

Eighth Month 6th.—Monthly Meeting. P. House said they were a satisfied committee. It is only my Heavenly Father that made me do well. Be pleased, Holy Father, that she may not ever say so, when I do not deserve it. I thank her for the exertion of coming.

11th.—Had a good meeting, because I tried to wait in the right way, I believe.

14th.—May I be led by the Good Spirit; then all things will be good. The pure see God, none impure go to Heaven. Trouble—it worketh good for me.

20th.—Teacher Priscilla (Walter) is no more. Died about ten o'clock last night. May I try to obey, to be happy.

22nd.—Funeral. Oh, for more dedication. I have taken up my cross, but I must take it up more. How I wish I could love the cross.

29th.—Wm. Walter spoke. God did tell him my state, in mercy to me.

Ninth Month 15th.—I was with Aunt Ann to spend the night. As we were conversing, I was on the point of saying, that it seemed to me I could suffer for Christ's sake, as the ancient Friends did of whom we were speaking; but I thought I had better not, as it would look forward to say so—however, I thought so. To-day, again, while reading to grandmother, I was going to say so, but did not. I am glad I did not, for it came to my mind just now, that if I was so willing to suffer as they did, why could I not take up my cross, as seems required of me, but which I seem so unwilling to do. Oh, may I be preserved and attend to the Silent Monitor.

Tenth Month 13th.—Silent Meeting. How I would like to be obedient enough to feel that I am one of his flock; his sheep know his voice.

23d.—How kind the Lord is to me to provide such kind friends, as I find in the West-town teachers.

Twelfth Month 15th.—How glad I am that God sent Mary Kite to visit the meetings.

1851. First Month 5th.—Deeply did I wish this day to serve God from a true feeling. School seems to draw my mind from serious thought.

7th.—Monthly Meeting. I ought to obey. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father, which is in heaven." I am afraid I am not fit to teach. Oh! if I could keep in a Heavenly watch.

12.—I did try to get humble to-day before my Heavenly Father. May He incline my heart to serve Him in sincerity.

28th.—I have engaged here (Parkersville), for next summer. May I sincerely serve the Lord. He will work for me. John the Baptist, had to inquire, even after baptizing our Saviour, whether He was the Christ or not. This shows how frail we are. I must endeavor to wait and seek Him sincerely. I must desire none but his glory, and the good of my fellow creatures. Oh! that I may be faithful in school.

Third Month 9th.—Wm. Walter spoke. I am so glad. The Lord is still waiting to be gracious. Oh! God bend my stubborn neck.

17th.—Attend astronomy school in the evenings. I like it, but feel as though it was very lively, perhaps too lively, for me to join in. I am afraid.

20th.—Yesterday, Henry Whittall called in, and showed moon maps.

24th.—Saw Jupiter's belts through his telescope.

Fourth Month 8th.—Our dear brother John has bought a place for father and mother to live in. May God bless and prosper him, and may we all be good.

Sixth Month 12th; stormy morning, so we cannot go to meeting; sorry. What can relieve the poor, the weary, thirsty soul, but God.

15th.—My Heavenly Father so kind to me. Samuel Cope here. I must obey and be very lowly. I was determined to be good this week, but day after day goes by, without making advance and taking the cross.

22nd.—Silent meeting. I did try to get quiet and wait on God, and I hope I succeeded. I want to be good, and just because He calls me to be, I want this to be my reason, but my heart is not pure. Thou hast said, oh Holy Father, "Ask and ye shall receive." I do want to ask thee to cleanse, purify, and purge my heart, if it is thy holly will. Thou hast also said, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out." Help me to be pure and ready all the time to die, so I could go to heaven.

27th.—Grove Meeting to-day. Thomas Conrad, of West Grove, and dear friend, William Walter spoke. Oh, for a more watchful, prayerful state of mind. That is the right state for me to be in, that I may direct my school aright.

Eighth Month 5th.—Phebe W. Roberts at our Monthly Meeting, E. and C. Passmore with her. It was such a good meeting. I wish I could feel peace.

9th.—There seems to be a sweet feeling about me to-night. I wonder if it is peace. Be obedient, oh my soul, and bless the Lord for all his goodness. I hope I may learn to be good and never be cast away. Help me, Heavenly Father.

Ninth Month 13th.—How good it is that there is a place provided for me at West Chester. Such a good boarding-place, too, at Martha Jeffers'. How thankful I ought to be. It was not of my own finding. Oh! Heavenly Father, make me thy obedient child.

Tenth Month 7th.—Monthly Meeting. I cannot go, because they want me so soon in West Chester, that I cannot take any holiday. I have so many favors. It is all in mercy.

21st.—Father is no more. Dear father—he was buried to-day at ten o'clock. Found dead on Seventh-day morning. How good that he was preserved during the night from passing animals. On the eighteenth, he went to the store and never came to our home alive again. Oh, how sad that he should have died thus. Mother waited, anxiously waited, for his return, but at last retired, thinking with some of the neighbors, that possibly the hard rain which had commenced after his departure had made him willing to stay with the storekeeper. Mother and others of the family scarcely rested that night, feeling very anxious. About day, mother and Mary started out, thinking to see certainly where he was. They were expecting to meet him every moment, when sister discovered him lying in the street. Poor dear father. Probably an apoplectic stroke ended his life instantly.

27th.—Commenced school in West Chester. Oh! how shall I do, and how can I take my cross. I fear man.

29th.—Monthly Meeting. Silent. Very few scholars. School seems so different from any that I have before had—some more refined, others more rough than I expected. I wish I could get strength enough to be nothing.

Eleventh Month 2nd.—At meeting. Dear Hannah Gibbons spoke to my state. Called this evening to see her. Dear woman; wish I could be as good as she is.

11th.—Quarterly Meeting. A day of visitation to my poor soul, in which the young were counselled to take the cross and despise the shame.

25th.—Rowland Howell deceased this day at James Emelen's.

30th.—Silent Meeting. Am I the Jonah? I think so. When will I submit to be a follower of the commands of my Heavenly Father. It is only He that can make me willing to submit to his yoke.

Twelfth Month 4th.—Silent Meeting. Hannah Gibbons away. Edith Kite is here. A kind woman. She speaks so slow and pleasant.

6th.—Ebenezer Worth and an Indian chief called to see Martha and Ann Jeffers.

15th.—School very trying now. I wish my Heavenly Father would bless me, and give me an assurance of his protection. I am very poor.

18th.—Samuel Cope at our meeting to-day; spoke. It encouraged me. Oh, that I could die, or was only fit to die, and go from this world of woe.

24th.—Fire in Washington City; much of the library gone. Very cold indeed. Scholars few, so cold.

26th.—Snowing again, making excellent sleighing.

27th.—The coldest day. Some say seven, some say fourteen degrees below zero.

31st.—Monthly Meeting. Pebe W. Roberts' appointed meeting. She prayed that she might be supported, becoming as a fool for Christ's sake. May that prayer be for me, too.

1852. First Month 4th.—My dear, dear friend Gibbons spoke and prayed for the young. Oh, may I submit to the yoke.

11th.—W. spoke of the parable of the sower. Thankful. I must not expect to get along smoothly always.

15th.—Cordelia Bayes had an appointed meeting. Gode to me, is my Heavenly Father. I must more and more serve Him.

29th.—Ah, me! obedience must be my portion, or I die. Oh, Heavenly Father, do with me as thou seest fit, only make me to obey and follow thee where thou leadest the way, and grant that I may feel peace of mind. Grant me too, oh Holy Father, that I may love thee supremely. I want more heavenly love in my heart. May I be thy child.

Third Month 1st.—What a favor to be aroused and instructed. I am trying to take my cross. My school is more and more pleasant. I do desire to give up my will, but as my heart is so stubborn and my feelings so hard, Holy Father, cast me not off, but look down with pity upon poor me.

14th.—Silent meeting, but I think I can say with dear George Fox, that towards the last the Lord's power was over "all," even in me.

Fourth Month 5th.—Remarkable weather. Snow, rain, tempest and cold.

17th.—Came to Philadelphia to attend Yearly Meeting.

18th.—I am here in Philadelphia at dear aunt P.'s, and cousin Mary Stokes. They are very kind—more so than I deserve. May they have their reward, though it is not in our power to give it.

This being First-day, we attended Sixth St. Meeting in the morning, where was John Wilbur. He spoke, also Morris Cope, both concerned to lead us into a deep, inward walk with God. In the afternoon attended Twelfth Street Meeting. Edith Griffiths spoke much, and others supplicated that those who were on the barren hills of a false profession might be drawn to the right place, etc.

Fifth Month.—I have not been obedient during Yearly Meeting week, nor since. Oh! may a merciful God not forsake, but enable me to be his child.

14th.—Yesterday was the Quarterly Meeting at Concord. Morris Cope spoke upon our Saviour's entering Jerusalem and the children crying out, "Hosanna in the highest," etc., also saying that they (the Jews), thought He would deliver them from their present rulers and reign peacefully over them, but He went into the temple of the heart, and overthrew the tables of the money changers, and cast out those that sold doves. He also said, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon," and that we have not an High Priest, that cannot be touched with a feeling of our iniquities, but was in all points tempted as we are, yet without sin. Then Wm. Kite spoke, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled," saying that it is by obedience that we are enabled to get into this hungering state. Next Samuel Cope enlarged much and with power upon the text, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon," and I feel that instead of settling down under the cross, it is becoming harder and harder. Oh! Holy Father, have mercy yet upon me. In the last meeting some others spoke. It was a day of resolutions to serve the Lord, but I expect they will be broken. Thou who art all powerful, be pleased to break my stubborn heart and make it obedient to thee.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Terra del Fuego, etc.

The southern extremity of South America, including Patagonia and the archipelago of islands which lie on the south side of the Straits of Magellan, form a portion of the earth's surface with which many persons are comparatively unacquainted. A book of John P. Spears, published last year by G. P. Putnam's Sons, contains much interesting information concerning it.

One of the curious facts is that it contains an extensive deposit of gold, which is found diffused in grains through a black magnetic iron sand, which underlies much of the country in a bed of a few inches in thickness, and always below sea-level.

In the year 1876 a small schooner engaged in seal fishing was stranded near the southeast corner of Patagonia. The crew escaped to land with some provision and other valuables, including a shovel. Patagonia is a desert region, where one may travel hundreds of miles without seeing sweet water, and yet with a shovel plenty may be had by a man who knows where to dig. A man was put to work by the shipwrecked crew digging for water. When he had gotten down about three feet, he began to throw out a layer of black sand dotted over with yellow particles of gold!

In 1884 the steamship Arctic was wrecked near the same spot as the sealing schooner, and the wreckers who flocked to the place for plunder, engaged in digging and found considerable gold. One man cleaned up thirty-seven pounds of gold in two weeks' time.

While the gold-bearing sand was being worked off, the miners observed that the supply was somewhat renewed by every storm that raged—probably washed up from a streak that crops out somewhere below low tide. Geologists think that this gold-bearing layer extends for over a thousand miles along the Patagonia coast, always below the water-line. It must have existed at one time in the form of a vein a thousand miles long in some prehistoric range of mountains.

Our author gives an interesting account of the native Indian tribe, called Yaghans, that inhabit the mountainous islands in the vicinity of Terra del Fuego. These mountains rise so suddenly from the sea, that in many places there is not even space for a foothold, although mostly a narrow beach is found. The huts inhabited by the Yaghans were made of poles and thatched with brush and grass about the shape, and little larger than a haystack. They were opened on the side, and the fire was built just within the opening. The people were often stark naked, save for a breech clout, and the children were always so. Living thus, shelterless and naked, in a land of fierce and freezing storms, he was described as the most miserable specimen of humanity to be found on earth. Yet he was really both healthy and happy. Like the whale he had a coat of fat under his skin that was a better protection than flannel and blankets. Besides, he was in the habit of frequently greasing himself all over with oil.

His weapons and canoes evinced much ingenuity and mechanical skill. The canoe was built of bark, about twenty-five feet long, and well adapted for speed, safety and capacity. His chopping instrument was an axe made of a clam shell, with rounded stone lashed to the hinge side, and the opposite side ground down to a cutting edge. For weapons he made harpoons, spears and slings.

It is a remarkable fact that these uncultured people had a language containing not less than forty thousand words, and they had among them poets, novelists and historians.

By the efforts of missionaries these people were induced in measure to adopt European habits and clothing, but with a most disastrous effect on their health and numbers. "They had slept naked in the freezing rain, but now, if they sat down in their shirt sleeves while at work, they caught a cold that developed into a fatal disease. Of a tribe three thousand strong, less than three hundred can now be found."

A PRESCRIPTION FOR THE SEASON.—A pathetic and tragic incident was narrated by an eminent surgeon to a class of medical students.

"Shortly after I took up practice a case was placed in my hands of a man who had been injured seriously, but not necessarily fatally. It required an operation, which I performed satisfactorily to myself; but the patient needed special attention, lest blood poisoning set in. My plans were made to visit him twice a day to wash the wound and change bandages. In those days I was a devotee of the gun and rod, and, not being embarrassed with work, I went into the wood. The day wore away, and I had brought down nothing. Not willing to return with an empty bag, I forgot my patient, and reached home late at night bringing a few birds, but being weary thought that it would be sufficient to see him in the morning. But, gentlemen, unlooked-for complications had set in, and before the morning came I was aroused, hastened to the patient to find that the chances were all against him; and, do what I could, he did not recover. Believing that had I seen him the evening before, this would not have happened, I can only free myself from the guilt of murder by pleading to myself my youth and inexperience. Gentlemen, place your patient before your pleasure or your ease. Put yourself in his place and he in yours, and do for him what you, if helpless, would wish him to do for you."

AMBITION carries the torch of discord.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Village Life in Germany.

We are off to-day on what in America we call a picnic, but which here is a "tour." In fact ever since we came to Hanover different people have told me that I must not go away without making the "Deister tour," and so when Clara Erbröen came the other day and said the four higher classes with their professors from the girls' high school were going to spend the day on the Deister, and that the parents and friends could come along I was very glad to join. Frau Dr. came too, and Albane and one of the persons who live with us came in a later train and joined us here.

We left Hanover a little after nine this A. M. and came by train to a station at the foot of the range of hills called Deister-berg (berg means mountain and they call every little rise by that name here), and then for about three hours we followed a very pretty path through the woods and all the time up and until we came to a high tower built up in the midst of the forest and reaching high above the tree-tops so that from above one has a fine view of the entire country. At first we came through a village street that was intensely interesting. The peasant houses have all been remodeled, although one could see very plainly how it used to be. The entrance is like a barn with wide doors and stone floor, over the door of each was painted the names of the man and his wife and her maiden name, with the date I suppose of their marriage or else entrance in the house. On either side of this wide passage-way are the dwelling rooms with the windows facing toward the street, formerly there were no rooms and no windows but simply stalls, on one side being the cattle and on the other the horses, while the family (apparently a second consideration) lived entirely in the back part of the building.

In the little village were numerous houses with the horse heads over the gable, which as I said in another letter is a remnant of the olden times when horses were sacrificed to Wodan and the skulls were placed over the house-top as a token of the faithfulness of the inhabitants in performing their duty.

At the tower was of course plenty to drink, really it is at first laughable and then distasteful, but finally one gets used to it and thinks nothing more about it, to see the way the Germans drink. I suppose there are several hundred children along, most of them had raspberry vinegar which they mixed with water, but still there was no lack of beer. We had brought a lunch along of course, and had eaten it under the trees. I never forget my mountaineering experiences, and drink little, if any, when taking a tramp, I find it is only a habit, the more one drinks the more one wants and is in every way more uncomfortable.

On reaching the tower I felt rather tired and went away to one side in the woods to take a little nap. Then we came on here and about two minutes later came Albane and the others that had come all the way by train (A. could not leave her school of course). This is a truly German place, and a very popular one for parties from Hanover. Besides numerous verandas there are scores of tables with chairs stationed about under the trees, or in pretty little artificial grottoes covered with vines. Here dinner is served if one wishes or simply what one chooses to order. We had not planned to take the table d'hôte so simply ordered coffee and milk.

ready there are signs of a thunder-storm. The children are having a lovely time in the playgrounds; they look very pretty and certainly are making the most of their day in the woods. Albane runs along with them and it is just as though she always had lived in Germany. I have gathered a few flowers along the way which I send thee. The Germans certainly know how to enjoy themselves out of doors, but their aversion to water is something amusing, they do not seem to think that anyone can drink it without something to give it a taste. When I speak about the Americans drinking ice water they look horrified and exclaim, "how very unhealthful!" Then I tell them that we think to bring up children on beer, or in fact to drink it at all, is worse than unhealthy, but they cannot make them understand. By Frau Dr.'s there is seldom any used by any one for she is one of the few Germans who does not like beer. I will stop now and go with Frau Dr. to get some fern roots to carry back with us, so farewell for the present.

After writing so much I laid it aside and went with Frau Dr. to dig some ferns by the roots and then to watch the children at their games. Suddenly it occurred to me that Baringhausen was a "dorf" (village) and as yet I had been in none, at least not on foot so that I could investigate. I told Frau Dr. of my desire to see the quaint houses and of course asked her to go along, though I secretly hoped she would do the thing she did, which was to prefer to remain quietly there and watch the children, for when alone I can always see more, and besides my chief delight is to talk with the people, and when any one is with me I do not have the same opportunity. So I started off alone agreeing to be back at seven so as to go with the party to the train.

I have scarcely enjoyed anything more than that afternoon since I have been in Germany. It was so quaint and interesting. Such a German dorf is quite unlike anything which we have in America. It dates back centuries of course and the customs very much farther, for instance there is no such thing as isolated houses in the country, the peasant classes since the earliest days have always lived clustered together, and go to their work sometimes a two hours' journey every morning returning home at night. The houses are all of brick and two stories high, with gable end to the street. I have spoken of the wide barn-like entrance filled with all sorts of utensils and the provisions being up among the rafters. In front of the house was often a little garden with roses and flowers and then before each door were one or more benches where many or few of the family were sitting; mostly there was an old withered, white-capped grandmother knitting stockings, and every house swarmed (I mean that literally) with children. I nodded and smiled at them all (especially the grandmothers, for these old worn-out women go to my heart and interest me intensely), and they warmly returned my greeting.

Before one house which looked especially attractive or rather cleaner than some, I stopped and asked the woman not to take it unkindly of me, but it would give me great pleasure to see a peasant home and hers looked so tidy I ventured to ask her to show it to me. She was very friendly and took me about. Over the house was growing what I took to be a vine but which was in reality a pear tree with a large trunk, but so trained and trimmed that it made that appearance; it was quite loaded with fruit. Joined to the house by a slanting roof was the goat stall (every house has such an annex) and I learned that a good goat gives about three quarts of very good milk a day, and that they made butter from it but not cheese. They had a nice vegetable garden back of the house and seemed very contented and happy. Of the interior I saw only the "gute stube," which means the best room, and which was tidy and decorated by a cupboard of interesting old china, a big porcelain stove and various chromo-utensils of course one of the Kaiser and Kaiserin conspicuous among them. If I had forethought enough to put a few loose pennings in my pocket before starting so that I gathered have given some to the little tots that gathered about to see what that strange individual wanted, I would have asked to have seen the kitchen and sleeping rooms but she did not offer. I had nothing less than a mark in my pocket, I did not like to ask.

As I went up and down the streets I saw constantly some new phase of peasant life. Many of the houses were unaltered but presented the stable front to the street so that the grunt of the pigs, the lowing of the cattle and the stamp of the horses feet came out of the front door, along with the numerous odors that are said to be very healthful if not æsthetic. I kept constantly meeting old and young of both sexes returning from their day's work carrying their hoes or rakes, and often huge baskets of hay on their backs. Naturally I attracted a good deal of attention and seemed to excite a great deal of merriment among the younger groups, who evidently are not much bothered with strangers making tours of inspection in their town. Besides the children there were great numbers of cats and dogs and kids besides ducks and geese, with all of whom I made friends. I was very much amused with one little boy, whom I saw carrying a loaf of rye bread almost as large as himself, both arms did not much more than reach round it, and sticking out from about his coat collar were small white rolls which his hands could not manage. I tried to enter into conversation with him but he evidently felt no great confidence in me and I could get no response to my many questions, as soon as I would leave off talking to him he would come along side of me and slyly looking out of the corner of his eye in the funniest way, and as I turned to speak, down would go his head and he would run off.

As I came back down the street again I found him among a group of people, evidently his family, that he had called together. Among them stood the old old grandparents (they looked over a hundred) and numerous cats. They looked very smiling and very poor, and I stopped and talked a little, but felt so sorry not to have something to give the little children, I soon went on.

It was just after this that I looked at my watch and in dismay found it already fifteen minutes before seven. I had been too much occupied with the sights that I had encountered to think of time. But I was determined not to return as I had come, and started off in the direction, but on another street. I soon found myself in quite a maze, and I asked nearly every one I saw to tell me the nearest way to the hotel. When I came on the straight street leading there I broke into a run regardless of the laughs that I heard from both sides.

They had already left on the way to the train and after flying around through the garden several times to see that no one was there looking for me, I started running down the road to the station. As I passed the last gate of the garden some one called out and said there was no great rush, and turning round I found one of the professors to whom I had been introduced before so we walked on together. I had scarcely spoken with him ten minutes before he began telling me that he had never heard a foreigner speak the German so well, that he had known numberless English and Americans in the university and they come continually to listen to the class reciting, but he had seen none who seemed to so thoroughly have the spirit of the language. I was very much surprised and gratified of course, though I realize that I make constantly mistakes which he admitted, but said such things were of little consequence compared with the accent and whole manner of expression, as for grammatical correctness I could learn that in America or any where, but to have a comprehension of the language such as I showed in speaking was what could only be gotten by living the German life and seeing it in all its phases. He afterward came over and said the same to Fran Dr. and expressed regret that I had not attended the school this winter. I explained that I would have done so had I been physically able, and hoped sometime to come back and take my examination in the language.

I speak of this, because I am so conscious of my grammatical errors that I feel sometimes so disgusted with myself that I do not know what to do, and such an unbiased opinion gives me more courage. But then I happened to speak remarkably well that afternoon because I always can when I am excited, and I had seen so much to delight me that I was all wound up. But one thing I am determined to do, and I will have the opportunity from Gothingen, and that is to study this same "dorf" life and the peasants. It interests me a hundred times more than palaces and princes; here is something natural and primitive and full of instruction, but the next time I go I will take something for the children, though I like the grandmothers best, but they are pleased if the children are.

Summer in the City Slums.

BY MAUDE BALLINGTON BOOTH.

Summer, with its sunbeams and flowers, its leaf-laden forests and glittering ocean waves, is glorious; but summer in the crowded city slums, with its oppressive heat, its foul odors and quickly-spreading diseases, is a sad and sultry season. Not being among those who can spend the hot months at the seaside or in the mountains, I have had some experience of summer in New York City, and I have not found it at all a season to be dreaded in the business portions of the town. True, one can on really hot days feel the heat of the sidewalk through the soles of one's shoes, and the glare of sun and stone-paving is somewhat trying to the eyes, but in the offices of big business buildings one is comparatively cool. An extra hot wave every now and then may give one the feeling of passing through a Turkish bath, but such days are almost always followed by cooling showers and fresh breezes.

However hot and sultry the streets, the elevated rail is almost always breezy, and after dark, cool winds from the harbor sweep refreshingly up the main thoroughfares and avenues. I, personally, have often thought that we have less of the scorching and baking experience of summer's sun in the great city than the people who were holidaying on the unprotected seashores, with the glare of sand and sea and sky unbroken by the shade of big stone buildings.

But, alas! there are sections of our cities where summer is indeed a dreadful time of suffering and misery. The cold of winter, which counts many a starving, homeless wanderer among its victims, however cruel and keen, can be better escaped than the suffocating heat and its many consequences. The overcrowding of the tenement and lodging houses, the squalor and dirt, the foul odors and many diseases, are all more loathsome and dangerous in summer. When we remember that hundreds of little children die daily of the diseases brought on by the effect of heat on their ill-fed, weakened and uncared for little bodies, we can understand something of the sorrow and hopelessness that follow in the track of every hot wave.

I have visited Slumdom in summer, have passed in and out of the crowded, foul-air dives and saloons on a Saturday night, have climbed up the stairs of the great crowded tenements where the people sleep out on the fire escapes or on the roofs for a breath of fresh air, and have seen myself the little wasted faces of wee babies taken out by weary mothers on the crowded doorsteps to catch any stray breezes from the river. My wonder on such occasions was not that so many died, but that so many little ones managed to live through the horrors of a hot wave.

To those who have never gone through them, it would be difficult to adequately describe the condition of the homes of the outcast poor. I have been through some of the tenement houses occupied by twenty or thirty families. Sometimes we have found families living in two rooms—a father, mother, half-grown sons and daughters, little children and even lodgers—crowded together in quarters so small that one did not wonder there was no room for proper furniture, even had they been rich enough to afford it. After a night of debauch in such homes, we have found the adults sleeping off their drunken stupor on the floor, while the innocent little ones played or cried in unheeded neglect. In many homes of the slums you will find little or no furniture—a bed on the floor, a table and a chair and a few cooking implements comprising the family belongings. Sometimes even these are missing, and the absolutely bare room, filthy and desolate, tells its tale of the last stages in a life of want and hopeless poverty. Little babies can be found in the slums who possess as their wardrobes one filthy little garment, and we have found them absolutely unclothed, not only in summer's heat, but in winter's cold.

To my mind, the life in the common lodging-houses is about the worst and lowest level into which the poor can sink. If a family, however poor, has its own room, even though that room be a garret, there is some amount of possession and privacy about it; but in the big rooms of these lodging-houses, which sometimes accommodate four, five, and even six families in a room, the condition and degradation of the people is beyond description. Among all the horrors of Slumdom, one such house through which I went from cellar to garret always stands out as a type of misery. In its better days it had been a gentleman's mansion, but the big parlors were now turned into the most squalid of lodging rooms. Beds without any pretense of bed covering arranged around the room; the washing of the different families was strung across on ropes—wretched rags, which did not look much the cleaner for the process they had passed through; a general cook stove, one table, a dilapidated old lounge and a wooden bench comprised the whole furniture of the establishment, besides the six beds, one of which had collapsed and lay in fragments, with its occupant amid the wreck.

And that was the lodging place of ten or twelve adults, to say nothing of the poor little babies and neglected children who played on the floor or lay sleeping on the beds!

On going up flight after flight, much the same sort of scene met us in each room, though the others had not so many occupants. On some of the landings ash barrels stood filled with refuse and leavings, and when we got up into the dark garret we found four or five small attic rooms in the most dilapidated condition, left off to different families. After entering the different rooms, I was so nauseated with the foulness of the air and the pestilential odors that I had to step out into the passage-way, sick and giddy. On going into the streets again, the air seemed refreshing and cool by contrast, though to come to these streets from other portions of the city, one is oppressed by the heavy sultriness of the air.

In one tenement house, in the heat of summer, the tenants complained much for over a week of the foulness of the place, and on an investigation being made in a tenement room, which the occupant had vacated ten days before, a dead baby was found. The child had evidently been taken sick, and after its death the poor mother knew not what to do with it, and being too poor to bury it, hid it away and left the scene to avoid trouble.

The anxiety through which many a hard-working and loving mother has to pass in caring for her loving ones when poverty and starvation face them, as well as the trying heat of summer, baffles description. In one instance an honest, hard-working woman, who, alas! was in abject poverty through lack of work, was found with her little family of children absolutely starving. Her poor, bare little room was clean, and the children were as tidy as she could make them. The babe in her arms was sucking voraciously at its bottle, but in the bottle was only cold water. This is in the hot season of the year, when more fortunate mothers have so carefully to watch that their little ones have only the most suitable of food! I have seen the little ones picking the damaged, rotten fruit out of the ash barrels and eating it with the eagerness that spoke of gnawing hunger.

In passing, I must mention the admiration I feel for the way in which—Straus has made it possible for thousands of poor little children to have properly sterilized milk and healthy prepared food for babies. Thousands of tickets are given away to mothers who could not otherwise get proper food for their little ones; and it seems to me that this is one of the most useful charities in New York City, and one of those which cannot be abused as can the giving of money or other help. I know of the good work in the saving of little lives that has resulted from it.

If space would allow, much more could be said about the misery of summer. Cases of sickness, the terrible temptations to drink, the suicides and crimes—but perhaps it is better to leave them untold.

There are many means set on foot for helping the poor in their sufferings: "fresh air funds," ice distribution (but, sad to say! many have othing for the ice to keep cool), free baths, &c.—All very good and helpful in their way, but, alas! they are only palliations, not cures. They can bring a breath of fresh air, a drop of boldness, to the stifling sufferers, but after it their misery closes in upon them again.

O, for more loving, Christ-inspired hearts, to ease the fallen, to point the straying ones into the straight path, and to save the degraded ones from their misery! In so many cases, the lot of all trouble is sin and drunkenness, and the heart was changed and God's power came into the life, a new ambition would help to a newer, better, happier life.—The Presbyterian.

Climate of Formosa.

Keeping in view the dampness of Formosa and the powerful influence of the broiling tropical sun, it will be easily understood that growth is very rapid. Scarcely a barren spot is to be seen. The rocks are clad in moss and festooned with vines. The very trees in their wild state are covered with creepers. But if growth is rapid, so is decay, and hence man's deadliest foe, malarial fever. This is the blackest cloud that hangs longest over our beautiful island, because of it, disease and death work terrible havoc among the inhabitants. Almost every form of disease is directly traced to this source. Seldom do three months elapse without one or more members of every household being laid low. In the hot season, the natives are suddenly attacked, and in many cases succumb in a few hours. The bacteria of Asiatic cholera and malarial fever, carried on the wind, sweep over the country like a deathful pestilence. Sometimes the fatal effects of the climate do not appear for many months, but they manifest themselves so suddenly and unexpectedly that the physician has little chance to save life. Therefore, we have often been called to follow the beloved members of our little community to the grassy resting-place out on the hill.

My first attack of fever was exactly one year after my arrival on the island. I had been on an extended tour with Captain Bax, of her majesty's man-of-war. We penetrated far into the mountains, and were for a considerable time in a savage territory. Bax, although strong and healthy when we set out, had to be carried back in a sedan-chair. On returning to Tamsui, I found my rooms chilly, damp and mouldy. While I was absent the place was not occupied, and when I returned and lay down to sleep, I became cold as ice, shook and trembled like an aspen-leaf, my teeth chattering so loudly that A Hoa heard it in an outer apartment. He came to my relief, and remained at my bedside the whole night. As there was no fire-place in the building, it was impossible to get warmed. Heavy doses of quinine broke the fever, but my system was not free from it for years. Many times, on trips among churches and in the mountains, have the mats under me been wet with perspiration during the hot stage of the disease. Personal experience has convinced me that but few foreigners can resist the enervating influence of the climate in Formosa.

"I don't ever go fishing any more," said a small country boy.

"Why not?" asked the visitor. "Tired of it?" "No; but I was casting a fly on the pond one day, and the hook caught me in the back, and it hurt, so I've been sort of too sorry for the fish ever since."—Harper's Young People.

GRANDMOTHER'S SERMON.

The supper is over, the hearth is swept,
And in the wood fire's glow
The children cluster to hear a tale
Of that time so long ago

When grandmamma's hair was golden brown,
And the warm blood came and went O'er the face that could scarce have been sweeter than
Than now in its rich content.

The face is wrinkled and careworn now,
And the golden hair is gray;
But the light that shone in the young girl's eyes
Has never gone away.

And her needles catch the fire's light,
As in and out they go,
With the clicking noise that grandma loves Shaping the stocking toe.

And the waiting children love it too,
For they know the stocking song
Brings many a tale's to grandma's mind
Which they shall hear ere long.

But it brings no story of olden time
To grandma's heart, and she saith—
Only a sermon, quaint and short,
Is sung by the needles bright.

"Life is a stocking," grandma says,
And yours is just begun;
But I am knitting the toe of mine,
And my work is almost done.

"With merry hearts we begin to knit,
And the ribbing is almost play;
Some are gay-colored and some are white,
And some are ashen gray.

"But most are made of many a hue,
With many a stitch set wrong,
And many a row to be sadly ripped
Ere the whole is fair and strong.

"There are long plain places without a break,
That in youth are hard to bear,
And many a weary tear is dropped
As we fashion the heel with care.

"But the saddest, happiest time is that
We court and yet would shun,
When our Heavenly Father breaks the thread
And says that our work is done."

The children come to say good night,
With tears in their bright young eyes,
While in grandma's lap, with a broken thread,
The finished stocking lies.

KING ALFRED'S LIGHT.

When Alfred was the people's king,
And retired o'er England's soil
A taper was made by his command,
Of three equal parts its coil,
It burned brightly day and night,
Blessed of God was its holy oil—
One-third marked rest, one-third for prayers,
And the other third for toil.

That good king died and the Norman heel
Was stamped into England's soil.
Then rest was short and prayers were few,
And lengthened the hours of toil,
And the people became instead of lords
The serfs on their native soil.
Which they ever will be until they see King Alfred's light for toil.

If it is thy pleasure to make use of me to forward thy work among men, I yield myself to thee. Without thinking of myself, I will simply impart to them those gifts which Thou hast showered upon me. . . . If, on the contrary, Thou dost not choose to make use of me for others, I will not offer myself. I will not go to seek anything. I will perform in peace the other things to which Thou shalt limit me.—Fenelon.

The Moses of Her People.

HARRIET TULMAN'S WONDERFUL, HALF-FORGOTTEN CAREER—THE GREATEST SINGLE BATTLE OF HER ADVENTUROUS LIFE.

On the outskirts of the city of Auburn, N. Y., stands a small frame cottage, which has recently become the "Harriet Tulman Home for Aged Colored People." In its title the unpretending building perpetuates the name of one who has been called "the Moses of her people." It will be a lasting monument to one of the most noble and wonderful figures in the history of slavery's decline and fall.

Harriet is now eighty years old. She is very black and of unattractive appearance, since her face is of the lowest type of humanity, showing no evidence of intelligence or power.

It was when she was thirteen years old that the child first showed a trace of the spirit which characterized her after-life. Her master, enraged at a negro who had shirked a task, was chasing him with a club, when the girl deliberately charged upon the white man, checking him by the shock of her rush until the fugitive escaped into negro quarters. The master, in a fit of rage, picked up an iron weight and threw it at Harriet, crushing in her skull. As a result of this injury, she has all through life been subject to fits of somnolency, during which she has visions, some of which have come true in the most remarkable and inexplicable manner. Possibly, too, it may have been this injury to her brain that gave her a certain sublimation of cunning, amounting at times to the cleverest strategy, which would appear abnormal in one of her race.

For a long time after this she was accounted half-witted. Finally she was farmed out to a woman who beat her so cruelly that the marks of the lash are still on her neck and shoulders, and finally sent her back as "not worth a sixpence."

Her next employment gave her the wonderful physical strength which stood her in such good stead in her eventful career, for she became the property of a man who set her to lifting heavy barrels and drawing weights. Before she was nineteen years old, Harriet was a match physically for the strongest man on the plantation, and her master became quite proud of her, exhibiting her extraordinary feats of strength to visitors as one of the sights of the place. However, whether from overwork or the trouble with her head, she fell ill, and for months was bed-ridden, during which time her thoughts turned to religion, and she became a devoted "follower of the Lamb," as she always phrased it. Meantime her master had died. A word was abroad among the slaves:

"We 'se goin' to be sold to de Souf."

"Not me," said Harriet, "I'll never go alive."

The spirit of her fierce ancestors was stirring within her. Then and there she resolved that she belonged to herself and her God, that she would be free or die in struggling for freedom. Two of her brothers felt as she did, but she was the leader. One night Harriet went through the negro quarters singing a song of "de promised land," a song of farewell and of freedom.

"She's goin' to-night," said the other slaves, but they dared not go with her.

Only her two brothers dared that much, and after the start their determination gave way. Bidding her farewell, they turned and slunk back to their bondage. Alone, friendless, motherless, with an unknown country before her and the North Star for her guide, she set out. Of this journey, as of all other trips over the country, Harriet remembers few details. Only her purpose was firm in her mind.

Harriet went north, hiding by day, plodding toward the Promised Land by night, picking out with unerring instinct the right places to go for food and shelter, until at last she was beyond the line, and stretching out her two mighty arms, she said to them:

"You're mine now, and you'll work for me and for nobody else."

But this was not true. From that time on Harriet's body and soul were wrapped up in the struggle of helping her fellow negroes.

She obtained employment in the North, and lived on nothing, hoarding every cent that she earned. One night she mysteriously disappeared from her home, and was not seen for months. That time was spent on the first of her expeditions to the South, where she planned and led an exodus of her people to the land of freedom.

Before long, throughout the plantations of Virginia were spread offers of reward for a negro woman who was luring the slaves away from their masters. Forty thousand dollars was the reward offered for her head, yet with such a price upon her, she was never captured. No fewer than nineteen times did she make expeditions, bringing away to the North more than three hundred pieces of living property. In time she came to know her path well.

Some dark night word would go about the negro quarters of a plantation that the Moses was waiting for them. Then would come a rendezvous in a swamp or woodland, where two or three of the more intelligent negroes would be entrusted with the outline of Harriet's plan. At the appointed time the little band of fugitives would meet and Harriet would pilot them away. Not only was she a leader, but also a commander of an army in the field, and of her discipline she would brook no infractions. The women she exhorted, the men she commanded, and more than once she carried in baskets slung over her own back babies dragged with paragon, lest they should cry out and betray the band.

Once, while arranging for an expedition from the plantation of one of her old masters, Harriet had a narrow escape from capture. With incomprehensible daring she went to the nearby village to buy some fowls, with no other disguise than the pretence of a decrepit old woman. On turning a corner she saw her old master coming toward her, and, with ready ingenuity, pulled the strings which tied the legs of the live chickens she had just bought. Off they flew, with Harriet in hot pursuit, and by the time her master came up she was away around the corner. Often Harriet has travelled in a car and has heard the advertisement setting a price on her head read by her fellow-passengers. She could not read herself.

Another time, on her eighth excursion, she found that a guard of officers were waiting for her and her little band at the bridge which crosses the river at Wilmington, Del. Word was sent to that staunch friend of the slaves, Thomas Garrett, and Harriet distributed her followers in the houses of persons whom she knew to be safe. Garrett sent across the bridge two wagons filled with bricklayers, whom he knew he could trust. When the wagons returned at nightfall, the bricklayers were singing and shouting, apparently in the hilarity of extreme intoxication. But lying trembling in the bottom of their wagons were Harriet's little band. All got over safe, among them a famous slave, Joe, whose master offered $2,000 reward for him. Later, this same man Garrett was fined so heavily for assisting in the escape of fugitive slaves that he was left penniless at the age of sixty years. In pronouncing sentence the Judge of the United States Court said:

"Garrett, let this be a lesson to you not to interfere hereafter with the cause of justice by helping runaway negroes."

"Judge," replied the old Quaker, "these hasn't left me a dollar; but I wish to say to thee that if any one knows of a fugitive who wants a shelter and a friend, send him to Thomas Garrett."

All the stations of the famous underground railway were well known to Harriet, and all those who were friendly to fugitive slaves came to know and trust her as her work progressed. The Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, providing for the return of slaves from the Northern States, was a great blow to Harriet.

"After dat," she said, "I wouldn't trust Uncle Sam wid my people no longer, but I brought 'em all 'lar off to Canada."

Her last expedition to the South was in 1860. When the abolition movement became active, Harriet naturally went into it heart and soul. Wherever she could get to a meeting she went, and her presence was an inspiration to enthusiasm. It was in the spring of 1860, while she was on her way to Boston to attend a large anti-slavery meeting at the request of Gerrit Smith, that she fought the greatest single battle of her life. She had stopped to visit a cousin in Troy, and while there learned that a fugitive slave named Charles Nalle had been followed by his master, who was also his younger brother, and no whiter than the slave himself, and that he was already in the hands of the officers, having been remanded back to Virginia. No sooner had Harriet heard the news, than she started for the office of the United States Commissioner, scattering the tidings as she went. Drawn by her power as a leader and the air of command with which she bade them follow her, a large crowd went after her to the office. A wagon was waiting before the door to carry off the man, but so great was the excitement in the street that the officers did not dare to bring him down. Harriet had forced her way to the room, and stood where the colored people outside could see her.

At length, as time went on and nothing was done, Harriet went down the street and sent out some little boys to cry fire. The alarm spread, the bells were rung and the street was blocked, which was just what she had intended. She herself stood at the foot of the stairs, in the attitude of a decrepit old woman, which she could assume with admirable verisimilitude. Again and again the officers cleared the stairs. The old woman kept her place despite them. Offers for the purchase of Nalle began to come from the crowd, and the master agreed to accept twelve hundred dollars for him, but, this being offered, raised the price to fifteen hundred dollars. A gentleman across the street raised a window and called out, "Two hundred dollars for his rescue, but not one cent to his master."

This fired the crowd to a point where they were ready for anything. Common sense should have prevented the officers from bringing down their captive at this time, but they attempted it, having manacled his wrists and placed him between the United States Marshal, another officer, and his master, with several more officers as guard. A lane to the wagon had previously been cleared. The moment Harriet saw him step on the sidewalk, she threw off her disguise and shouted:

"Here he comes! Take him!"

Then springing upon the first officer, she pulled him down. In the fight that followed her enormous physical strength was what won the day. Breaking through the line, she seized the prisoner under the armpits, and despite the resistance of the officers, began to drag him down the street.

"Drag us out!" she shouted to her friends.

"Drag him to the river! Drown him, but don't let them have him!"

A policeman struck her over the head with his club, and freeing one hand, she sent him staggering back into the crowd. Another jumper for her, but she caught him around the neck, throttled him and threw him over her shoulder. Finally she was dragged down, but still kept her grip upon the slave. The crowd massed around and pushed them to the river, where she tore the man away from the officers by main strength and then threw him into a boat, which speedily put out, she following in a ferryboat.

On the other side, he was taken and hurried to a house near by. Some men were storming the place when Harriet came up, and two of them, who had been shot, were lying on the stairs. She rushed up the staircase, followed by several men, burst in the door, knocked down the first officer who attacked her, threw another through the window, caught up Nalle, threw him over her shoulder, as she had many times thrown a flour-barrel in the days of her slavery, and carried him down stairs. A gentleman, who was driving a fast horse past, pulled up and asked what the disturbance was. With her marvelous instinct for discerning friends, Harriet appealed to him, crying out that the man was a slave, and would be taken back to slavery unless he could get away. Instantly the man jumped out of his carriage.

"This is a blood horse," said he. "Drive him till he drops."

With a cry of thanks, Harriet lifted Nalle into the buggy. He was driven to Schenectady and subsequently made his way to Canada.

When the war broke out a new field opened before her. At this time she had settled in Auburn, and was making that city her headquarters when she was not on some expedition to the slave countries. Governor Andrew, of Massachusetts, knowing Harriet of old, sent to her to ask if she would be ready to give any required service as spy or scout to the Union army. After seeing that her dependants in Auburn would be taken care of, she was ready to go to the South. Of her war record in detail little is known. Sarah H. Bradford, who has written Harriet's history, published under the title, "Harriet, the Moses of Her People," writes of her army career.

She was often under fire from both armies. She led our forces through the jungle and swamp. She gained the confidence of the slaves by her cheery words and songs, and obtained from them much valuable information. When our army and gunboats first appeared, many of the poor negroes were as much afraid of the Yankees as of their own masters. It was almost impossible to win their confidence, but to Harriet they would tell anything, and so it became quite important that she should accompany the expedition going up the rivers or into other unexplored parts of the country. Wherever she came the negroes hailed her as the prophetess of the "Good time coming."—Christian Cynosure.

An Indignation Meeting of Birds.

Much has been said on reasoning by animals. If the fact there can be no doubt, of its nature or little is known. But I think less still is known of the emotions of animals. Take an affectionate dog—how he suffers from jealousy! our little Prince was completely miserable if a mistress took the neighbor's baby on her lap. Several times I have been eye-witness to notions of a high order among birds—namely, sympathy with other birds in distress.

When a college student I was taken very ill by my sophomore year, and gaining strength at last, slowly, the doctor ordered me into the country.

I boarded at a farm-house, and gave myself entirely up to the woods and fields.

Through an entire summer I studied lovingly the ways of the birds, and determined to raise some young thrushes and take them with me to my city home in the fall.

My selection was a nest of brown thrushes. It was in a thick mass of bushes in a swamp—an entanglement of wild growth, and almost impenetrable.

Every day I watched, from the eggs to the all young. I resolved to allow the old birds two weeks, then I would assume the raising of the young ones.

At last the day came, and all my preparations were made. Taking with me a cage, I forked my way through the dense undergrowth. Very carefully I removed the nest, and was trying to get it into the cage, when the female bird arrived. She uttered a cry, almost a shriek, and disappeared, but returned immediately with her mate.

The two birds made a wild effort to drive me away, even flying at me, with every demonstration of rage and distress. Then, to my surprise, my both left.

I now felt so mean that I at once set about putting the nest back in the bush, but it gave me a good deal of trouble, as I could not make it stay in its place.

What now? The two old birds were back, accompanied by a whole bevy of wild birds. The entire copiece was alive with them. They seemed bent on picking my eyes out. I had to screen my face by holding the cage before it.

As to these birds—their number and variety and conduct—all together, it was an extraordinary scene. It seemed to me there were at least fifty of these indignant little bodies, and perhaps a dozen species, some flying at me, and all making angry demonstrations.

There were brown thrushes, song thrushes, cat-birds and several of the warblers. Such an uproar—mewing, shrieking, twittering and other cries, a babel of bird-songs! It all meant distress and rage. But such a mix-up! All talked at once. The one key-note of the discord was distress and indignation.

I got out of that swamp a wiser and better wretch. My conscience smote me, and my only place lay in the thought that I had done my best to undo the mischief I had wrought.

The next morning I again went to the swamp to see how matters stood. How softly I worked my way through the bushes! How deathly still everything was! The young birds had gone. I did so want to know how the old birds had managed matters, and how it fared with the little ones.

That indignation meeting of the birds occurred a great many years ago, but the scene is still vivid to my mind.

One winter, just after a snow-storm, a bevy of snow-birds appeared near my house. I fed them crumbs, and they stayed with us several days. They got a little bold, even coming up to the kitchen steps to get their rations. There was, however, one exception.

A fence separated the old apple orchard from the house-lot, and I observed that one bird kept on the fence-rail, never venturing nearer to the feeding-place. To my surprise and delight, the reason of it was soon made plain.

The poor little fellow was lame of one wing, so he must not be too bold, as in the event of danger he must have some vantage for escape. So an old bird took him feeding-crums at every feeding-time.

But the most remarkable act in my knowledge of a bird in sympathy with another in distress, was performed by a robin not two hundred yards from my house. It was a deed of daring, and in the highest degree heroic.

A sparrow-hawk had pounced on a sparrow in the street, and was bearing it away. A robin, from his maple-tree, witnessed the act, and instantly started in pursuit.

High in the air, the noble little fellow caught up with the buccaneer, and one could hear the short, jerky cries of the hawk, as the robin was "pecking in" and making the feathers fly.

The hawk dropped his prey, and the robin returned to the maple-tree, where he had left his mate. The sparrow made the best of time to get back to his kind.—Samuel Lockwood in our Doubt Animals.

FEATHERS IN LADIES' HATS.—Professor William Henry Flower, of the Natural History Museum, is such a high authority, that his recent letter to the Times must carry great weight. He says:

"The lovely, delicate plumes of the small white herons or egret can only be procured by the destruction of the birds during the season in which they have their nests and young, as then only do these feathers develop. In the trade, for some unknown reason, they are called 'osprey,' though the real bird of that name, a kind of fishing hawk, produces no ornamental plumes. Notwithstanding all that has been said, the garden-party season now beginning shows that the fashion is as prevalent as ever. I have recently noticed many of the gentlest and most kind-hearted among my lady friends, including some who are members of the Society for the Protection of Birds, and who, I am sure, would never knowingly do any injury to any living creature, adorned with these very plumes. Why is this? Simply because, in order to keep up their trade and dispose of their stock, the purveyors of female raiment, to save the consciences of their customers, have invented and widely propagated a monstrous fiction, and are everywhere selling the real feathers warranted as artificial. Within the last few days I have examined numbers of plumes, the wearers of which were priding themselves on their humanity, relying upon the assurance of the milliner that they were not real egret's feathers, but manufactured. In every case it did not take a very close scrutiny to ascertain that they were unquestionably genuine. The only 'manufacture' consisted in cutting the plume in two, and fixing the upper and lower half side by side, so that a single feather does duty for two in the 'brush.' Thus one of the most beautiful of birds is being swept off the face of the earth, under circumstances of peculiar cruelty, to minister to a passing fashion, bolstered up by a glaring falsehood."—London Friend.

THE POWER OF SINCERITY.—It is related that when Joseph Hume, the infidel, was taxed with inconsistency on going to listen to John Brown, the golly Scotch minister of Haddington, he replied, "I don't believe all he says, but he does, and once a week I like to hear a man who believes what he says. Why, whatever I think, that man preaches as though he thought the Lord Jesus Christ were at his elbow."

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 8, 1856.

A correspondent calls our attention to a communication inserted in The British Friend, which states or implies that true Friends have lately found the condition of the meetings of London Yearly Meeting so uncomfortable that they have tacitly consented to remain absent; thus preventing the Yearly Meeting from being truly representative of the condition of the Body.

Our correspondent, who is a member of a Yearly Meeting on this continent, in which a separation has taken place, adds, "That is, I fear, a mistake on their part. We have seen too late where our Friends erred: First, When unsonant doctrines were broached, those promulgating them should at once have been stopped. Judgment should have been placed on the offenders. It is false charity to spare the wolf, and not to pity the sheep who are wounded."

Secondly.—When through remissness on the part of the elders in not fulfilling this duty, the wrong part appears to get control of the meeting, Friends should be all the more diligent in attending all their meetings, not only for worship, but for discipline. I firmly believe, that if Friends firmly put shoulder to shoulder, abiding in the patience, meekness and power of Christ, they would outwear their adversaries, and a way of escape would be opened. A patient labor and travail of soul, with strong crying and prayer to God, who has all power, is what is called for; nor could I ever see that forsaking this post of suffering, and allowing that rampant spirit to have all its own way, proved conducive to the welfare of the body."

Amid the many discouraging symptoms which afflict the love of religion, it is somewhat cheering to meet at times with those whose faith in the overruling power and goodness of the Lord seems fresh and lively. A recent letter from a correspondent in a distant Yearly Meeting says: "By faith I can see that Christ's Church shall yet withstand the stormy waves which so threateningly strive to overwhelm it. Still I believe there must needs be on the part of those who are permitted to stand firm, a digging down deep to the rock, that each one for himself may know of having that sure foundation, Christ Jesus, as that on which his faith is built. At this time of general awaking, may we not hope the Church of Christ, the world over, to come more into the unity of the Spirit as one body, with one life.

May we then, dear Friends, be watchful and diligent, that through Grace Divine we may do our part faithfully and well, and leave the rest to Him, who overleth all things to his glory, his arm of mercy yet wields omnipotence, and is yet stretched out to save all the poor of men who put their trust in Him."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has issued a proclamation warning all persons against violations of the neutrality laws. Recent Supreme Court interpretations are rehearsed; the law to be vigorously enforced, and the cooperation of all good citizens is invoked. The United States Treasury statement shows a net increase in the public debt, less than in the Treasury, during Seventh Month, of $10,857,258. Total cash in the Treasury, 8,551,863,747.

The official Treasury statement shows that the receipts of the Government for Seventh Month were $29,099,987, and the expenditures were $42,088,468, a deficit for the month of $12,988,481.

The United States Treasury gold reserve at the close of business on the 3d instant stood at $110,085,890. The day's withdrawals were $485,100.

A severe storm struck St. Anthony, Iowa, on the night of the 27th ult., and nearly every building in Iowa is wrecked or badly damaged. Columbus, Ohio, was visited by heavy wind and rain on the next night, and several buildings were unroofed.

Cities and towns in the Indiana gas belt have been inundated as a result of the successive cloudbursts occurring there, and the situation is said to be serious. At Anderson, three men were killed by lightning. At Ellettsville, a woman and child were washed away during the afternoon, and a number of dikes at other places burst.

The Fox River levee, west of Alexandria, Missouri, has broken in two different places, and the water from that stream has inundated 5,000 acres of farming land. Two families living in the flooded district have been compelled to move to higher lands.

Excessive rains and high temperature are reported throughout the country the early part of last week. Fifteen fatalities occurred at Gloster, Ohio. Flood augmented the damage caused by the wind. A cloudburst occurred in Berks Co., Pa. Many deaths and property loss are reported in the localities.

The 30th ultimo was extremely hot in the West and South. At St. Louis 34 persons were prostrated by the heat. In Carolina the highest temperature of the year was registered—102 degrees in the shade. In Carlyle, Ill., 104 degrees was the highest temperature and the heat was fatal.

A correspondent of the Voice says: "It is a remarkable fact that during the last four years of 550 Low License in Pennsylvania, the convict population actually decreased from a total average of 1,262 in 1885, to 1,176 in 1888. Then came the High License epoch and, instead of a reduction of crime and a promoting order as was expected, a reverse order was received a renewed stimulus. Instead of continuing to decrease, the number of convicts at once began increasing with an appalling rapidity, until in 1895, instead of the 1,716 convicts left by Low License there was a grand total of 3,630 convicts confined in the three penal institutions of the State."

On the 30th ult. the 49 P. M. train on the Reading Railroad, bound down to Atlantic City, while moving at a high rate of speed, crashed into an excursion train on the West Jersey Railroad, at the crossing on the "Meadows," just outside of Atlantic City, N. J., about half-past six o'clock. Forty-four persons were killed or mortally injured, and 110 killed all but two among the excursion train, which included a party from Bridgeton and Salem. It is said that the Reading train had the "right of way," but that the signals were set so as to justify the engineer of the excursion train in moving on the crossing.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 353, which is 25 more than the previous week, and 35 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 196 were under one year of age; 265 were males and 268 females; 82 died of cholera infantum; 45 of consumption; 42 of marasmus; 38 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 35 of heart disease; 29 of pneumonia; 14 of nephritis; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of pneumonia; 12 of phthisis; 12 of convulsions; 11 of apoplexy; 10 of old age; 9 of bronchitis, and 8 from casualties.

HOGS.—5 1/2 cts. for Western, the only grades in. FOREIGN.—Dr. Jameson and the other Transvaal raiders were convicted in London on Seventh Month 28th. Jameson was sentenced to fifteen months' imprisonment, and the others to from ten to three months' imprisonment.

On the 29th ult. the Irish Land Bill was passed by the British House of Commons, and on the 30th went to the Lords.

A powder magazine at Fumfkirchen, in Hungary, exploded last week. More than one hundred persons were injured, many killed, and the town hall and a number of other buildings were destroyed.

Nineteen persons, two of them women, have been convicted and sentenced to death at Agrar, Hungary, for organized brigandage and murder.

An imperial ukase issued by the Czar declares that the Moscow authorities are answerable for the disaster on the Holodny Park.

Advices received at Washington from the Marine Hospital at Alexandria, Egypt, show that the cholera outbreak there has got beyond the control of the sanitary authorities. In one week there were 1,700 deaths, and since the beginning of the epidemic until Seventh Month 11th there were 8,069 deaths.

Advices from Constantinople, dated the 26th of last month, say that the city of Constantinople, except by telegraph, was isolated from the surrounding country.

The German gunboat Ilie was lost in a typhoon on the 23rd of last month, off the Shan Tzug promontory. China, and seventy-five of her officers and crew perished. Only ten or eleven of the crew were saved. A cablegram from Shanghai to the country correspondent says: "The recent disastrous tidal wave along the coast of Northern Japan has been paralleled by a similar phenomenon on the coast of Haichan, northeast of the Province of Kiangsu, in which Shanghai is situated. The news of the disaster did not reach here until the 15th inst. The lack of facilities for communication with the part of the country devastated. On July 26th there suddenly appeared in the Yellow Sea a large bank of water that was rising shoreward with terrific velocity. The water off the coast is shallow, and when the wave was some distance away, it began to comb, and the roaring could be heard for a great distance. From the stories of eye-witnesses and the reports of people in the country back on the coast, the wave was five miles wide. Thousands of tons of water were thrown for miles inland, and everything in its path was swept away. Many villages were entirely destroyed, and it is estimated that fully 100,000 people perished. All the cattle were drowned, and the rice fields were covered with water. It is expected that the survivors will meet with worse fate than death by drowning, for with the destruction of rice-fields famine will stare them in the face in the autumn."

The reader may have been struck with the prominent array of appalling deaths, casualties, disasters and crimes in the above record. It is intended to awaken feelings of serious thoughtfulness in our minds, and the hearts of many should be turned to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe in earnest pleadings for his mercy to poor, fallible, ungrateful man.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1852. Fifth Month 16th.—Dear Hannah Gibbons spoke to-day, (1 John, iv: 1), "Believe, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God; every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit that confesseth not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is not of God, and this is the spirit of anti-Christ, whereof ye have heard that it should come, and even now already is it in the world." She felt much desire that the faith of some might be strengthened, also warned the halting, "My spirit shall not always strive with man." Oh, Holy Father, turn me, and I shall be turned.
Enable me in school to be very watchful over my words in order to set a good example before the children. "Righteousness exalteth a nation, out sin is a reproach to any people."

23d.—If any man knoweth to do the will of God, and doeth it not, to him it is sin. All unrighteousness is sin, and again the wages of sin is death. I wish that these passages, which have been dwelling on my mind late, would create the fear of my Heavenly Father in my mind, and drive me to the obedience of the cross. As dear Samuel Cope said in a communication, "instead of settling down under the cross, it became harder and harder." "Not very one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."

30th.—First-day. Surely God is merciful to me, visiting me often. He has been stretching out his hand of mercy for years, calling me to be his. May I not be cast off at last. Dear Mary Kite was at our meeting to-day, and after encouraging other feeble ones, addressed the young. May I submit that I may be washed, hat I may indeed have a part with Him. Of late I have been reading Thomas Shillito. I had to read it with tears, it seemed so full of real life, I love to read it. How good it is for me to be here, with friend Jeffers and Ann, who rather strengthen me in my feelings, than terrible or treat me ill. May I be thankful for his day's favors.

Sixth Month 2nd.—This was Monthly Meeting day, and in it I did desire that He who had power to cast seven devils out of Mary Magdalene, would cast the wickedness out of me, and make me willing to submit to the yoke of Christ.

I believe my prayer was heard, for I do feel a greater willingness, but fear that I shall not persevere. Dear Hannah Gibbons spoke: "When I sent you forth without purse or scrip, lacked ye anything? and they said, nothing." Eleazer was to have the garments of his father Aaron.
Oh, that "thy word might be a lamp to my feet, and a light unto my path." Here am I. Afterwards — spoke "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you and ordained you that ye should go and bring forth fruit." How thankful I ought to be that He in mercy visits me, instead of casting me off in my sins. May I be faithful. Dear Mary Kite was so kind as to speak to me after meeting. She opened a concern in the meeting to visit the families of Birmingham Preparative Meeting, and Martha Jeffers offering to accompany her, their proposal was united with, and they set at liberty.

Sixth Month 6th.—In meeting I tried to be humble. — spoke upon the attendance of meetings. "We cannot add anything to God, for He is perfect, but it is our duty to present ourselves to Him and to acknowledge our thankfulness for his preservation of us." I must try to be nothing.

7th.—Oh Lord, thou who hast been the Author, be also the Finisher of my salvation, and enable me to be faithful in following thy voice.
Teach me to distinguish it from my own will.

20th.—I thought the meeting would have been silent to-day, but just before its close — arose, mentioning, that many were careful to find out their ancestry, and to secure and establish every fact concerning it, that they may not be deprived of their inheritance, desiring that some might be as careful to know that they have an inheritance in heaven, having a right to enter the blessed place prepared for the obedient, and further,
"faith without works is dead." "Show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works." Warning some to "examine your yourselves, prove your yourselves, whether ye be in the faith, yea or nay." I could but at once conclude that my faith was dead, consequently that I had none, for I do not work the works that seem required. Oh, Holy Father, my heart is very stubborn and hard. Help is in thy power. Put away my stony heart, and give me one that will love and serve thee. Last week I thought I would serve thee, but did not. Help me, Heavenly Father, a poor, wicked creature, that I may obey and have faith and receive the end of faith, even the salvation of my soul. How thankful I ought to be for this day's visitation to one so wicked.

27th.—Dear Heavenly Father, take the government of myself into thy holy hands. Be pleased not to take away thy mercy. Turn thy hand upon me again and again, "till thou take away my rebellious spirit," purge away the dross, the tin and the reprobate silver. Reduce me to nothing; it is only thou that can do it.

Seventh Month 11th.—May the Lord be with me and grant a breaking up of my hard heart.
Forsake me not.

On Fifth-day dear Hannah Gibbons spoke,
"But I am a worm and no man," holding out encouragement for some under such a dispensation. I wonder if I may take some of the encouragement, or shall I cover myself with a covering not of the Lord's spirit; and to-day
—"Mark the perfect man and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." I believe I am stifling convictions again. May I be broken, so as to give up the whole heart.
Here is a beautiful piece of poetry in THE FRIEND, so descriptive of what I wish for my state.

NOT AS I WILL BUT AS THOU WILT.

Saviour! to thee I bring
A bruised bosom for thy healing balm;
I fain would ask for thy all-conquering word,
To make my tossed heart calm.

Oh! how me lowly down,
Bend my unhumbl'd will, that I may be Drawn by resistless, but by welcome power,
In brokenness to thee.

If thou hast lain thy hand
On the bright glories of my dotting heart;
And wils, with skillful ministry to break
The links that will not part,

Then Father, wilt thou send Thy gifts of willingness and strength to bear,
Make my resigned and contrite spirit bend,
Lowly to thee in prayer.

Prayer, that to thee, my soul,
In all thou doest—all thou yet mayest do
May, armed with faith and gift with holy trust
Own thou art just and true.

Send thy transforming grace
Into this bosom, which so craves thy love,
And take the dearest, all I have on earth,
So, I am thine above.

Seventh Month 18th.—Silent Meeting here at Woodstown. I hope to lead a self-denying life while at home, but fear that I shall often be tempted to depart from it. How poor I am and what favors I receive!

On Fifth-day last I went to meeting, and presently three women Friends came in. Anne Tatum from Salem and Mary Matlack from Woodbury. They spoke to me so kindly it made my heart really feel as though I wanted to be good and merit so much kindness.

25th.—Our Friends here from town. It is pleasant to see them, but I feel that I can add very little to their enjoyment, my spirit is too worldly, and I am very wicked. They went to meeting, and I remained at home to take care of the children. Mother does not take the FRIEND paper and I miss it very much. It seems like a little monitor.

Eighth Month 1st.—I went to Meeting today. Mother invited T. L., wife and brothers here to tea. This company was very pleasant.
They seem like meek men, Thomas particularly, so unassuming, so consistent. I wish I were like him, in trying to be nothing in this world.

First-day.—After First-day I have to sit down and repent of my pride and stubbornness.

8th.—Silent meeting, here in West Chester. I did try to get into a solid waiting frame, and believe that I succeeded through Divine help. Ah, me! this vacation has not altogether been spent in the service of God; some few crosses and sweet spots to look back to, but mostly have to lament sins without number. Oh! for meek and quiet obedience. Holy Father, be merciful to me, and enable me to bring forth fruit meet for repentance, that I may be forgiven.

11th.—Quarterly Meeting so good to me. I was not reproved and condemned as I expected to be, but I hope a willingness was wrought to follow the straight path. Samuel Leeds, from New Jersey, spoke first. Oh, it seemed so good to me. May I be like good old Joshua in choosing "the Lord for my portion;" just my portion to serve Him. Next, dear William Kite spoke. Can I be of good courage? Can I be of good cheer because my Saviour has overcome the world that is tempting me? Can any of these good words be for me? In the last meeting dear Phebe Roberts spoke, quoting these words to the giving further encouragement, "Why art thou cast down, oh my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me. Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the help of my countenance," closing with "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Oh, that I were only fit to take part of these promises to myself. Dear Mary Kite spoke to me after meeting. When kind friends spoke to me, it makes me feel so glad.

While away during vacation, my certificate was received here, and dear Mary with friend Jeffers were appointed to visit me. I am not worthy of having such good friends to see me.

15th.—Silent meeting to-day. I tried to worship God, but do not know whether I am humble enough or not. Oh! may I be kept low in the valley of humiliation.

On Fifth-day dear Mary Kite came up, and she with dear friend Jeffers went in the morning to see two other young Friends, but they were not at home. In the evening they sat down quietly with me; poor unworthy me. If trials and afflictions await me through life, Oh, Heavenly Father, be with me and support me, and let them make me humble and purify me, that I may live hereafter in heaven. "Behold, I will refine thee, but not with silver." I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction. "Thine are we David and on thy side, thou son of Jesse."

Be pleased, Heavenly Father, to make me know my own heart, to see the great sin that is there concealed and enable me to overcome. I do believe thou hast in measure enabled me to give up. Oh! be pleased in mercy to enable me to do so still more.

22d.—Samuel Leeds here at meeting to-day. We were instructed to wait more deeply on God in our religious meetings. Oh! may I do it, that I may know my own heart, and see how I stand in the sight of my Heavenly Father. From thee alone all good and perfect gifts come. Enable me to say in sincerity, "Not my will, but thine, oh Heavenly Father, be done. If thou art touched with a feeling of our infirmities, be pleased to look with pity upon me, in my pride, and continue thy merciful visitations yet longer. I will try to obey, if thou wilt give me peace and assurance in thee.

29th.—How merciful my Heavenly Father is to me. If I do not bow soon He will not always strive with me, I am assured. He has visited me, by convictions, time and again, his servants have spoken to me, and my warning visions have been many. May I never forget my last one. My drive towards the stream, instead of going up over the bridge and over the narrow path. I stopped just before I was drowned. Ah! may I be saved at last. How my wicked guide was with me, telling me that was as good a way as any; just go that way. And the dear little children would now and then hold me back because of my fear of injuring them. May I never be tempted so again, or may I never give up so much to the temptation, as I did that night before going to bed!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A writer in THE FRIEND of Sixth Month 27th, has set forth what seem to him serious objections to life insurance. He bases his objections mainly on what he regards as "religious or Christian grounds," viewing it as a speculation upon our "uncertainty" or "want of knowledge of future events." That life insurance depends for its operation upon the uncertainty of the tenure of each individual life is very true, and primarily it is designed to enable the insured to make a provision for his family in case death should unexpectedly come to him, and find them without other means of support. May it not be well to observe that all future events of our lives are involved in uncertainty so far as our human sight is concerned? And are we not daily taking means to protect ourselves, our families, and our possessions against possible harm and danger, which we would not take if we could foresee the future and knew these dangers would escape us? If the captain of a sea-going vessel knew that he would have a safe voyage, that life boats, life preservers and other appliances for the safety of passengers and crew would not be needed, he would not cumber the vessel with them. It is because of uncertainty that he provides them, and who of us would take passage with him if he did not? Numerous illustrations might be given of human contrivances and devices deemed by all to be necessary in order to provide against the uncertainty of some future event or events. Why, we may ask, should life insurance be condemned because it involves the same principle?

On this point the writer further says, "It fosters and encourages the spirit of speculation, the desire to acquire wealth suddenly without giving any equivalent for it." Life insurance seems to lack the essential element of speculation as above defined, namely: "the desire to acquire wealth suddenly without giving any equivalent for it,"—in other words, the desire to profit or gain at the expense of others. It offers to the insured no opportunity "to acquire wealth;" he can receive no personal benefit; it simply affords him a means of making a provision for his family in the event of his death, and nature forbids that he or his family should desire the occurrence of this event in order that the latter may realize on his policy.

In its simplest form, life insurance consists of an arrangement amongst a number of people whereby on the death of one, the survivors contribute a sum for the relief of his family. Similarly in fire insurance, if one member loses a house or barn by fire, his loss is made up by the others. The underlying principle here seems to be the equalization of losses, the "bearing" or sharing "of one another's burdens." Companies as they now exist are organizations for carrying out this principle in a practical, safe and efficient manner. In stating this objection, the writer seems to have had in mind the fact that sums of money are sometimes paid to beneficiaries where but little has been paid out in premiums. But this circumstance is not peculiar to life insurance; it represents a condition inseparable from any system of sharing losses or dividing burdens.

In objection second, the writer says, "The operations of life insurance may be beneficial in particular cases but are oppressive in others, and gives as illustration: First, "the extreme poor who most need the benefits of it, are entirely unable to procure them." This may be true, but may we not say with equal force that they are unable to live in comfortable houses, to feed, clothe and educate their children, in a word to enjoy the comforts and blessings of our Heavenly Father as their more fortunate neighbors may do? But do any of us feel that we must refrain from partaking of these bounties and blessings in reasonable degree because the "very poor" are unable to have them? In the same connection it is said that many being "unable longer to meet the necessary payments, the insurance lapses and they suffer loss" and that they are "unable to use their savings when they most need them." However true this may have been in the early history of life insurance, under the present system of paid-up policies and cash values, the policyholder is allowed to withdraw from the company without suffering a loss proportionately greater than he would expect to sustain in voluntarily withdrawing his capital from a business partnership. Indeed it is a serious question whether under the practice of some companies' liberality to the member who withdraws has not gone so far as to do injustice to those who remain. Instead of not being able to use their savings when they most need them, the system of cash values frequently provides the insured with savings which he would probably not otherwise have had, the rest of his estate having been swept away by business disaster. While it may be true as stated that the extreme poor are unable to procure the benefits of life insurance to any great extent, it is nevertheless a fact, that in a large proportion of cases where insurance money is paid to the family it finds them without other means of support. The instances in which life insurance thus comes to the relief of poverty and distress, and brings temporal joy and comfort to thousands of homes would fill volumes.

In the next paragraph the idea is held out that in many companies life insurance has become very profitable to stockholders, etc. If this were strictly correct, it could hardly form a valid objection to life insurance, but would rather call for reform in the method of conducting the business. As a matter of fact in this country, the business is conducted almost wholly on the "Mutual" plan, that is, all surplus that accrues is accumulated for the benefit of the policyholders and is distributed to them in the way of dividends. Only two or three companies out of about fifty do any stock business.

Third: it is objected, "Insurance is a temptation to crime," etc. The accumulation of property in any manner whatever, carries with it this temptation in some degree, as the columns of the newspapers and records of courts abundantly show, but it will hardly be claimed that this is sufficient reason for discouraging an honest effort not only to provide for present temporal wants but to lay up a reasonable store for future needs.

Finally, the writer says: "But above all their objections to life insurance for Christians, it is regarded as a distrust of Divine Providence." The following extract from the editorial in THE FRIEND relating to this subject is commended to those who may have read the above objection: "While we sympathize with our correspondent's concern that we should have faith in the goodness and superintending care of our Heavenly Father, we do not see that this necessarily conflicts with that foresight and prudent care which leads men to provide for the future wants of themselves and families." It is in this light the subject is viewed by the many Christian people (including a goodly number in our own Society) who have believed it right for them to make provision for their families by life insurance. They cannot view it as a distrust of Divine Providence, for fully concurring in what our friend says of our dependence on Him, "who maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust;" that He "holds the events of our lives in his hand and dispenses them as He sees meet," they nevertheless believe that it is in accord with his will that they should provide for the temporal wants of those whom He has committed to their care, not only the wants of to-day but of to-morrow; and they believe He looks with approval upon an honest effort to lay up a reasonable competence for future needs. And realizing that it may be his will that their lives shall be cut short without their having accumulated a sufficient store to keep their families from want, many have given thanks to Him for enabling them to provide through life insurance against this contingency. And so when the Christian widow with her family of helpless children receives from the insurance company the sum which her husband's foresight has provided, she accepts it with thankful heart as coming from Him of whom the Psalmist said, "A father of the fatherless and a judge of the widows is God in his holy habitation."

A friend has sent for insertion in THE FRIEND two selections, one on "Contentment," and the other on "The disease of apprehensiveness," accompanying them with a letter which says:

"The article on contentment arrested my attention particularly, because of my great desire for that virtue for myself. My great desire is never to be greatly disturbed by what are sometimes called 'outward circumstances.' It is one thing to hold the general belief that 'all is ordered for the best,' and to be convinced that that is the only right view to hold in going through life; and it is another thing to be so permeated with this as a living and continual belief that every disturbing thing that comes along our path will be only very momentary in its effect. I have greatly desired, and I may say, have asked for a mind of perfect quietness, a spirit of entire resignation, let occurrences be what they will, but I do find a faint-heartedness recurring more often than is consistent with the belief mentioned above."

[It seemed to the Editor, that the letter might be appropriately published in connection with the articles themselves.—Ed.]

HOW TO BE CONTENTED.

"If we cannot bring our minds to our minds, then let us try to bring our minds to our minds. This is an old Puritan minister's version of Paul's cheerful message to his Philippian brethren: 'I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therein to be content.' The great apostle was not content to be in a low spiritual state, and therefore he pressed toward the goal of a higher spiritual life every day. But he was contented to be where his Master put him, to bear all the hard knocks and endure all the rough usage that he had to encounter in the path of duty. Paul's spirit was like a watch. 'You may carry it up and down with you, and shake it either and thither; but the mainspring is not put out of order, nor do the wheels lose their regular motion. Paul was knocked about with cruel treatment and fierce persecutions, but the mainspring of love to Jesus was not broken in his heart, and the wheels of his consecrated activity ran on undisturbed.'

"Christian contentment is the cheerful acquiescence of the soul to the will of God in all conditions and under all weathers. It is the habit of the mind, just as faith is the habit of a healthy Christian and benevolence is the habit of a philanthropist. The great, brave apostle learned it where he learned Christ, and he learned it from Christ, and in a pretty severe and costly school. Like every precious thing, we must pay the price for it. And like most precious things, it is quite too rare, and the thoroughly contented people are in the minority. We may overrate this grace, but it seems to us that genuine contentment, that is ready to let God have his own way to let God put us where He chooses, even though the furnace be hot, is more scarce than it ought to be. He or she has attained to it who has learned to say, under disappointments the most bitter and trials which give the last turn to the screw and make the blood start, 'Thy will, O God, be done!'

"This style of contentment is not reserved for sublime occasions, it is visible in all the little unnumbered events in everyday life. It is patient not only under death strokes, but under petty vexations and wounding words and neglects; it does not worry over hard seats or boring visitors or stupid servants or a crying child. It manages to be happy in a small house when it cannot afford a three-story mansion. So rich is it in God's promises and the sweet smiles of the Master and a good title to heaven, that it does not mind wearing a coarse coat and a tudge on foot toward the better country. It wears the herb called 'heart's ease' in its bosom; it finds a cool spring to drink of in the lowliest vales of life, and catches grand outlooks from the summit of every steep hill it climbs. As it trends along its patient path it chants John Bunyan's quaint, simple song:

"I am content with what I have,
Be it little or much;
And, Lord, contentment still I crave, Because Thou bleesest such;
Fulness to me a burthen is;
As I go on pilgrimage
Here little and hereafter bliss
Is best from age to age."

"Would to God that we were all more contented with our mercies and more discontented with ourselves. It is the trying to live on external conditions that makes a Christian restless and wretched. A soul at peace with God and itself, a soul that delights in making other people happy, can sleep sweetly, like the old-time patriarch, with a stone for a pillow."—Theodore L. Cayler in The Examiner.

THE DISEASE OF APPREHENSIVENESS.

"That quality of mind which leads us to too great regret for what is past, and to too insistent and morbid dwelling on our conduct in the past leads us to the apprehension of trouble and anxity for ourselves in the future. At the best, this apprehensiveness is a mental and spiritual disease.

"Some minds are slaves to one form of this disease, and some to the other. In one view, those who call up the past to regret it are less to be pitied than those who live under the dread of the future; for the past is fixed, and the very inexorableness of the possibility of change lends a certainty to past events, however regrettable, that tends in the end to calm the mind. But those who live under constant apprehension for the future have a myriad and ever-changing host of fears to allay,—as many, indeed, as a fertile, and oftentimes morbidly vivid, imagination can supply. And there is no certainty of any kind connected with this glance into the future, except the certainty that such persons will make themselves (and, in consequence, their friends) unutterably miserable. To them the air is full of voices crying, at the most unseasonable times, 'What is? What is?'—the rest of the exclamation filled out with whatever miserable anxiety at that moment haunts the soul.

"The person who is naturally apprehensive has a greater opportunity of glorifying God than one of a naturally buoyant and sanguine temper. He does not, it may be, so often as one of the non-apprehensive kind show out the cheerful or the calm and restful side of Christian life, but he may gain such a conquest over the army of his fears, groundless or real, that God, who sees all our inner, intense conflicts, and who appreciates every atom of actual trust, and what it has cost each one according to his peculiar make-up, will be most greatly glorified by the effort of the fearful soul to trust him.

"The possibilities of loss of friends, their sickness, sorrow, trouble of all kinds, are so great, that nothing is sufficient to allay the torture of the fearful mind but the great thought of God; and not of God in the abstract, but of God in his personal love to us individually. This alone can not only support us, but can exert exorcising power on the demon of apprehensiveness, and bid it quit the soul forever. The power of trust goes beyond this. It turns our fears into courage. If God be for us, who, or what, can be against us? It gives us vigor to be aggressors, to take the offensive instead of the defensive position, and gives us strength to glorify God by a calm and loving acceptance of his will. Our power then is reserved for action, and ceases to be dissipated in dread.

"To the suffering, apprehensive soul, what sound can be more cheering than the voice of him who speaks in the midnight of our fears?—'It is I. Be not afraid.' What but the bright and calm image of Jesus just beside us is enough to set our quaking hearts at rest? It is the image of Jesus Christ, thought upon, made real to ourselves, actual to us, that enables us to overcome our fearfulness and to rejoice in the Lord. Let the fearful give thanks that God is so good to us, and believe the depth of his personal love, and honor Him by a great and joyous faith. This apprehensiveness is, after all, but the bitter, perhaps the bitterest, dregs of a self that is still assertive even in the renewed heart.

"I will fear no evil" is written on the banner of the children of light; but, while they lift aloft their standard, it is sometimes a trembling hand that carries it and a cowardly heart that marches beneath it. Nevertheless, the bruised reed will be not break, nor will He quench the smoking flax till He send forth judgment unto victory. There is victory for the most fearful, the most timorous, the most apprehensive, if he will but strengthen himself in God."—S. S. Times.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
"IN MEMORIAM."

And still we mourn! Time cannot heal
The bleeding of the wounds we feel;
Close round our hearts, a living thing,
The tendrils of our loss will cling,
And though a thousand months should wane
Most evermore vibrate in pain.

O sainted Friend! The earth grew dark
To some who loved thee, when thy bark
Dropt softly down the silent stream
That sweeps the bounds of life, whose gleam
Still brightened as it bore thee on
To meet the glad, immortal dawn.

It meets a sacrifice, dead heart,
To speak thy praise—to strive to part
One virtue from the perfect whole,
To stamp upon the written scroll,
Or sever one adorning grace
From thy illumined, fitting place.

For whether in thy genial cheer
That summed the encircling atmosphere,
Or in thy courteous supreme
As chivalric as knightly dream,
Thy charity which loved to bless,
Or thy unrivalled tenderness,

Thy rare humility profound
Which clothed thee as a garment round,
And, ever throbbing, full and free
Thy living, warm humanity—
In all we trace the true accord
Unto thy Master and thy Lord.

Thy Master! Ah! we hear no more
Thy pleading eloquence outpour,
In loving service proud to raise
Thy testimony to his praise—
Obedient to each whispered call
Of Him who was thy all in all.

We gather still, though thou art gone,
And faintly, dimly, struggle on,
But if that vacant spot will press
In vivid sense of loneliness,
And tear-wet lashes more bespeak
Affection than devotion meek,

May He who wept at Lazarus' grave
Still pity, and forgive and save,
He knows our weakness and our loss,
The weight of every added cross,
That ne'er again, how'er we pine
Will dawn for us a soul like thine.

No sympathy like thine unfolds,
No spirit strength like thine upholds,
Our faithful confidant and friend,
Unfaltering, changeless, to the end.
And when the Angel wing outspread
Above thy bared and silvered head,

As, kneeling at the Gates of Pearl,
The glories of the unseen world,
Through open portals streaming down,
And nigh thy brow the victor's crown,
Thou bore us with a suppliant cry
Unto the very Throne on high.

O may the memory of that prayer
Be with thy followers everywhere,
And may thy spirit yet abide,
Our inspiration and our guide,
Who now beyond the forming river
Art shining "as the stars forever."

SEEDS OF COMBINATION with God, and training and discipline in his school are indispensable in the formation of character that qualifies for future usefulness. The wisdom of this world can never supply this need.—M. B. Miller in The Earnest Christian.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
King Crabs in Delaware Bay.

IN THE FRIEND a few weeks since I described an unsuccessful expedition to the neighborhood of Goshen, N. J., in pursuit of King Crabs, Captain Stillwell, whom we so pleasantly met with at that place, advised us to write to Lorenzo D. Smith, of West Creek, a few miles up the Bay, for information. We did so, and received in response a kind invitation to come to his house. On the thirteenth of the Seventh Month, we did so, taking the Cape May train to Belle Plain, from which a mail coach carries passengers to points near the Bay Shore. After a comfortable dinner at the house of our kind friend, he took us about three miles further over the extensive salt meadows to the banks of West Creek, where we found a pile of ninety-five thousand crabs, and a vessel loading them to take away to a factory of fertilizers. L. D. Smith had been for many years in the crab business, and formerly ground them up and sold the material—but of late years he contents himself with collecting and selling the animals intact.

One of the men connected with the vessel kindly put us across the stream in its boat, and we wandered for a considerable distance up the bank of the Delaware River. At frequent intervals on the sandy shores, lines of poles had been driven into the sand, leading out into deep water, and at the outer extremity of these were constructed circular weirs or pens of poles, with door-like openings. The crabs which come to spawn at high tide, on their return to deep water, follow the lines of poles, and are caught in the weirs, from which they are unable to find a way out. At low tide the fishermen come in their boats, and gather the captured crustaceans. Hundreds of these traps had been made along the shore, and our guide was the general purchasing agent for them on the east side of Delaware Bay. In reply to our inquiries as to the extent of the business, we found that the catch for the present year was estimated at about one million three hundred thousand king crabs, which cost the firm that manufactures them about 85 per centum.

The King-crab's outer covering consists of three pieces. The front is rounded in outline, and arched. Within this are located some of the vital organs. The lower lining of the cavity is a thin, horny plate, apparently in consistence half way between parchment and shell. This head-piece is often about a foot in diameter in the female. The male crab is smaller and measures about eight inches across. Attached to this head is a narrower plate, and a triangular tail-piece, like a bayonet or spike, ends the animal. From the rounded outline of the head-piece, this crab is often called Horse-shoe. It is known to naturalists as the Limulus polyphemus.

Its natural habitat is the muddy bottoms of bays of brackish water, of moderate depth. Here it burrows in the mud, by the aid of its feet, which are clustered on the under side of the head. With these also it seizes the worms on which it principally lives. The edges of these feet are closely studded with short, sharp spines, so that a worm is speedily reduced to fine fragments by the friction of the opposite limbs, which answer the purpose of jaws for the creature. The operation of eating was witnessed by S. Lockwood, who in 1870 made a series of observations on this curious animal which are recorded in one of the early volumes of the American Naturalist. He dropped a piece of clam before a hungry crab. This was instantly drawn under with its claws, when, he says, "I immediately turned it over, holding it with the abdomen against the glass side of the tank." The food was held in position over the mouth, by the claws or nippers. Then began an alternating motion of the spring or rasp-like joints against the opposite one of the same pair. The fine particles of food thus rasped off, pass into the mouth.

The spawning season of the Limulus is in the Fifth and Sixth Months, at the time of the extra high tides, which occur at new and full moon. The instinct implanted by the Creator, then brings these animals to the shore, and the crab scratches a depression in the sand just below high water mark, and in it deposits her eggs, which the motion of the water soon covers with sand. The succeeding tides do not rise so high, and thus the eggs have the benefit of the sun's rays to hatch them.

In certain stages of the development of the young, one is reminded of the fossil trilobites, showing that Limulus is probably a descendant of this ancient family.

Our guide waded out in the water of the Bay to one of the weirs and soon returned with two or three live king crabs. One of these he proceeded to dissect, cutting away the under shell of the great head, and disclosing a mass of thousands of small greenish eggs, not much larger than an ordinary pin's head—filling the space between the upper and lower rim of the shell. Formerly, when the crabs were more abundant, these eggs were often collected to feed chickens, which are very fond of them—but the diet is said to give a most disagreeable flavor to the flesh of the chicken.

Lorenzo D. Smith said the crabs were by no means as numerous as formerly, and that Delaware Bay was their principal habitat, although found in other bodies of brackish water along our coast. When I reflected that it was only at the time of spawning that they came to shore from the mud of the deeper water, and remembered how perseveringly the fishermen made use of these opportunities for catching them, I was not surprised at the diminution in their number. Indeed, it did seem probable that they would become comparatively rare. But after seeing the vast multitude of eggs which one crab contained, and reflecting that there must be multitudes of nests deposited in the sands of the shores, the owners of which were able to effect their retreat into deep waters without becoming entangled in the weirs, my anxiety was much dispelled; and I think there is a reasonable prospect that naturalists yet unborn may find an object of interest and study in these curious creatures.

The country in the vicinity of Eldora is very level. Water is generally found at a depth of ten or twelve feet. As was to be expected, we found mosquitoes abundant. Although our guide told us they were "modest" that day, yet they made numerous punctures in our hands and other exposed parts of the bodies. On the salt meadows we saw quite a flock of barn swallows busily engaged in pursuing them—and we thought they had chosen a rich locality for their hunting. We noticed also along the beaches an unusual number of a smallish dragon-fly, which probably also feeds on the same winged game.

Our kind host, who was born on the farm he still owns, was decidedly of the opinion that the land in Southern New Jersey was slowly sinking. He could see a change in the period of his observation.

Our trip was only partially a botanical one, out as we passed along we saw several interesting plants, Helianthus divaricatus, Stylosanthes lator, Chrysopey Marianna, Solidago odora, Alexis farinosa, Gerardia, Lilium superbum, Rhizis Virginica, Urticaria cornuti, Cephalanthus occidentalis, Clethra alnifolia, Euphorbia iperuviana, etc.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Barclay Stratton's Trial of Faith.

[Many of our readers will probably remember the narrative of the experience of Barclay Stratton when drafted into the army, during the war between the South and North, as published in THE FRIEND during last year. Some of these, we trust, will be interested in the following narrative of the same events, written by one who was an adjutant in the army at the time, and in actor in the incidents connected with B. Stratton's confinement at camp. The writer speaks of himself as a "fighting Quaker." He was descended from a Friend's family, but in rambles times prior to 1850 "imbibed the spirit of retaliation against the slave power of the South.—Ed.]

In the issue of Second Month 16th, series of 1895, appears, under the head of "Extracts from Letters of Barclay Stratton," an account of the closing scenes of that Friend's military career and experience, that brings back, through the gloom of the past, an episode in my life sweet to remember.

At the time named therein, Eleventh Month, 1864, I was the adjutant of the Sixty-second Ohio Infantry, and as such was serving with my regiment in front of Richmond. At the time named our regiment was greatly reduced in numbers, as the result of an active campaign extending from May to November. Frequent instalments of recruits were sent us during the fall and winter of that year. Among the number was Barclay Stratton, and (as I remember it), his cousin, Isaac Cadwallader.

In telling their subsequent story, I have to rely largely upon my recollection of the event, as the official history is in the War Department and the Adjutant General's Office in Columbus, Ohio. I am very clear, however, as to the main features of their unusually solemn and interesting case.

I received the descriptive lists of these men and found opposite the names of Stratton and Cadwallader the words "non-combatant, claim exemption." In calling the roll and assigning the recruits, I singled them out and had some conversation with them relative to their convictions. They easily convinced me of their entire sincerity and good conscience in the matter, and asked me to allow them to remain in company. I think they told me of promised intercession in their behalf, and complained of the seeming bad faith upon the part of those upon whom they were induced to rely. They spoke freely of their home associations near Salem, Ohio, and knew very many persons there, occupying the position of valued friends to the writer.

While Barclay Stratton has omitted the mention of my name personally, in the account he has given, I am very clear that both he and his companion felt in a measure relieved after our first interview. And in subsequent seasons they expressed much gratitude for the solace I gave them.

I at once made up their case under the provisions of an act of Congress exempting conscientious non-combatants from the operation of the military law, and made it strong in pertrayed facts, and forwarded it to the Secretary of War.

My recollection is, that about ten or twelve days was required to get the order returned releasing them from the service. During the while, some discomfort was experienced by our friends in their effort to maintain their standing in the army, and some expedients were resorted to as a protection, that would hardly have squared with military discipline. I had great sympathy for them, and assured them of the fact, and of my best efforts in their behalf. I took council with Captain John R. Murray, their company commander, and requested that beyond certain portentous talk necessary to reasonable discipline, no measures more harsh should be taken until the action of the War Department be had in their case. Thus they remained during the period of waiting, the subject of varied comment. In those days of trial and privation, it was a rare occurrence to find old battle-scarred veterans who had endured the brunt of battle and the march for years, and esteemed the period of separation from loved ones at home as a mighty sacrifice for the glory and well-being of the nation, willingly justify any able-bodied man in withholding his best service cheerfully rendered, from the support of the common cause. To such, and I honor them for it, the cause of the Union was more than sacred, and was no uncommon thing to hear it maintained, as above all other human considerations.

Our friends were daily visitors at headquarters, and if imperative duty permitted, I spent some time each day consoling their fears and misgivings.

Finally one evening I saw a commotion in camp, and supposing it to be the chaplain with the mail, I stood and watched its progress. Such it proved to be, but the real cause of the excitement was the approach of two modestly dressed "Quakers" as the boys called them, in company with the chaplain. These personages proved to be the father of one and the brother of the other of our meek heroes. I was greatly rejoiced to meet them and deeply moved as were many others at the meeting of these friends. After a hearty interchange of thoughtful enquiry and narration of fact, I was the happy recipient of many expressions of gratitude from this anxious father and brother for the little I had done for the comfort of these their friends. But all the joy had not been experienced yet in store for us that eventful night. When the headquarter mail was delivered there was a large official envelope from Washington. I tore it open and—almost too good to tell—there was the fruit of my striving. An order releasing Barclay Stratton and Isaac Cadwallader from military duty as requested, etc.

There were strange and novel proceedings had and done in that military tent that night. That is, strange from a military point of view. As I remember it, war was forgotten for the time, and our old headquarter tent, bullet rent and smoke begrimed, was the scene of a Quaker love feast, such as many of the readers hereof will not participate in during this phase of existence. As soon as the necessary authority could be evoked, authorized by the War Department order, our friends took their tearful and joyous leave for their peaceful though anxious homes.

I received numerous letters of unmerited acknowledgment from our heroes after their return home, also from other of their friends and relations.

In living over again my war experiences I have often dwelt with pleasant memories upon this little event, and never without feelings of true gratitude that it was within my reach to extend a helping hand to those oppressed ones in their hour of need.

A short while since I was attending Friend's meeting at Pasadena, California, and having been introduced to a Friend by the name of Stratton, I proceeded to narrate briefly the above story. I soon found to my surprise that my auditor knew the story quite as well as I, and upon inquiry learned that it had been published in great part in THE FRIEND during last year.

Numerous ones have requested me to tell it over again. Not that it would be bettered, but that some of the friends of the parties would be pleased to learn of the continued existence of living witnesses to this solemn event and supreme trial of a worthy life.

Fraternally,

AARON D. YOCUM,

PASADENA, California.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Dear Friends:—A word in love to the Friends of our once favored Society. Let wisdom guide us to our Lord and Saviour, putting down everything of our earthly nature, that the pure love of God may enter into these clay tabernacles reaching forth to that life that the Lord God hath placed there, clothing our minds with that unspeakable wisdom and knowledge that God can administer to the weary and tried soul.

Oh, that we may be preserved and brought forth clothed in the bright robes of righteousness, and thus keeping faith, hope and love in our hearts, show the marks of the true disciples of Christ Jesus, the Lamb of God, thus rightly dividing the word of God unto the poor, suffering soul, that is hid from the worldly-wise. Oh my soul years after such as these—yea, I have strewed my tears before the Lord, who can rightly guide and direct us in all things, that we may be stayed upon that sure Rock, Christ Jesus, where there is no shadow of turning to the right or to the left. For the stepping-stones are all ready cast up for us to walk upon, by the dear Son of God, who suffered upon the cross to redeem us, who is our Mediator between God and man, Oh, what do we not owe unto Him, who maketh intercession for us before God.

Are we willing to take up the cross and follow our Saviour as He followed our Heavenly Father; let us examine our hearts as in the sight of God by retiring often to our closet, there to hold sweet communion with our Lord and Saviour, that we may be enabled to follow closely his guiding hand, day by day, that our calling and election may be sure.

These words arose in my mind and kept with me, till I have been willing to place them here, "Feed my sheep, gather the tender lambs into the heavenly fold, for their cry has come up before me, saith the Lord." Of the great harvest of souls, many are wandering from the true fold, and are thus liable to be cast into the mighty deep at any moment, no more to arise. For many of the faithful watchmen have been called home, from works to rewards, and who shall take their places but those that have passed through the fire of affliction, and thus become pure as gold well refined. With such to guide and lead the tender babes in Christ, the many barriers that surround us on every hand will be removed by the Great Head of the Church. But who shall judge between the quick and the dead; is not the eye of the Son of God over all of his faithful servants; so let us be more faithful in looking unto Him, the great Head of the Church, who knows the secret desires of every heart. He will not choose the blind, nor the deaf, nor those that will not listen to his tender entreaties; nay, He will choose the tender lambs that bow daily low at his feet, and there seek after that heavenly bread that will heal and soothe the aching soul.

Dear Friends, I feel that we as a Society have got in a low place. Oh, may we remain there until the great Captain of our Salvation spreads his mantle of love over us, a poor scattered remnant, and bring us all into the holy enclosure, where the enemy can have no power over us, yea, dear Friends, I feel that the only true abiding place is to keep very near to our Lord and Saviour. He is the alone true teacher of all good, and will be near to all his faithful servants to guide them into all truth and righteousness; let us strive to keep near to his guiding hand, in our stepping along through time here, that all may be done to the praise and glory of God, thus preparing us for that happy meeting with Him who is our all and all. What is man, that he should strive to bind the spirit of all life, that the Lord God has placed within our hearts. He will give his spirit to all that are willing to obey his every command, thus enabling us to walk in newness of life before God. Yea, the Lord God hath made bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of the Lord. H. T.

Seventh Month 25th, 1896.

Life Among the Indians.

The arrival in this city a short time ago of an aged man, wearing buckskin trousers, a varri-colored coat of linen, and carrying in his hands an oter skin and several other articles found only in the Everglades of the State, created considerable interest and comment, and large numbers of people gathered around him whenever he stopped. A Citizen reporter stopped the old man to learn something about his story.

"My name," he said, "is Captain W. S. Pitts. I am now seventy-one years of age. I was born in Virginia, but when quite a child went to Missouri, where I lived up to twenty-seven years ago, and where I am now returning. Since leaving Missouri, which I consider my native State, I have lived continuously with the Seminole Indians in the Everglades of Florida. This is my first visit to a city for twenty-seven years. I am old now, but vigorous and strong as I was thirty years ago. Life with my dusky companions has not weakened my vitality. Why did I stay with them so long? Well, the question is easier asked than answered. Whatever may have been the reason for my life among those people will rest with me. I have lived with them, worked with them, talked with them, and year after year they have been my only companions. I have been satisfied to have it so, and I think they have also been content to have me as a companion. I am going back home now to visit my relatives, after which I shall return. I had hoped to be in time to attend the convention, but circumstances have not permitted me to do so.

"How do the Indians live? Well, principally by hunting and fishing, although a great many of them have their little gardens, from which they manage to raise enough to live, but the Indians love to hunt and fish, and civilize them as much as you please, they will always prefer to engage in what the white man calls 'sport' than to be tied down to farming.

"There are now in the Everglades about six hundred Indians. They are increasing in numbers only slightly. The death rate is large, though, and the present number will not change much. The Seminole Indians are very friendly toward white people, whom they think mean well with them. But they have been duped so much that they are getting extremely wary. The Indians in those swamps can set an example to a great many white people, so far as domestic life is concerned. They are very chivalrous. The women have only their household duties to attend to, and the men work and do all the heavy drudgery necessary. The women are also remarkably virtuous and quiet, both in manner and way of living. There are really, in the proper sense of the word, no chiefs. The tribes are governed by a council, composed of Tom Tiger, Tallahassee, Billy Bowlegs and Billy Swift. This council governs the movements of the Indians. The government is not harsh, and there is as much freedom as could be possible in those wilds. The Indians live principally in thatched houses, and they are very well made. Around each of these can generally be found a little garden, which is attended by some member of the family.

"A number of the Indians are Christians, and some of their principles are far in advance of those practised by white hypocrites. It is true the white man has taught them to curse and swear, drink and cheat, but these vices are practised by only a few, and that few are those who came in contact with the civilized savage called white men. The older Indians still long for their happy hunting grounds and the old style of things, but they, too, have settled down to the fact that it is only useless to buck against the Government. They are content to live and die in the wilds of that part of the State."

The old man will say little or nothing of himself, except that he originated the lecture, which has recently been printed, called "Too Much Wind for the Rudder," which is considered a thoughtful effort on ethics. He expects to leave for St. Louis to-day, and while there he will no doubt cause considerable interest. He is well preserved, and shows his age very little. The fact that a white man would bury himself from family and friends for twenty-seven years, makes him of unusual interest, and when the circumstances of his life were made known he attracted more than ordinary interest. — (Jacksonville, Fla.), Citizen.

WHAT ARE CHRISTIANS FOR?—A Christian lady who was engaged in work for the poor and degraded was once spoken to by one who was well acquainted with both the worker and those whom she sought to reach, and remonstrated with for going among such a class of people.

"It does seem wonderful to me that you can do such work," her friend said. "You sit beside people, and talk with them in a way I do not think you would do if you knew all about them, just what they are, and from what places they come."

Her answer was, "Well, I suppose they are dreadful people; but if the Lord Jesus were not on earth, are they not the very sort of people that He would strive to reach? And am I any better than my Master? Would He feel himself too good to go among them?"

A poor, illiterate person, who stood listening to this conversation, said, with great earnestness and simplicity, "Why, I always thought that was what Christians were for."

The objector was silenced, and what wonder? Is not that what Christians are for? If not, then what, in the name of all that is good are they for.—American Messenger.

AN APPEAL TO PROFESSING CHRISTIANS RESPECTING THE ATTITUDE OF THE CHURCH IN REGARD TO WAR; BY THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS OF PHILADELPHIA.

"From whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" (Jas. iv: 1.) That heathen tribes should maintain a continuous state of preparation for expected attacks from other tribes, is consistent with their uncivilized and unchristianized condition; but that those claiming to be Christians should so far ignore the precepts and example of the Holy Head and Founder of their religion as to regard one another as enemies, can be accounted for on no other ground than this, viz: that blindness hath in part overtaken them—they acknowledge Christ, but not in all their ways—his words do influence their conduct in many respects; but in relation to war, the demands of a misguided patriotism would seem to outweigh all consideration of religious duty; and the fact is overlooked that a call to war is a call to destroy the lives and property of those whom Christ has enjoined his followers to love. "Love your enemies; do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you."

Deeds that are called criminal in times of peace, are commended in times of war. The lawmakers who seek to control men's passions, by law, seek also by law to unloose those passions and set brother against brother, in the name of patriotism. "My country right or wrong," is a pernicious sentiment often applauded by a professedly Christian community. War legalizes murder, plunder, arson, false pretense, and Christian nations commend all these as necessary, and therefore right. "Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?"—never. "By their fruits ye shall know them" and it is to Christians we appeal—to ministers of the Gospel, to teachers and parents, that for the sake of righteousness in the earth, they cease preaching and teaching that war and preparation for war are consonant with the Gospel of Christ.

The Christian minister feels that it is a disgrace and a serious obstacle to the advancement of the good cause he has espoused, for any portion of his flock to live at enmity with each other; but when war is declared between nations, the course of their teaching is changed by many. They no longer urge the benign precepts of the Saviour of men as binding, but the laws of men; and for war purposes preach an entirely different code of Christian ethics. From whence do they get their authority for so doing?

Is there anything whatever found in the New Testament or in the heart's cravings for holiness, that revives for war purposes the law of "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth," and yet keeps alive for other times "the law of the Spirit of Life in Christ Jesus which makes free from the law of sin and death?" Oh ye "teachers," ye "leaders of the people," how can ye exalt Christ by such a divided allegiance? Has He not said, "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me?"

Have you, dear Christian people, ever paused enough in front of the query, "From hence come wars and fightings?" to rightly consider your responsibilities as ambassadors of the Prince of Peace, when fostering the spirit of war in your own hearts, or the hearts of others?

Does not the part you take in the various schemes to keep alive and urge the view that a nation must be ready at all times to strike and to strike back, contradict your prayers and compound the honest seeker after the Truth of God? Do you not thereby retard the advance of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth, and put to naught the profession made of being Christ's followers?

Men love consistency, and when it is on the side of right may be led thereby to higher planes of thought and life, and they turn instinctively from the leading of men untrue to the principles they profess.

The Christian is presumed to be a co-worker with God in the regeneration of the world. Whoever enlists under his banner may be justly expected to obey his commandments. The exigencies of war render a compliance with the precepts of Christ impossible. Warriors themselves admit this, but contend that war is a necessary evil. Where shall Christians be found in such an emergency? Side by side with God or side by side with men who are violating his commands?

The belief that war is a necessary evil implies a want of faith in the promises and protecting care of the Almighty. The Proverbs of Solomon declare that "whoso putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe." The truth of this was verified by the experience of William Penn and the early colonists of Pennsylvania.

Are not we too much like the rebellious children of Israel, whom the Prophet Isaiah condemned, because they took counsel, but not of the Lord, and on whom he pronounced a woe because they go "down to Egypt for help, and stay upon horses, and trust in chariots because they are many, and in horsemen because they are very strong; but they look not unto the holy one of Israel, neither seek the Lord?" If we substitute firearms for horses, and vessels of war for chariots, is not this woe in measure applicable to our own beloved country, which is in danger of trusting to such means of defence, instead of seeking the Lord who hath declared, "He that putteth his trust in me shall possess the land?"

These promises belong to nations and communities as much as to individuals, yet there are many professing Christians who admit their force as to their private lives; but in national affairs place their trust in military power. The most effective means of changing such a perverted view, is the infusion of the Spirit of the Gospel into the heart. The Prophet Isaiah, in speaking prophetically of the coming of the kingdom of Christ, says, "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea;" and he uses this beautiful comparison, "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and calf and the young lion and the fating together, and a little child shall lead them." And when our Holy Redeemer came on the earth, He pronounced blessings on the meek, the merciful, and the peacemaker—on those qualities which are the most antagonistic to the spirit of war; and the commands He gave to his disciples can in no way be made to harmonize with warlike measures.

These commands are so clear and positive, that no language could be used which would convince one that rejects their authority. We greatly desire that the professing Church of Christ would accept his instructions according to their plain and distinct meaning, instead of exercising their ingenuity in explaining away, and making his words of no effect.

You and we, dear Christian brethren, can scarcely differ in the belief, that our Lord's Sermon on the Mount is designed to hold a very prominent place in his recorded teachings. In this is frequently enforced the view, that whatever might have been allowable under the "old covenant," the animus of that dispensation which Christ had ushered into the world is love to God and love to man in their fullest application. Could the spirit which breathes through that marvellous utterance of Divine wisdom and love but enter into and possess our hearts, there would, we are persuaded, be left no disposition to uphold war with all its horrors; still less the motives and the passions which must prevail in order to make war possible.

The speedy abandonment of this most unchristian method of settling differences between civilized nations rests to day, as we firmly believe, with the professing Christian Church, which has so long given it an implied, and too often, a hearty support. The responsibility for its continuance thus entails a burden, from which she should fervently seek to be delivered. Shall not we, then, who acknowledge ourselves followers of the Lamb of God, be so true to Him, his plain precepts and his example, that the heathen shall no longer be stumbled by the action of so-called Christian nations, nor the sceptic or the scoffer find the ample material which is now afforded for their thrusts and sneers at our holy religion. All who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity will then rejoice in a new and powerful bond of union with one another, which, in the present weak and inconsistent attitude of the Church regarding war, is not possible. With a clear, fresh message of "peace on earth and good will toward men," thrilling the breasts of Christian believers everywhere, the work of the world's conversion would go more rapidly forward, and that happy day, foretold by the prophet Isaiah, be hastened, when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

BOYS' BRIGADES.

In all brotherly freedom, we would call your very serious attention to the organizations known as "Boys' Brigades," which have been recently introduced in many congregations, and have met with a dangerous popularity. Let us consider whether there are not tendencies and consequences inseparable from them which are inimical to the highest interests of our youth, and the true work of the Church.

With the inculcation of prompt obedience to superiors, is there not fostered a love of arbitrary power in the boys who command? Is not an admiration for martial display begotten by the parade and the trappings which are part of the outfit of the Brigade? Do these not minister to the pride and vanity of human nature, which so early assert themselves, and, viewed from the Christian standpoint, need no stimulus? Will not the precision and efficiency with which large numbers move under the control of one or more leading minds, give an undue estimate as to the value or necessity for military service in the administration of civil government? And is not the general tendency of such training as is derived through the Boys' Brigade, to lead away from the Gospel view of the Church, its rightful service, the nature of that conflict with sin and error to which it is indeed called, and the method by which it is to be carried on, whered the Apostle Paul declares, "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds, casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

If the system has these tendencies, unfavorable to moral and religious welfare, of how little comparative value are the discipline and physical advantages claimed for it! and how directly does it conflict with the principle involved in the command of our Saviour, "Seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof."

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 15, 1896.

The attention of our readers is called to the "Appeal" in regard to war, recently addressed by our Meeting for Sufferings to professing Christians. It was the outcome of a concern over the large amount of a military spirit which exists among our fellow citizens. In the language of a judicious Friend in England, "It is a brotherly and respectful persuasion on behalf of the Christian principles concerned." Although the class especially addressed, are rather impervious to such appeals, yet we must hope that some good will be effected; and we would encourage our readers to procure copies (which may be had gratuitously at our book store, 304 Arch Street, Phila.,) and hand them to such persons as they may hope will be benefited thereby.

We have received a communication on the subject of Life Insurance, which refers to a former article on this subject published in THE FRIEND of Sixth Month 27th. Several Friends have expressed to the Editor their uneasiness with the article alluded to, because they believed it showed a want of acquaintance with the principles on which Life Insurance is now conducted. The communication published in the present number of THE FRIEND seems to us a clear and dispassionate review of the subject, not calculated to give offence even to those who dissent from its conclusions. It would be a relief to the Editor if his readers should feel easy to let this subject rest for the present.

In No. 51 of the volume of THE FRIEND recently completed was published an article taken from the Sunday School Times entitled "God's Adoption," designed to show that the Almighty at times overrules for good the plans and acts of evil men, so as to make them conducive to his own gracious purposes; and that it is a legitimate source of comfort to those who mourn over the wickedness that exists to indulge the hope that He will make the wrath of man to praise Him, and thus to "educate good out of evil."

We have received a letter which shows that some of our readers have been uneasy with some of the expressions in this article, believing that they are not sufficiently guarded, and that they might be understood as censuring the mourning and lamentation which the prophet Jeremiah felt over the sins and judgments of the people of Israel. Reference is also made to our Saviour, who was said to be "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."

We have no doubt that it is a good thing to have such a faith in the goodness and omnipotence of our Creator as may preserve us from being too greatly moved in evil times; yet we believe also that a feeling of mourning and exercise on account of that which is wrong, is a part of the discipline which the righteous are often called upon to bear, and that in it they are approved of by their Father in Heaven.

The proposal for international action there, like the proposal for a conference of the powers on the Armenian question, came from Vienna, but the proud nation which was duped then is now on the alert. Lord Salisbury, in refusing to commit England to the senseless and immoral policy of taking part in a blockade of Crete, has the moral sense of the nation behind him.

The German Press, especially the Bismarckian and Conservative organs, are particularly sore over what was practically the refusal of Lord Salisbury the British Prime Minister, to join in a blockade of Crete and his alleged championing of Greece and the Cretans. These papers have been at a loss to find epithets strong enough to denounce Great Britain for her refusal to join in a joint blockade of Crete to prevent the insurgents from obtaining arms ammunition and supplies.

1852.—Ninth Month 5th.—At Parkersville. Silent Meeting. Saw dear teacher Elizabeth (Walter). She is to be married now in the course of a few weeks. May she enjoy the blessing of heaven upon her. Dear Minerva (Webb), no family were so kind to me, coming over or me and then taking me back, also taking me about while there. I do hope the teacher will succeed in that school to satisfaction.

12th.—Silent meeting. I resolve and re-resolve, but never obey. Much company here. Abram Gibbons here to tea. He reminds me so much of dear father. I mean to try to be obedient. My heart is so wicked; none but God an help me, and my Saviour; cast me not off, beseech of thee.

19th.—I do almost despair of ever giving up any all to Him that calls. I read that they "which resist shall receive to themselves damnation." I am like the Jews of old, "stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears; ye do always resist the Holy Ghost." I am like Simon of old, in the "gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity." Oh, I would, Holy Father, that thou shouldst change me. Thou art all-powerful; why need I be thus so long. Though thy mercy must be nearly wearied out, oh, continue it yet longer, and save me. I can't do it.

Dear Hannah Gibbons spoke in meeting. I feel that the most of the encouragement belongs to another dear Friend, but as I was not recovered, it may be that I can take a little of the encouragement. She commenced with, "Our Saviour, when upon earth, commanded the multitude to sit on the ground to be fed," desiring that we might be willing to be lowly, also reminding us that the hungering state was blessed, quoting the passage, "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." In the latter part addressed a tried mind, "Behold the Lord's hand is not shortened, that it cannot save, neither has his ear grown heavy, that it cannot hear." "Why sayest thou, oh Jacob, and speakest, O, Israel. My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is past over from my God." "He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might He increaseth strength." She thought some were ready to say, "My leanness, oh, my leanness." — seems to have a feeling of duty to take charge of the Indian farm at Tunesassa. I hope he may be blessed. 26th.—Dear little Francis Wood deceased last evening about, or a little after nine o'clock, of congestion of the lungs. It must be a great bereavement to his parents. He was a very bright and active child. Poor J. and Susan deserve the sympathy of their friends, amidst all their complicated trials.

Silent meeting, but it felt good to me, the latter part of it, though I was so unworthy, so wicked when I went, the latter part of the meeting I thought of a dream, which I had on Sixth-day morning. I had often had dreams that showed me the danger I was in, and on going to bed that night under some anxious thoughts, I wished that I could be favored with a comforting dream, but I concluded I was too wicked to be comforted. In the morning, when I woke, I had dreamed I had three little birds on my hand trying to get free. I had caught them in a house while trying to get out of a closed window. They nearly escaped many times from me. It was my intention to let them go, when I got to the door. On awaking, I could not make out whether it meant comfort or warning. In meeting it came into my mind that these little birds were three of us young people in this meeting, that the Saviour had laid his hand upon, to rescue us from death; that it was his intention to set us at liberty (the true liberty), when He had brought us to the right state. It is such a comfort to think that He will keep us in his hand till He gets us to the right place to liberate; that it is his intention to keep us. Oh! Holy Father, make me truly thine. John P. Balderson is attending having an appointed meeting here this afternoon. I am so glad. He has been here, and some young friends, and it seems to me it is stubborn self was too kindly dealt with. Dear William Kite came nearest the point. I know, sad indeed is my state. I wish that I need not trouble my friends any more.

29th.—One month ago dear Phebe W. Roberts was at our meeting. "Tell me, oh, thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou maketh thy flock to rest at noon, for why should I be as one that turneth aside, by the flocks of thy companions."

This morning — opened a concern to go to the Indian settlement at Tunesassa, and he and his wife were liberated.

Dear Mary Kite opened a concern, which had for some time rested with her to visit the families of West Chester Preparative Meeting. How many favors!

Tenth Month 3rd.—Surely the Lord is merciful in dealing with me, a poor sinner and rebellious. Our dear friend Margaret Morton deceased on Fourth-day night. She was so gentle always. I think I never saw her tempered by angry passions in the least. Her words so gentle, her spirit so lamb-like, through all her sufferings. May her example be long remembered by me. — spoke, quoting the parable of the two sons sent to work in the vineyard. One said, "I go, but went not." This is poor me. I say by my dress "I go," but go not in heart. I do feel more of a willingness. Am I not willing?

10th.— spoke. My mind was occupied too much with outward things, not enough on God. May I strive to come before God, and earnestly crave power to resist Satan, the cruel enemy, when he comes with the sons of God as in Job's days, and may I strive to say like little Samuel of old, "speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

"Lift up your heads, oh ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in. Who is this King of Glory? The Lord, strong and mighty; the Lord, mighty in battle." I will try to seek to Him to strive against the cruel enemy for me.

Fifth-day.—I had thought the meeting would have closed in silence, when — appeared in a most solemn supplication, giving thanks for sending faithful laborers amongst us, also desiring that all might bow before the Most High. I hope I may try more and more to bow my neck wholly to the yoke, and not to be so stiff-necked. I know I have tried more since.

16th.—A sweet prayer from dear H. Gibbons for the aged, the middle aged and the young. Oh, may my eyes be more and more anointed with eye salve to see the beauty of holiness, and may I be more and more willing to give up my will and walk lowly and hold out patiently and in faith to the end.

— also spoke from the request of Caleb's daughter, "Thou hast given me a south land; give me also springs of water. Oh, that I who am here, blessed with a comfortable and favored situation, highly favored, may I desire more earnestly for springs of water, springs of living water to nourish my soul.

Dear Mary Kite has been with us the last week visiting families. It has been my privilege to wait upon her some, and to sleep with her. I wish I could be as good as dear Hannah Gibbons. She had a sitting in our family on Fifth-day afternoon. My I be faithful to deny self and take up the cross. I had desired to have my mind delivered from a care or desire of going to Westtown (as a teacher), during the time this dear friend was with us, and that passage spoken helps me much. "The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord."

Under this date, the following beautiful lines are found in her diary.

LOVE OF JESUS!

As when a child secure from harms
Hangs at the mother's breast;
Safe folded in her anxious arms,
Receiving food and rest.

And while, thro' many a painful path,
The travelling parent speeds,
The fearless babe with passive faith
Lies still, and yet proceeds.

Should some short start give his quiet break,
He fondly strives to cling
His little arms about her neck,
And closer seems to cling!

German Correspondence.

A passage from a letter written by our lively correspondent, E. S. Kite, throws some light on the sleeping habits of the Germans. She was boarding at a country house, on the mountain-side, near St. Andrewsberg. She says:

When we came up yesterday, we found everything ready for us, and I wish thee could have seen the beds, they were so high! I investigated, and found they expected us to sleep between two feather beds, both immense! I explained my being used to the mattress, and preferred a thinner cover. The woman was amazed; but said, of course, if I wished; so they were changed. This morning she met us with an anxious inquiry, if we really were warm enough, and said her husband could not believe it possible, but was sure we must "tot geforen," which means literally frozen to death.

St. Andrewsberg is a charming, quaint little town, with winding, crooked streets that wander up and down the steep mountain sides, so that through many I am sure no wagon would dare venture, even if they were wide enough. The roofs are all red, and to-day I learned that the upper stories of them all were barns. It is hazy time, and the mountain sides are alive with people, mostly women and girls, and the loads they carry seem incredible—really one only sees the feet, so that they look like walking hay-stacks.

At Nordhausen I took a cup of coffee at the station, and ate my breakfast in peace, then started to explore. Nothing suits me better than to be alone with my Baedecker (guide book), and to find my way about in such an old town. Were a German along I should not get to see so much, because they would not talk so to the common people as I can do, being a stranger. Nordhausen is very, very old. I wandered along the streets from one to another, and whenever I saw one that was narrower and more winding I turned into it. Every little while there would be a passage between the houses, simply a flight of winding stone steps, up which I would venture and after turning more corners, going along passages, and climbing more steps, I would come out on the street above. As I wandered along in this way, I came to a great thick wall, with a high tower, and about the sides were Hebrew inscriptions in stone. Of course I was curious, and ran up a flight of steps at the side, and there round a corner I saw two women washing. I questioned them, and they very willingly told me that the old tower and wall was not a part of the town wall, but a Jewish enclosure, and the tower was used for a temple. This was probably in the days when the Jews were so persecuted. As I showed much interest, they offered to show me the interior, and I gladly accepted. There were two families living in the tower, one above and the other below. The walls were at least from four to five feet thick, and the little windows let only a dim light into the rooms. I gave the woman twenty phennigs for the children, which seemed to please her, and she sent her little boy with me to another tower, from which I had a splendid view of the town.

But the most interesting thing in Nordhausen is the old cathedral, built in 936, or at least begun then by the widow of Heinrich I., Kaiser of Germany. He followed with one exception the descendants of Charlemagne. My Baedecker speaks of its objects of interest, so naturally that was one of my first objective points. I came to the wall surrounding the cathedral, entreating them to bow low before God, speaking of the time when the trumpets were sounded around the walls of the ancient cities and that every man's prayer was unto his God.

Then William Kite spoke, also warning the young, entreating us not to harden our hearts. Dear Mary Kite also supplicated for us all. Oh, that I may be favored to bow low and be nothing. I am determined to. Then dear Phebe felt constrained to speak again, and some Friend was encouraged to follow the leadings of the Lord, "Put on strength in the name of the Lord and journey forward, thou hast encompassed this mountain long enough. How instructive, how confirming. — was favored to make me feel more deeply than before. Oh, that I may bow low and be willing to be nothing. Thou only, Oh, Holy Father, can do it; be merciful unto me, and cleanse me and purify me. When I am tempted to throw aside the cross in company, may I be reminded of this passage, "It is the Lord; let him do what seemeth Him good." How encouraging it is to me, what a comfort that thy Saviour is still merciful to me. "A bruised reed will He not break and smoking flax will He not quench till He bring forth judgment unto victory." Oh, that He would enable me to be victorious over my many and grievous sins. Oh, bow me lowly down and enable me to obey, so that I can in truth seek to thee, to show me my sins and enable me to use the language, "Search me and know my thoughts; search me, and see if there be any wicked way in me." Refine me, in thy furnace, in thy seventh furnace.

In the last meeting dear H. G., again encouraged the young Friends to bow low. If some little portion of all this good should only be for me, poor, unworthy me. On Sixth-day afternoon the committee met, and I believe they were satisfied. I am thankful. How willing, though wicked I am to feel set up with it. How willing to receive honors from men, whether it has been given me or not. A verse in the Bible has in some measure brought me a little more lowly. "How can ye believe, which receive honor from men, and seek not the honor which cometh from God only." Save me yet, oh, Holy Father, though so prone to sin.

It seems almost incredible that a family of plants such as the Leguminosae, which includes peas, beans, vetches and so many wholesome things, should also harbor plants eminently injurious to animal life. It was on this account that doubts were for years freely expressed as to the accuracy of the observations of Western cattlemen, that plants of the genus Astragalus, and its relatives, were the cause of the craziness and death of animals which fed on them. The observations were at length so conclusive, that one especially, Astragalus mollissimus, is generally regarded as a very great enemy to cattle raisers, and to the raiser of horses especially. It now appears that plants of the same natural order have in Australia the same virulence. A very beautiful shrubby legume, called Templetonia, not far removed from our Crotalaria, and the Lupines, has been found very deadly. An English woman took it for a relative of the English broom, and made an infusion for troubles the broom is supposed to help—jaundice being one of them. One cupful of the infusion produced death within an hour. It has been said that our Lupine is not wholly a safe plant, and this behavior of its relative does not help its reputation.—The Independent.

Poor child! maternal love alone
Preserves the first and best;
Thy parent's arms, and not thy own,
Are those that hold thee fast.

So souls that would to Jesus cleave,
And hear his secret call,
Must every fair pretension leave,
And let the Lord be all;

Keep close to me, thou helpless sheep,
The Shepherd softly cries;
Lord! tell me "what is close to keep,"
The listening sheep replies.

Thy whole dependence on me fix,
Nor entertain a thought,
Thy worthless schemes with mine to mix,
But venture to be naught!

Fond self-direction is a reef—
Thy strength, thy wisdom flee,
When thou art nothing in thyself,
Thou then, art close to me.

18th.—One year ago my dear father deceased. Many were my cries at that time and many my desires to be made better. I felt that I was not ready to die, am I any better now? I think I have lately, through condescending mercy, been more willing to take up the cross to be anything or nothing.

24th.— spoke from the text, where some of the newly convinced, when queried with whether they had received the Holy Ghost, answered, "We have not so much as heard, whether there be any Holy Ghost." It is that holy indwelling principle given to every man, that teaches when to hate sin and makes them desire to be pure; it leads them to God, to look at the Saviour whom they have praised, and seeking Him to have their sins washed away. They must feel for it every day, and it will lead them into the path that the vulture's eye hath not seen, into that path of humility and nobleness in the world's estimation, which the worldly wise hath not seen nor can see; it is that which can discern our thoughts and the intents of our hearts, and show us our sins.

Oh! may I wait upon it more earnestly every day, and depend more upon it to teach me. Oh, that I might be worthy to have the Holy Ghost poured out on me, as it was on some formerly, not to make me great, but to wrap me up in a pure love to God, and make me hate all sin. Keep me, oh! Holy Father, and save me for thy mercy's sake.

Elizabeth Hayes has deceased. She seemed to be in the bloom of health. Dear Morris Cope spoke at the ground, reminding us of the way in which we might have our peace "flow as a river," saying it was through disobedience to the still, small voice that we were prevented from having it so to flow. Dear Phebe W. Roberts spoke nearly to the same effect, also mentioning that this dear young Friend had passed through much suffering of body, but that she said her mental suffering was much more than her bodily. Some Friends told me that the shroud was bound round with white silk an inch or more wide, they (and I could feel with them), were very sorry that "Friends" had so got into the customs of the world and were giving up the cross. I felt sorry to hear that the whole of the body was exposed to view. I hope if it should please my Heavenly Father to take me soon from this world, that my friends would put the worthless remains in a plain coffin, shrouded in a muslin garment plainly gathered round the neck.

27th.—Monthly Meeting. It was such a good one. Dear Phebe W. Roberts here, and spoke first, warning the young, saying that the trumpet seemed to sound louder and louder,

Flowers in Greenland.

BY WM. F. MEDHAN, MEMBER OF THE PEABY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

The finding of wild flowers blossoming on the table-lands of Greenland and in recently hard spots in the nevee of the inland ice is one of the greatest wonders of the arctic regions, and more than anything else forcibly illustrates the persistency with which plants will grow and flourish in spite of what seems unfavorable environment. One of the richest spots in this particular, which came under the writer's notice, was that portion of Prudhoe Land, which lies on the summit of Greenland to the west of McOrmeik Bay. The spot was reached, after infinite toil, on the twenty-fifth day of July, 1892. After clambering the steep cliffs for two or more hours, the table-land was reached. The ground was soft and wet, and the feet sank ankle deep in pebbly mud. Through it in all directions ran streams and rills of the sweetest water.

At first the eye took in nothing but a seemingly utterly barren region, extending some two miles inland, and terminated in the background by the great ice-cap, shining with a hideous white glare, and which seemed to roll away endlessly to the horizon. But soon, as the eyes became accustomed to the scene, yellow spots began to appear on the apparently barren and muddy plain, until the whole surface fairly glowed with golden poppies, pleasantly contrasted by white flowers of the same species and by the more modest whitlow grass. One could scarcely walk without stepping on them, and they grew clear to the edge of the forbidding ice-cap. But a more wonderful spectacle was to follow. Leaving the table-land, the writer, with a friend and a South Greenland Eskimo interpreter, began a tramp through the nevee, or granular ice, toward the main body of the vast frozen sea. A quarter of a mile from the shore a spot was come upon, perhaps three or four hundred yards in extent, from which the granular ice was all melted. Thickly dotted over this oasis in the frozen wilderness were poppies and whitlow grass, potentillas and two or three other familiar plants, all blooming as gayly as though no ice was near. Clumps of grass, also, attempted to brighten the scene; but these seemed not to enjoy the situation, for, for the most part they were sickly and pale in color.

While grass is common throughout the whole extent of the west shore of Greenland, it is not often found far above the arctic circle covering the ground as it does in the United States. It exists generally in small patches only, and where it is seen in bright green plots of more than usual size, it almost invariably indicates the site of an existing or once existing Eskimo settlement, and far to the north of the favorite rendezvous of the musk ox. The unusual luxuriance of the grass about the Eskimos settlements is due to the careless and filthy habits of these strange people. The fire or six small stone tubs which generally constitute a settlement are rarely more than a few yards apart, and each has beside it a smaller structure for dogs. As the nature of the soil in Greenland precludes the raising of vegetables, the exclusive food of the natives is, therefore, animal; and the families, as they pick the bones of a seal or other least reasonably clean, throw them, together with such offal as cannot be eaten, in a heap outside their respective huts, where they putrefy. The settlements are invariably on sloping ground, and the water, running down toward the sea, and after some search found a gate that was locked, and entered into the graveyard which surrounds the building. Once more it was to me as though I had been dropped down to the middle of the fifth century. I scarcely aired tread on the stones, for fear the noise might awaken some mysterious shade—the cathedral itself looked so old—the massive towers and the arches of the cloisters, then the doors were covered with iron bands crossing in all directions to keep them together. As I wandered about in front of the cloister, a little edd appeared from a window up above, and a child's voice asked if I wished to go over the building. I answered in the affirmative, and was told to enter by a certain door, and there would find her grandfather. I followed her direction, and on opening the massive door, came into the great building. The first impression was of barrenness—the cold white walls, the stone floors, with recumbent figures arched therein, worn almost smooth by the feet of the multitude in all the years; then the grotesque carvings in stone of knights and bishops, who had so sought to perpetuate their fame. I soon saw a bent old man, with a few remaining white hairs, tottering towards me. I soon learned that he was quite deaf, and my voice raised the echoes in the quaint old building as I spoke with him; his kindly face and manner won my heart at the first instant, and we became very good friends before we parted. I explained that I was deeply interested in everything old, was charmed with Nordhausen, and wanted to see everything that he could show me. He then asked me to look about while he went for the keys. Of course there were pictures and altars all about, of whose respective values he informed me. The one word that was always on his tongue was the "heilige Matilda" (Saint M), it was she who built the cathedral, and she who had founded its greatness—and the old man grew quite eloquent as he told of her former splendor. "Ach! Fraulein," he said "es ist alles so anders jetzt" (It is so different now). The choir was decorated by very interesting old carvings in wood, and on one side of the high altar was a wood carving of the "heilige Matilda," bearing a model of her beloved cathedral, and on the other the "heilige Helena," the mother of Constantine (I did not tell him my own opinion in regard to her sanctity, bearing a cross. My old guide told me that it was she who had found the holy cross. Down below in the crypt it was so dark that we had to have a candle. The choir is directly above, and the floor is supported by massive, low columns. In the crypt is buried an old knight who was assassinated while hearing the mass before the altar there. As we came up into the warm sunshine, I felt glad. The weight of all the centuries seemed to press upon one there in the gloom. He showed me the gorgeous costumes of the priests—gold and silver brocade velvets, and the heaviest fabrics wrought with gold. Before I went he gave me his blessing and hoped I would come safely home to my friends. He told me that he was so lonely. "Ach Fraulein," he said "ich bin so einsam jetzt," then he explained that his old wife and only son had lately died. She was too old to work, except do a little knitting, but when he went home, she was there, and now there were only the grandchildren, and he was so lonely. And then he wanted to know my family history, and if my parents lived, and where I came from, all of which I told him. I would have staid longer, but I had to hurry back to the station to meet I—, and on the way I found more quaint streets and narrow passages, and came by the old Rathhouse, with a hideous red and yellow "Rowland" column and a beautiful Luther fountain. From Nordhausen it was a short way by train to Kelnra, there we took a carriage, and a two hours' ride brought us up to the famous ruin, and the new monument to Kaiser Wilhelm on the top of the highest of the Kyffhauser range. There were three men in the same conveyance with us, and dozens of other carriages and carts, for this is now one of the most visited places in the country. The Kyffhauser range is an isolated spur belonging to the Thuringer forest rather, than the Harz, and rising about a thousand feet from the plains, densely wooded, and several of the heights crowned by beautiful ruins. But the most interesting of all is the one on which this colossal monument is being erected. You know the legend, no doubt. The Emperor Frederick, called Barbarossa from his red beard, went on a crusade to the Holy Land, and never returned, and the people unwilling to believe that so beloved a ruler could die in so good a cause, explained his not returning by saying that he had taken refuge in the bowels of this mountain, where he was held in a magic sleep, from which he would awaken and come forth when Germany should once more be a glorious united nation. This, in those old days, was a common supposition among the people, not only in relation to Barbarossa, but to others who had unaccountably disappeared. In the wild Norse mythology, the great one-eyed Wodan, when pursued and overcome by the powers of darkness, took refuge in the mountains where he slept his long winter sleep until ready to burst forth with renewed strength, and drive the darkness from the earth, and so when by the introduction of Christianity the people were forced to look up to another deity, they could not conceive of the fact that those they had worshipped so long did not exist—they were all transferred from Heaven, to dwell forever in the bosom of the mountains.

The old saying of Barbarossa was so popular and firmly fixed in the hearts of the people, that when the late Emperor William succeeded in forming a united Germany, and in establishing a unity of coinage of weights and measures, and in abolishing all taxes from one little country to another, he was looked upon as having fulfilled the saying, and this monument was decided to be placed upon the summit where the old Barbarossa was supposed to sleep. On the lower part, carved in stone, is a giant figure of the old emperor, with his beard, that has never ceased to grow, covering his entire body. He is represented as just awakening, and as being dazed by the splendor of the new empire. Above is a colossal figure of Wm. I. on horseback in bronze.

We reached home after twice changing cars, at eight o'clock. I will just add that as I sit in the garden the odor of new mown hay comes most deliciously to me from the meadow just beyond. There are a dozen or so men and girls turning the hay, and as it is dry, the latter carry it in enormous bundles on their backs, and bring it to the barn; they look so happy and contented.

A young man having called on his physician, said: "Now, sir, I wish no more trifling; my desire is that you at once strike at the root of my disease." "It shall be done," replied the doctor; and lifting his cane, he smashed the wide-decanter which stood on the table.

carries with it the rotting animal matter and distributes it, a splendid fertilizer, over the adjacent soil; and so, year after year, long after the nomadic Eskimos have departed to other sections, the grass grows green and healthy, showing far out to sea. At the Etah settlement, a flourishing place in 1853—when Dr. Kane wintered a few miles above, in Rensselaer Bay—but abandoned ten or twelve years ago, the vegetation in 1892 showed no signs of a loss of vigor, and, seemingly, the fertilizing it received in years gone by is sufficient for many more to come. No use is made of this grass by the Eskimos, except as padding in the soles of their boots; but the blossom of another species, one allied to the "rabbit-foot grass," and botanically known as Eriophorum polystachyon, and which grows in vast quantities in low, wet places, is put to use as punk or tinder, the cotton-like head igniting readily from a spark from flint.

While there are no plants grown by the Eskimos for food purposes, there are four natives of the arctic regions distinctly edible. One of these, a plant which has helped to save the life of more than one hardy explorer, is the scurvy grass, or Cochlearia officinalis. Its leaves and stems, somewhat resembling water cress, are most refreshing to a tired and hungry man. But while the plant bears a slight likeness to watercress, its taste is strongly acid and almost identical with that of sorrel. The plant grows profusely all over Greenland, one of the first to start in spring and one of the last to yield to the winter blast. In the south of Greenland, near the edge of the arctic circle but not growing far above it, is another plant esteemed as food. It is a species of rhubarb, though not nearly as fine-flavored as that in cultivation in civilized latitude; it is, in fact, almost insipid, with only a slight suggestion of acid.

A low creeping huckleberry, which grows throughout the whole extent of the arctic regions, affords a fruit eagerly sought for by the Eskimos, though not nearly so much esteemed as a species of crowberry botanically known as Empetrum nigrum. This grows in patches, sometimes covering an acre or more in extent; and so abundantly is the fruit borne that in August, when ripe, the ground looks as though covered with a black cloth. To a civilized stomach there is little to recommend in this fruit. There appears to be no taste to it, yielding apparently little else than a mass of seeds, pulp and water; but the Eskimos are passionately fond of the crowberry, and gorge themselves with the fruit as long as it lasts. In South Greenland, where Danish rule prevails, the crowberry is preserved and dried for winter use.

Of all the forms of vegetable life in the polar regions, mosses are apparently the most abundant. Their persistence in growth under all sorts of discouragements excites constant remark and admiration of those who have been fortunate enough to observe them. No obstacle seems to surely stop their progress. How they advance upon and bury dead glaciers and other masses of ice, has already been noted in a previous article; and the statement, therefore, that in valleys from which frozen rivers have receded, these cryptogamous plants speedily carpet with green the desolation which had been caused by the great ice masses, is not surprising. In Blauzy Dael, a picturesque valley on Disco Island, the ground moraine has been buried so deep by the mosses that for ten miles one walks over it as on a carpet of velvet. This class of vegetable life, in fact, fulfills the same duty in Greenland that other forms of plant life do in more favored climates, and the amount of rich matter deposited by them may be of great value in the future to that great arctic island.

Next to mosses, lichens occupy a prominent feature of the polar landscape. Wherever a stone or rock is bare of earth or ice, this form of vegetable life has obtained a foothold, and in thousands of instances completely hides the rocks on which they grow. The most notable example of this are the Crimson Cliffs, famous in every arctic story, and which extend north from Cape York for many miles to the great Petowik glacier. The material of these cliffs is gray granite, but this color has long been hidden from human eyes. As far as they can be seen at sea they gleam with a dull crimson glow, which deepens as they are approached. The change has been wrought by a small orange-red lichen, which clings so closely to its rocky home that it is impossible to dislodge it without bringing with it some of the rock itself. The cliffs on the west side of Robertson's Bay are also thickly covered with this red lichen; but, strange to say, those on the east side are hidden with a dull black species, said to be edible, though Dr. Hayes in his "Long Boat Journey," gives it a bad character as regards healthfulness.

In noting what are usually termed the more attractive forms of vegetation, the blooming plants, there may be said to be three belts in Greenland. The first of these begins at Cape Farewell and extends northward a few hundred miles to a point a short distance beyond Godthaab and just above the arctic circle. The second belt there begins and continues to the southern limit of Melville Bay; and the third embraces, at least, the remainder of Greenland which ends about the eighty-second degree north latitude. In the first belt are found a species of evergreen, Abies obovata, which grows to a height of from four to eight feet; a dwarf rhododendron; willows and birches, which lift their heads only a few inches from the ground, but cover a radius of several feet; and besides the usual arctic flora, many plants which find a home in the north New England States and in the Dominion of Canada. Among these may be mentioned the herbaceous dogwood.

In the second belt the evergreen tree disappears along with the foreign plants, leaving the other hard-wooded plants and arctic perennials. In the third belt the birches have vanished, and the only hard-wooded plants remaining to brave the rigors of the north polar climate are the willows and huckleberries and rhododendrons. That the birch should desert the others at Melville Bay seems inexplicable, since the experience of arctic navigators seems to tend to the belief that from that point northward the climate becomes no colder. Indeed, it has been claimed by some that the further north they found themselves the milder the temperature grew. Whether or not this is true, it is certain that Lieutenant Peary found that vegetation at the north extremity of Greenland, except for the birches, was as luxuriant and abundant as at McCormick Bay and its immediate surroundings.

Pentful as are the plants in Greenland, it is a curious fact that the colors of flowers are mainly confined to yellow and white. Of the more than one hundred species come upon by the writer during his expedition there in the summer of 1892, he found not more than a dozen species of other hues. Of this dozen the greater number were of varying shades of red, one or two were blue or purple, and one purple and white. Quoting the words of a lady acquaintance, in a letter to the writer on this subject recently, "Crimson and deep rich shades seem too warm a hue to associate with an environment of perpetual ice and snow."

The commonest plant is the yellow poppy. Wherever vegetable existence is possible it is to be found. It seems to flourish equally well in the crevices of the rocks and in the swampy lowlands; in the warm sunny nooks of the upland, or in the spots recently laid bare by the ice-cap. It grows as abundantly at Independence Bay as at Cape Farewell, and is, in fact, one of the most pleasing features of the arctic landscape. Next to the ubiquitous poppy is a pale golden little flower about the size of a ten-cent piece, and which is such an utter stranger to civilized man that it has never been burdened with other than its botanical name Dryas octopetala. Once a seaker after wild flowers came upon a few specimens in the White Mountains. These were at once gathered in, and it has never since been seen in that portion of the United States. But in Greenland it pushes the yellow poppy hard for supremacy, and is found in the same situations, though in not quite the same abundance. The whitlow grass, a large number of saxifrages, buttercups and dandelions are also among the plentiful flowers of the arctic, and now and then patches of epilobiums and an occasional campanula are come upon.

At home flowers appeal strongly to the heart of nearly everybody; but in that far-off land where the ice and snow gleam on every side the whole year round, a deeper love is engendered. Even the dandelion and the buttercup apt to be passed by at home for rarer flowers become imbued with a rare beauty that enthrones them thereafter among the favored blossoms.

Minute of Advice of Canada Yearly Meeting

To all our Members in Ontario and other part of Canada.—It is very important for the welfare of the Society and for that of the individual composing it, that we be preserved in love one towards another. In spiritual things whateve does not originate from God is of the Evil One. If we have not the Spirit of Christ we are none of his. If we have his Spirit dwelling in us we shall obey his command, "Love one another;" in so doing, even our enemies will be at peace with us. We would walk circumspectly, re deeming the time, because the days are evil; our words would be few and guarded; no prayer would be as David's formerly, "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer." We would be careful to avoid wounding the feelings of a brother, for when the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts the spirit that leads to talebearing or detraction cannot there exist. We would love our brothers as ourselves, and be willing to bear one another's burdens, so fulfilling the law of Christ.

We cannot fulfil the duties devolving upon us as parents in training up our children in the way they should go, except we know of living in Christ and He in us. This is a solemn truth. If our children are brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, they would be come as our forefathers were in their day, a light to the world, even as a city set on a hill that cannot be hid, and their influence in the coming generation would be for good.

Parents should not be discouraged if their labors with their children do not produce immediate fruit—it may be as bread cast upon the waters which will be found after many days.

We would affectionately advise our young people, who may be in situations where there are no meetings of our Society, to withdraw on the First-day of the week to a private place with the Holy Scriptures—the reading of which and waiting upon the Lord to be instructed of Him, will, we are satisfied, conduce more to the building them up in the most holy faith than the attendance at the assemblies of other denominations.

"Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat." It behooves us, therefore, individually to be continually watchful upon prayer, lest he take advantage of our weakness. If our trust is in the Lord, He will enable us to resist every temptation. "Render unto God the things that are God's," for "what will it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? or what shall a man gain in exchange for his soul?" The honors and pleasures of the world cannot compare with the happiness to be found in the service of Christ.

[We agree with our correspondent in the belief that the "Pastoral System" is inconsistent with our principles and profession as "Friends," and that its continued existence and spread would be destructive to our existence as a distinct branch of Christ's church; but as to the question, whether it is a fatal blow to our integrity as a religious body, to admit that such usages are practised in meetings of the Society of Friends, its solution depends on the limitations, which we each attach to the meaning of the word "Friends." In ordinary usage, a "Friend" is one who has a legal right of membership in our organized body. As so defined, we apprehend our friend William C. Allen was justified in making the remark criticized by our correspondent.—Ed.]

We have received a letter from a thoughtful Friend, who thus comments on a recent article in our paper.

"The article in THE FRIEND upon 'the danger of a supported Pastoral system' is clear and forcible. It points out what may be noticed in early Church history, that it was only when the members so lapsed from spirituality, as to fail in direct communion with God that in their assemblage, they desired to be fed by words from intermediate agency.

This explains the existence of Sacerdotalism in every age of the Christian Church; and to-day it accounts for the difference between companies of worshippers alive in the Truth, and those who to make their gatherings attractive have a prescribed routine of music and vocal utterance.

But to acknowledge that meetings may practice these usages and still be Friends is I think a fatal blow to our integrity as a religious body.

If other sects maintain the pastoral system, as the best that is practicable in the present state of mankind, we need not oppose them.

But to admit that 'it has fastened its teeth into our body and can not be well removed,' is to admit that the days of our high standard of Divine communion and of ministry are numbered.

The Sunday School Chronicle, of London, condenses as a "deadly enemy of spiritual life" the habit of uttering in public, petitions to God which are not the spontaneous desires of a longing soul.

Selected for "THE FRIEND,"
THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM.

The Lord is my Shepherd; oh the bliss of resting
Within the care of one who loves so well;
Who knows each pathway, understands each danger,
Whose tenderness no tongue can ever tell.

I shall not want, for He I know will give me
From day to day the very help I need;
The strength for working in life's busy places,
Or grace for resting on its daily need.

He maketh me lie down when I am weary,
For well He knoweth when the way is rough;
And so He says to me with loving firmness,
"Be still, my child, for thou hast toiled enough."

And then He comes Himself and watches o'er me,
To aid my weakness by His perfect strength,
Until I almost love the forced seclusion;
And learn to thank Him for his rest at length.

His loving kindness far surpasseth language;
For when I rise again to journey on,
He leadeth me in scenes of richest beauty,
And never lets me walk one step alone.

Restored, He leadeth up some glorious mountain,
And if I ever wander from his side,
He findeth me; and I just learn that safety
Belongs to those who in his care abide.

And so we journey on, the paths He chooses
Are often not what I should think the best;
But then He knows the way, and loves me dearly,
So in that knowledge I have perfect rest.

Yes, even when I pass right through the valley
All dark, with death's grim shadows crowding near,
His rod and staff give then the needed comforts,
Whilst He is with me to support and cheer.

And when fierce foes arise to stay my progress
He nerves my arm and cheers me for the fight,
What can I therefore do, but conquer grandly,
And thank Him for the way He kept me right.

My cup of mercy then is running ever
And I am rich, possessing such a Friend, Whose arm doth never fail, who chaungeth never,
Who loving once, will love until the end."

THERE ARE MOMENTS.

I. MENCH CHAMBERS.

There are moments in to-day,
God knows where,
When they who have a blessing,
And can spare,
May confer as angels do,
Help to bring another through A troubled day.

There are moments in to-day,
Seek to find;
For they hold an open way
To be kind,
Unto such as seldom hear
Mercy's footsteps drawing near Unto their door.

There are moments in to-day,
Find them all;
For our Father up in Heaven
Lets them fall,
And He wills that they shall be Messengers with good from thee
To such as heed.

[The following sketch of the means of conveyance of freight in the days prior to the use of railroads in our country, revives in the mind of the Editor some of his youthful experiences. His home at that time was in Philadelphia, but he frequently spent the summer with relatives who lived thirty or forty miles west of the city, and who kept a Conestoga wagon and a team of horses, and often hauled groceries and other store goods for the neighboring country stores. Therefore he naturally became familiar with the ideas of the teamsters. One of their remarks has often been remembered—"If you want to make money teaming, you must have a broad-wheeled wagon and go to Pitts." (Pittsburg.)

He can testify from personal experience to the accuracy of the description given—for he has shared with a relative who drove the team, the mattress spread at night on the floor of the tavern.—E.D.]

"In our boyhood there were three 'turnpike' roads of which we knew, and over which we were wont at times to travel. They ran east and west, and over them passed a large part of the internal commerce which crossed the Alleghenies. On these roads the well-known Conestoga wagon was in use. It was as distinct a type of the large conveyance of that day, as the freight train is of the present time. The teams were made up of four or six horses and a driver, who sometimes owned his team and horses, and was respected accordingly on the road. Some of them were aesthetical in their way, and had their steeds well caparisoned. We well remember the stir in the old school house by the way, when it was noised around that a 'bell team' was coming up the road. It was not a usual thing, and the team so announced was generally counted among the dandies of the road. Six great horses, each with a row of bells over his collar, and stepping out with a freedom which showed not only their strength, but also how well the contents of the wagon were adjusted to the drawing power of the team, made an attractive sight. Thus they journeyed on, day after day, reaching well-known points each evening, and starting fresh in the early morning.

The long reaches of the 'pike' were dotted on both sides with taverns, which were an essential feature of this system of forwarding. They were large buildings, surrounded by extensive grounds, into which as the night approached wagon after wagon was driven, the horse trough which hung at their rear dislodged, the team fed, while the group of wagoners gathered on the porch or in a great room inside. When bed time came, each driver brought in his mattress, unrolled it and lay down on the floor to rest. Sometimes, when there chanced to be a crowd, the congregation of sleepers ran out into the adjacent halls and other rooms. In the morning before the break of day, all in the house were astir. Breakfast was eaten; bills, which were usually small, were collected, and at early dawn, the wagon yard was emptied for another day's haul westward. This was the system of internal communication known to our fathers. We would call it slow, and slow it was, but sufficient for the time and the demands. The relics thereof may be seen in the fine and spacious old houses known still along these highways as the 'Buck,' the 'Boat,' the 'Steamboat,' the 'Ship,' and the 'Green Tree,' where the wagoners of a past generation had their haunts and held their evening chats.

We hardly knew when this system of forwarding disappeared. But one morning it was announced that the Philadelphia and Columbia railroad had been completed, and was open for freight and travel. We did not comprehend the meaning of the announcement when it was first made. But we began to understand its meaning when we saw its effect, and when the 'bell team,' with its six well kept grays, or its shining black steeds came up the hill no more. A revolution had come up, and we had not noted its coming until its work was accomplished. The day of the wagon and turnpike had passed—the day of the car and locomotive had come in."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Reminiscences.

In an obituary in THE FRIEND of a dear one that had lived to a great age, mention was made that in clearing up their farm in early life, oxen were the only team kept for several years, in consequence of which she used to walk several miles to meeting. This reminded the writer very forcibly that many years since that, in making a farm in the prairies and west of the Mississippi River, oxen were for several years the only team of the family and that we used them to go several miles to meeting hitched to the farm wagon; and as lumber was so difficult to get, that rough boards to lay across the top of the box for to sit on, would have been deemed a luxury, in the absence of which the box of the wagon was well bedded with hay or grass, as best suited our taste, in the center of which the mother's nursing chair had a place, and she with her infant in her arms very naturally formed the center of attraction, as the older children rolled and tumbled about, ever and anon shouting for Duke and Dime to go on, then begging of their papa to smack them with the thong. Once in early spring, the frost was so out it was doubtful whether one pair of oxen could get through the great slough and reach our Monthly Meeting in due time, so the lead oxen were hitched over, the trip was made in due time. Meeting over, we met with an agreeable looking female Friend that appeared to be an entire stranger, we invited her to go home with us. She took a seat in our wagon and informed us that she and her husband had just come from York State and were about making a settlement on the prairie a few miles west of us. Our acquaintance was, I believe, mutually agreeable, and I trust and hope it may continue through the remainder of our pilgrimage here. Though no more to be called prairie land, for it is now studied with productive farms, each farm having a grove.

Not many years since wife and I were out from home and met at our boarding house this female Friend in company with several others among whom was a man and his wife from Eastern Pennsylvania. He in particular liked to hear stories of early times, which induced the writer to relate the circumstance of our first acquaintance, alluding to our Friend, and invited some one else to entertain our stranger by relating some things that had happened; observing that we were all of the class of early settlers. My female Friend took up the subject and related that her first acquaintance at my house was prolonged quite beyond her intention for it was arranged that parties were to call for her the next morning; but there came on such a storm of wind and snow no one could travel for the next two days, so that she was obliged to be with us three nights and two days and then it was with great difficulty that they could travel, so deep was the mud and snow. But she had seen similar storms in York State. She told us too that her ride with wife and me was not her first experience with riding with oxen, for when her husband came into the State shortly before, they shipped to the then western extremity of railroad conveyance, a village called West Liberty, about 25 miles west of the Mississippi River. I think she stated that having no knowledge of any one, or of the country, her husband canvassed around to find a conveyance of some kind to take them somewhere, but concluded that the best thing was to buy a yoke of oxen and wagon and a few bushels of ears of corn and strike out, having a mind to go to the North. Their trappings were placed in the wagon, a portion of which served for forms to sit on. He had provided some sort of a staff for a goad, but never having been used to such business, found himself quite at a loss to make the necessary manipulations. She assisted as well as she could, via: some appropriate gesticulations accompanied with "Go on, Buck, go on, Berry," but with it all, ere they had gone far in crossing one of the great sloughs with which the country then abounded, the weary brutes refused to move. With all the efforts to urge them on there they still stand. The driver happened to think of the ears of corn. He got some and on going in front of his team with it in hand, they manifested an eagerness for it. Letting them have a taste increased their greed and by walking ahead they pulled through to solid ground where all could ride; but at each place of the kind the same treatment had to be resorted to. Thus they wended their way for forty miles or more, where they chose a spot and built a small house and planted a grove. The Bible history tells of such migrators, very generally as erecting a tent and digging a well, so we will presume that this Joab and Mary also dugged a well.

The tiny seeds that were planted grew and became great trees, and it may be well said the fowls of the air came and lodged in their branches, for the writer remembers well when no birds were to be seen on those vast plains except some water-snipes. But now there are many different kinds, greatly to the annoyance of the small fruit grower. When this grove was planted it was expected that if it succeeded it might become a source of wealth to the owner to distribute among those that might be induced to settle near enough to receive fuel from its branches. But quite a contrary result has taken place. By the influence of railroad transportation more substantial fuel is available. The grove that was once the proprietor's great delight has several years since been considered a nuisance and the present owner of the premises, a son of the worthy pair that started the improvement, has it all cut off, and to endeavor to make the best of it told the writer that it furnished him several hundred feet of sawed lumber and many fine sticks of hewn timber.

When the meeting was held in the dwelling of the writer it was usual for several pair of oxen to be in the yard, and at the neighboring meeting, held in a private house some six miles distant, it being more numerous attended the number of ox teams was double or triple. Those meetings now compose a large Monthly Meeting, and it is the privilege of nearly all the members to attend riding in comfortable rigs.

Concerning the Death of Isaac Larrance.

Last Eighth Month he requested me to write to the Editor of THE FRIEND, to discontinue that paper, since his eyesight had become so poor he could not read it, and being deaf could not hear anyone read to him. Said he "I would not give it up if I could see! I feel very grateful to them for sending it to me so long without recompense.

He was very feeble during Autumn, although he continued to go down stairs to his meals until after New Years, when he had a stroke of paralysis, which more enfeebled him, and for a time left him speechless. He seemed to recover somewhat from this shock but took little notice of his surroundings. Through all his sufferings and infirmities he gave evidence of the strong character that had ruled his life, remaining to the last scrupulously clean as to his personal habits, which, considering his great age, was remarkable.

He was born the fourteenth of Sixth Month, 1804. After much trouble in spirit to know what was right for him, he became convinced at the early age of fourteen years that it was right for him to become a member of the Society of Friends, to the principles of which he remained faithful throughout his long life, doing conscientiously whatever his hands found to do to promote the cause of Christ.

Even the last year or two of his life, when infirmities kept him in the house, he would have a few words of comfort for the domestics of the household, one in particular who had been serving in the family for twelve years, frequently remarks to me with tears in her eyes, "I miss the few comforting words your father often spoke to me, they always did me so much good."

After reaching his majority he went to a school of higher learning where he studied Latin, Geometry, Surveying, etc. He became very proficient in Grammar and Mathematics, these branches of study were a delight to him.

He entered the profession of school teaching, doing little else for ten years. Many of his pupils becoming prominent in society and the affairs of the world, always turned to him with a degree of reverence as having been one of the instruments in starting them on the way to success.

He was for long years an active member in the church, both with money and influence. Serving in many useful ways to promote the spread of Christ's teachings; everything else was subservient to the Church and its works.

In 1833 he was married to Elizabeth, daughter of John Ellis.

On the eighteenth of Third Month, 1896, while sitting in his easy chair beside his faithful companion with whom he had lived nearly sixty-three years—he quietly passed away. As a tired infant falls asleep in the arms of its mother, so he fell asleep in the arms of his Saviour.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 22, 1896.

In looking over some of the early records of our Society in Pennsylvania, and the correspondence which was maintained with Friends in London, it is interesting and instructive to notice how closely Friends on opposite sides of the ocean were banded together by the spirit of love and mutual sympathy.

The defeat of General Braddock at Fort Duquesne in 1755 and the fear of attacks on the isolated settlers by the French and Indians caused much excitement in Pennsylvania, and loud cries from those who did not believe that war was unchristian for the organization and maintenance of an armed force to protect the people. Although multitudes of other people had settled within its limits, yet up to this time the controlling power in the civil government had been in the hands of Friends. In 1756 Friends in England were appealed to to exercise their influence with the Proprietaries, and if necessary, with the general government. An epistle from the London Meeting for Sufferings to Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting contains these loving expressions: "Ye are our brethren, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, whose welfare is as dear to us as our own, and to whom we are united in the bonds of Gospel fellowship. Whatever such a union requires, that we hope to fulfil; and as we have been on some former occasions, so we still continue disposed with willing minds, to the best of our capacity to assist you in anything we may, and in the same manner we should expect from you were our situations exchanged."

The difficulties connected with the war with France were not of long duration, but the unsettlement in this country which led to the war of the revolution, soon succeeded, and gave fresh occasion for the exercise of loving care on the part of Friends in Great Britain. In 1771 an epistle was received from London Meeting for Sufferings which says: "When we take a view of our brethren in your and some other provinces in America, the increase of members by birth, new families, new settlements arising, we cannot but fervently wish that all suitable care may be taken to supply the rising youth with the means of useful information; and that such Friends' books may be diligently spread amongst the distant settlements and families, as may tend to season their minds with a sense of truth, and draw them by the examples proposed to them, to a love of it and its testimony."

In the First Month of 1775, after expressing their sympathy, London Friends add: "There is under all the trials and vicissitudes to which in this life we are exposed, one great source of stability and comfort, one everlasting and Almighty Helper to all who trust in Him. To this we must mutually exhort and encourage one another to look, and patiently to wait for the manifestations of his holy power."

In the Eighth Month of the same year a very affectionate epistle from London Yearly Meeting to Friends in America was received, sympathizing with them in their trials in the present commotion. It contains the following advice: "Dwell under a sense of the power and presence of God, all sufficient and merciful; so will ye be preserved in peace and innocence, amidst all the various exercises ye may meet with; and if afflictions such as neither we nor our fathers have felt, are permitted to come upon you, you will be enabled to bear a part in the general calamity, with a patience and resignation that a sense of the Lord's presence only can inspire."

An epistle from Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings to that of London, after relating some particulars respecting their situation, and the defection of some, adds that there remain a considerable number who are preserved out of the tumult and noises which abound; who are comforted in the participation of your wholesome counsel and sympathy, knowing that the Spirit of Truth will speak the same language through all who faithfully attend to its unerring dictates; these being united in the bond of Christian fellowship mutually partake in suffering, and are each other's joy in the Lord."

An epistle from London Meeting for Sufferings in Seventh Month of 1776 thus concludes: "Finally, brethren, live in love and in holy fear, laboring above all things to keep a conscience void of offence towards God and man; and so may we be preserved one in faith and practice throughout our generations."

Friends in England not only sent messages of sympathy and encouragement to their brethren in America, but as these were exposed to great pecuniary losses, sent a large sum of money to relieve those most in need.

American Friends had by this time about freed themselves from any complicity with slaveholding, and they called the attention of their English brethren to the propriety of endeavoring to put a stop to the slave-trade, in which many English merchants were engaged.

There being much distress in England on account of the scarcity of provisions, in 1801 a subscription was raised for the relief of Friends and others there, and the treasurer of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting remitted four thousand one hundred and sixty-five pounds sterling to relieve this distress. Subsequently about one thousand six hundred pounds additional was remitted. In 1802 London Friends reported that relief had been extended to eight hundred and ten Friends and four hundred and twenty not in membership.

An epistle from London Meeting for Sufferings in 1803 contains the following salutary hint: "The concerns which engage both your meeting and ours, have often much of an outward nature in them, there seems therefore the greater occasion of watchfulness, that we be not induced to suppose, that of ourselves we may act in them to advantage; and it is good ever to have in remembrance, that the ultimate purpose of all our meetings is to serve the cause of Truth, and that unless the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain."

Another epistle from the same body in 1812 gives interesting evidence of the existence of a "measure of Gospel love uniting us to our distant brethren, and giving us to see in renewed freshness, that however varied our circumstances and the trials consequent thereon, yet as we are careful to move under the direction of the Divine Head, we shall as a body compacted with joints and bands, continue to witness a holy harmony, drinking into one spirit, and becoming increasingly one another's joy in the Lord."

It is a pleasing occupation to trace the evidences of unbroken unity and sympathy between the Society in England and in America, and which continued through the controversies that culminated in the separation of 1827. The first intimation of uneasiness that we have met with is in an epistle to London Meeting for Sufferings in 1835, which contains the following paragraph: "We would tenderly remark that a number of treatises of a religious character, written by some members in England, having for some time past been introduced and spread in this country, it has given cause to much concern and exercise to Friends in many parts, who are desirous to keep steadfast in the principles and doctrines most surely believed and established amongst us."

The reply to this epistle cordially responds to the exercise expressed in it, and deplors "the mischievous effects of publications tending to depreciate the writings of our early Friends, and to shake the faith of the inexperienced in the teachings and guidance of the Holy Spirit."

An epistle to the Meeting for Sufferings in London indicates that the introduction into this country of treatises published in England containing sentiments not in accordance with those held by the Society of Friends from the beginning, "has caused much exercise to many brethren," and suggests the revision of works on our principles before they are issued from the press.

An epistle to London Meeting for Sufferings in 1846 enters still more fully into the subject of unsound books issued in England, and circulated in this country.

As London Yearly Meeting took no effective step to check the issuing of such books, Philadelphia Friends in 1847 prepared an "Appeal for the Ancient Doctrines," in which numerous passages from the books alluded to were contrasted with others taken from the writings of early members of our Society, and their disagreement pointed out. This effort to prevent the spread of unsound views among our own members had the secondary effect of emphasizing the difference in the official positions of the two Yearly Meetings—a difference which has been continued and increased by their respective subsequent courses of action.

The Psalmist says, "How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" Who is there that would not rejoice to see a restoration of the harmony and love that once bound London and Philadelphia Yearly Meetings together? But before that blessed day can fully dawn, we believe there must be a substantial unity in doctrine and practice—agreeably to the query of the prophet Amos, "Can two walk together except they be agreed?"

IN THE FRIEND of Second Month 22nd an article was printed, taken from a Seattle paper on the paradoxes of Australia. A letter from a Friend in Australia says it is incorrect. "Australia is not quite such a land of paradoxes as it says it is. The only correct facts are that we have black swans, the leaves of the gum trees stand edge-wise and cast very little shadow, and the stone of the native cherry grows on the outside (but not all over the fruit). We have some splendid English oaks in the streets, also poplars, growing to a very good height and size."

We are indebted to a Friend living near Philadelphia for a copy of the letter containing these corrections.

During the week ending last Seventh-day 173 persons died from the effects of the heat in Philadelphia. The prolonged hot wave that has just ended is quite without parallel in any Eighth Month as far back as the records extend, and it has seldom been exceeded since the system of the thermometer was introduced above the normal on Eighth Month 2nd, but the excessive heat (the daily maximum being over 90 degrees) did not begin until two days later. Beginning with that date the maximum have been: Eighth Month, 4th, 99; 5th, 94; 6th, 96; 7th, 95; 8th, 96; 9th, 96; 10th, 96; 11th, 97; 12th, 99; 13th, 94; 14th, 98. A severe storm swept over Central Iowa last Seventh-day evening and great damage was done. In Des Moines one of the finest bridges, a bridge over the Des Moines river over which the banks, bridges were carried away and railroads were blocked by washouts. Since 1851 it is estimated, 48,211 men have been killed in mining accidents in Great Britain. Li Hing Chang tells a director of the Bank of England that his concern, as a private corporation, could easily bring about international bimetalism, and that it is only England's selfishness and desire for her own personal gain, at the expense of the welfare of the rest of the civilized world, that prevents the bank from doing it. A plain but pertinent thesis that no one can deny. Money, as an issue, is so rapidly becoming of greater importance the world over than the tariff, that it would be interesting to know how the former British arguments against protection, the gist of which is that it is a selfish policy of taking care of one's self without regard to the welfare of the rest of the world, can stand in blocking universal bimetalism when it would probably be more than agreeable to nearly every other nation on the globe.

It is reported that the Arctic explorer, Naussen has arrived at Vardoe on the steamer Windward.

Cairo, Eighth Month 16.—The official cholera statistics show that during the past week there were 1391 deaths from the disease throughout Egypt. The total number of deaths since the outbreak of the scourge is 14,755.

DIED, on the twentieth of Sixth Month, 1896, at her residence in Chesterfield, Morgan C. Ohio ELIZABETH T. RHODES, wife of Hannan Rhodes, aged eighty years; a member of Chesterfield Monthly and Particular Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend seemed firmly attached to the doctrines and principles as held by our worthy predecessor, G. Fox. As her sickness increased, she felt that her time here was short, and manifested an earnest desire to be prepared for the final change, expressed her regret at not having lived a life more devoted to her Master, but was favored to feel perfect peace, and gave directions about her funeral with entire composure. Her friends have a well grounded hope that through redeeming love and mercy she was permitted to enter that City whose walls are salivation and whose gates are praise.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1852.—Eleventh Month 1st.—I was somewhat sick this morning but got better before meeting time, but not well enough to go, I thought.—I missed much good by being absent—dear Anne has told me some of the communications which I wish to remember. J. W. spoke of the Bible, how instructive it was, not a page of it could be opened but a Divinely illumined mind could find some instruction. He referred to Martha and Mary, that the dear Master loved them both—household duties were to be cared for and performed. When it was told Mary that the Master called for her, she rose up immediately and went. May we all be ready to go when the Master calls for us. He also spoke of Lazarus in the grave, like some of us being laid in the grave of sin, for whom parents and friends prayed and shed tears, encouraging the exercised friends to still continue their prayers; that their tears were bottled and they would be heard, that they might at the close of time be able to hear the language “Come ye blessed of my Father,” etc. Dear Friend Gibbons commenced with “Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven;” saying that it was needful for us to get into a child-like state. How great a favor to be a member of so good and favored a meeting. There is so much pride in my poor wicked heart. I wonder if it will ever be cured. “Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes and prudent in their own sight.”

7th.—Last Fifth-day Anne Emlen was married to Joseph Howell of Philadelphia, at our Meeting. A pleasant young couple, and I hope they will be helped along, and that dear Anne will be enabled to follow her blessed Master's calling, wherever He may lead her. I hope poor I may also be enabled to follow Him. We had such a favored meeting; dear Hannah Warner was here, also William and Elizabeth Evans. H. spoke first to the children of believing parents, encouraging them to faithfulness, saying that where much had been given much would be required. Next dear William Evans spoke. “It is not in man who walketh to direct his steps.” “A good man's ways are ordered of the Lord.” What a privilege it is to have our ways ordered by the Lord, and much more that was very instructive. I was glad, for all the townspeople that were collected to hear it. One thing he said was so good—that for everything we gave up, our meek and lowly Saviour would give us himself instead. Then dear Elizabeth appeared in a most feeling manner in supplication, for all, and particularly for some that were plucked as a brand from the burning. So many blessings from a gracious and long suffering God.

To-day we were again favored, dear H. Gibbons supplicated for preservation for us all and particularly for the young—it was so sweet. Could poor wicked I take any of it? She spoke to some, saying, perhaps they were in the state to which this language would be applicable, “As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, Oh! Lord.” I felt fully resolved to serve my Heavenly Father, wherever He should lead, but still deeper were my feelings when dear ——— arose saying, “that the cup of blessing seemed full, but would not be poured out until we were willing to bow low,” repeating and closing with the passage: “Bring all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in my house and prove me now here with saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it.”

14th.—We had a favored meeting I think. This is I suppose the last one here that John Wood will be present before going to the Indian Settlement. David Cope was here and spoke much, commencing with the parable of the talents; of those that had five and hid their reward, of those that had two and had their reward, then of the one and how he found fault. Ah, that is I that am finding fault, poor me. Thon, Holy Father! art very gracious and merciful to visit me and teach me so much. Be pleased not to forsake me, but keep me safe in the way I should go. Shortly after David's communication, dear Phebe W. Roberts said, “Will ye also go away? To whom shall we go, thou hast the word of eternal life”—recommending to submit to the yoke; repeating these verses from Lamentations: “It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him. He putteth his mouth in the dust if so be there may be hope.” I feel so thankful that I heard this last quotation. It is so confirming to me. May I receive strength to walk lowly, humbly, silently. Next ——— appeared in solemn supplication. He is now staying with us a few days till he gets his business further arranged for leaving. I think it is such a favor that my home is cast here. Preserve me, Heavenly Father, and make me more worthy of such favors. The example of a solid silence before meals is a good example to me, I do not always get to the right feeling then. To-morrow I expect an increase in the numbers of my school. Oh! may I be faithful to my God and then I know He will strengthen me to be faithful in my school. “As thy day is, so shall thy strength be,” was quoted by dear P. W. R. in Quarterly Meeting.

21st.—Silent meeting. Poor I, had as usual to feel the sting of sin. Oh! may I not be cast off. Those who were saying “We will not have these men to reign over us,” were commended to be brought and slain before Him. And the wicked servant that hid his talent and found fault, had to be cast into outer darkness. Awful consideration! “Oh! that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments, then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea.”

First-day.—In meeting I thought of my school being so fall as not to be able to take the other applicants and I remembered the passage, “Bring all the tithes into my store house,” etc. I often thought that was being fulfilled to poor unworthy me, who has not brought much sacrifice to the Lord. Oh! that I might bring all the tithes into the store house, that I might have a blessing on my exertions for the scholars and be enabled to set them a good example.

Twelfth Mo. 1st.—Monthly Meeting. Silent until near the close, when dear Mary Kite rose with these words: “Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations,” and afterwards, the servant is not above his Master, nor the disciple above his Lord. I am glad I heard it, though I hope not to take encouragement when I do not deserve it.

5th.—Dear Friend Gibbons appeared in supplication so sweetly. Oh! Holy Father, answer her petitions for the tossed ones; be pleased in thy mercy to conquer the foes in them, that so cause them to sin; give them strength to follow thee, and so get peace of mind.

12th.—Silent meeting. Mourning and sadness have to be my continual portion so long as I am disobedient. Oh! most merciful Father, cast me not off, I pray thee, “God, be merciful to me a sinner.”

19th.—Dear Friends were at meeting and I suppose enjoyed it, but poor I was in a cold state and did not enjoy much quiet feeling. Ah, me, that the all powerful “I am,” will break my stubborn will.

On the fifteenth of this month, my dear little nephew deceased, Howard P. Brooks, dear brother's, and sister R.'s child. What an affliction! He was a sweet child, I loved him very much. May we all be resigned to the Divine will concerning this matter. May dear sister be strengthened to bear it with resignation and fulfill her duties and follow on to meet him in heaven.

This evening I was encouraged in reading some in John Barclay, viz: “Be warned, be prevailed upon dear reader, by one, who acknowledges to thee that he himself has been in great depths of wickedness through disobedience to the faithful unflinching monitor, and who has found no peace, no deliverance, but through the low portal of obedience to the same. By this he has been from day to day encouraged and strengthened to leave off one evil practice and disposition after another, and has been helped in some small degree to put on a better righteousness than his own, and he assure thee that thy repentance and thy faith are to be measured by thy obedience to this appearance of Christ within, the hope of glory, as He is received in his secret visitations and obeyed in his manifested requirements."

1853.—First Month 2nd.—Another year has gone by for me to account for. Am I any better? I wish I could say some better, but I fear not much. I am still devoid of that peace which my soul longs for. "Create in me a clean heart, oh, Lord, and renew a right spirit within me," was the language quoted by dear H. Gibbons last Monthly Meeting day, and may it be mine in sincerity and fervency. Oh! I did desire in meeting to-day, that He, who can make me clean, would condescend to make me willing to follow all his leadings. His power alone can break my stubborn heart and so give true peace within. Save me, oh, Heavenly Father, from a false peace and be pleased not to cast me off forever.

9th.—Dear Friend Gibbons spoke to the young. Oh! may I submit under the kind instructions that are so mercifully granted me. There is one that will hear and help if I apply unto him. Not look outward for help, but inward to God, and obey his voice. I have resolved to do so and do pray for strength to be willing to become nothing in this world. "Ask and ye shall receive, seek and ye shall find," his promises are yea and amen for ever, she then appeared in supplication.

Holy and merciful Father, wilt thou be pleased to stain the beauty of the world in my sight, and draw me with a powerful love unto thyself, so that I may have some pure peace such as thy favored ones enjoy, such as the world cannot give, nor the world take away. I have desired to be good, too, so that I may in some measure, cheer these dear aged Friends, before their departure from this world. They love the Truth so much.

Eighth Month 21st.—Vacation over. Dear H. Gibbons spoke and supplicated for us. "If a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." Yesterday fifteen scholars; my hard cold better. "Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day long."

31st.—Monthly Meeting. David Cope spoke and supplicated for us to be brought down into great humiliation. It is a great attainment to become as passive as clay.

Ninth Month 5th.—James Emlen and Phebe W. Roberts start to-day on a religious visit to Indiana Yearly Meeting and those composing it. May the work prosper and may I be better by the time they get back.

8th.—Silent meeting. My scholars are more orderly in meeting than formerly for which I feel thankful to my Heavenly Father—I am enabled to speak more kindly.

24th.—Many scholars. It is pleasant to fly kites, but it makes missed lessons for boys.

29th.—Hannah Gibbons opened a concern to visit the families of Uwchlan Monthly Meeting, Martha Jeffers to accompany her.

Dear Mary Kite quoted the language, "These that be planted in the house of the Lord, shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall bring forth fruit in old age." The Lord is good to those who are willing to spend and be spent in his service.

Tenth Month 2nd.—Silent meeting. Christ can teach me, and does, but I am to walk still more lowly. Committee met. Satisfied with our exertions. I was glad, school full, forty scholars—too many. Dear Friend Gibbons and Friend Jeffers started for Uwchlan.

6th.—Silent meeting. One little girl made them laugh.

25th.—Anniversary of my coming to West Chester. How thankful I feel that my Heavenly Father has helped me in school. How humbly I ought to serve Him.

18th.—Silent meeting. I tried and could at last say, "Here am I, Lord, do with me as seemeth good unto thee."

Eleventh Month 7th.—This day heard the sad account of Susan Wood's death at Tusasasa. A dear useful woman, has been in the Indian country trying to do good.

Twelfth Month 4th.—Morris Cope here. I do desire my Heavenly Father to open my eyes and ears spiritually.

Lord, be merciful to me a sinner. Not by might, or by power, but my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts.

11th.—John Tatum from Wilmington spoke in meeting. James Thomas from Goshen, also spoke—not every one that says "Lord be merciful to me a sinner," but he that obeys the commands, is accepted.

For "THE FRIEND."

A Visit to Lauterberg.

We let ourselves be awakened at five o'clock, and by ten minutes of six we were on the way. The foister gave us definite directions and the foisterin some sandwiches to put in the leather "butter-brod-tasche" that I bought yesterday on purpose. So we mounted the steep slope in front of the house with light hearts. The way lay along a ridge, winding from one side to the other, along the edge of steep slopes, through forests of pine, then of beech, then again pine, with frequent charming views into cultivated valleys or deep ravines. The entire way was marked with arrows pointing in the direction to go. We kept on steadily and came at last to an opening where we could see the tower rising above the trees on a mountain ahead of us. Though we were already so high, the climb up was quite steep, and we did not stop until we stood on the lookout above. From here, spread out around us, was a limitless expanse of rounded forest-clad mountain tops. I had thought that we should see Lauterberg from this height, nestling in the valley directly below, but in this I was disappointed. However, as we had made the tower by a little after eight, resting somewhat on the way, I felt sure we would be there in twenty minutes at least. We followed the signs painted on the trees, and made a very rapid descent of perhaps fifteen hundred feet, coming at last on the main road. Up to this time we had seen but one human being—a laborer at a distance—and no animal larger than an ant, at several of whose piles of sand and pine needles we had stopped to admire the busy workers.

Here upon the road was a wagon, and two horses eating hay close by. Soon a lad appeared behind them, and in order to have something to say, I asked, "How high is the knollen?" He shrugged his shoulders in the peculiar German fashion, and replied, "Weiss nicht" (don't know). "How far is it to Lauterberg down this road?" "Weiss auch nicht" (don't know that either). "Is it Harzberg that is in this direction, then?" "Weiss auch nicht." "Well, I said in despair, "Lauterberg must be here somewhere. Are you sure it isn't down this road." "I tell you I don't know. I live six hours from here, and know nothing about it, only it ain't the way you're going. I guess it's over there;" pointing indefinitely across the range on the other side the valley, about twelve hundred feet high; "over there in the other valley." Well, I was puzzled, and went up and down, hoping to see a sign again, but there was none to be found. Then, seeing a steep path up the mountain, and as the last sign pointed in that direction more than to the road, we started on the trail, but as it was little worn and no pointers appeared, it turned back and followed the road in the opposite direction. We went on and on, hoping to see some one who did know something or an encouraging sign, but none appeared. We, however, did not let that prevent our enjoying to the full the charming valley we were in, with its rushing crystal-clear brook, the ferns and flowers, to say nothing of the delicious wild strawberries that hung in tempting clusters, so large and red and ripe from the rocks and banks by the side of the road. At last, however, I began to be sure Lauterberg must lay in the other direction, and I left A., whose little feet began to be tired, and ran on to see if a red roof were anywhere in sight. No, not one; and I returned and said, "We must go back, but before that we would take a drink from the brook and eat our lunch." It was now after nine. To our great joy some tourists came along soon after and told us we were right after all, only Lauterberg was an hour or so straight ahead. It was not until I found some one with a map, and saw that the knollen was by no means the mountain I had supposed, but that it lay about halfway between St. A. and L., the apex of an obtuse triangle, that I could understand it. The people were cutting the hay from the mountain sides, wherever it grew in the open spaces along the forest edges, and we met them going to their work, the whole family, babies and little children, man and wife. I stopped a mother with two little tots, in a shabby wagon, and another of about four years holding on to her dress, to ask her how times were and if the babies were well and what she did with them all day. They were fine little fellows and crowded and kicked in their basket, and she seemed very much pleased with the notice I took of them. I always speak to the people, I like their faces and rejoice with them over the splendid weather they have had this year for having. But these old women, with their enormous loads, staggering up the steep mountain sides! Yesterday, in Andreasberg, sorry as I was to make her stand a minute longer than she must, I couldn't help telling one poor old soul how sorry I felt for her and would like to help her if I could. To my sympathizing question, if it wasn't "dreadfully heavy," she straightened herself just enough to look up at me out from her load and though her face was hard and wrinkled, and only a few teeth left and the perspiration running, not dripping, from her face, she answered, cheerfully, in her mountain dialect, "Ach, fraulein. It's heavy to be sure, but it's so beautifully dry. It would be much heavier if it was not so dry. Just think—cut yesterday, and to-day under cover!" The thought that her lot was hard did not seem to enter her mind. I felt as though I were a very ungrateful sinner by the side of this withered old woman, and that I would learn a lesson from her. But to think of working all day so, and, what is more, having the children tugging at their gowns as they work, and one never hears a cross word or a harsh, quick tone—these worn-out women seem to me perfect monuments of patient unselfishness. But ugly! I don't think the old Indian women look more deformed and repulsive in gait, bearing and general appearance, and simply from hard, bard work; and then, too, in-born lack of the ability to make themselves look attractive, which is instinctive in even the lowest classes of the more Southern nations. But to our trip. It was twelve when we reached the pleasant gardens in Kurpark, for we had stopped a long time to rest in a picturesque arbor formed of a number of trees trimmed and trained to form his shelter in front of the Försterlei that was on the way, and here we had each a delicious glass of raspberry vinegar, which was very refreshing, and also the opportunity to get a great many points of information from some pleasant-looking tourists who were also resting there. As explained the party said, which they said, in surprise, "Auch die kleine da?" (also the little one?) I laughed and said, "Oh, yes, she is an American," which seemed to explain, and then he had to tell how old she was and where she was from, and when we said, Philadelphia, the man of the party said, "Oh, yes; my brother was there. That's the city where you can't get anything to drink on Sunday!" (That meant beer, of course.) After dinner, which we took sitting in an arbor by the side of a pretty mountain stream, we went by train to the next station (return ticket cost five cents), on the top of the mountain above, which is an interesting old ruin. The climb up was steep, but would have been richly repaid by the view above had he ruin not been there as well. It was formerly one of the fastnesses which for centuries was frequented by a succession of robber knights, who lived largely upon the plunder they brought back from their raids upon their brother knights, or more often the peaceful dwellers of the plain. They claim for this particular burg an age of twelve hundred years, but the earliest mention of it in history is in 952, when Otto the First gave it to a neighboring cloister. It must have been an almost impregnable fortress in its day, situated as it is upon a steep mountain top, with a perpendicular wall of natural rock formation, making two sides of it inaccessible. Almost nothing of it remains at present, excepting excavations in the rocks, the entrance-way and a tairway within, leading up into some arched passage-ways above, which in 1859 was restored. The entire gigantic edifice was destroyed in 1761 by the French during the Seven Years' War. The burg held out so stubbornly that the enemy supposed it possessed great treasures, and the day before the surrender was to take place a courier was dispatched to Paris reporting the good news. The excitable Parisians celebrated the event with feasting and rejoicings. The French general, however, who, in anticipation of the booty, had forced the peasantry of the neighborhood to come with wagons to carry it away, was so disgusted to find nothing out of a handful of worn-out men and almost no ammunition, that, in his anger, he had the entire edifice leveled to the ground. Even the natural wall he tried the force of his guns against, but here his rage had little effect, and they still stand. During the century and more since that day the loosened stones have been carried away by the people for more useful and peaceable purposes, so that now very little is left. We wandered around within the ruins and through a narrow passage in the rocks, on either side of which were openings into dark, cavernous passages, probably used as dungeons, for this was for many years a prison as well for State offenders. I must confess to a shudder now and then.

the south of the Hartz on one side, and the rolling, forest-covered billows of the mountains on the other.

We were thirsty after the climb, and we sat down had brought some cakes with us, we sat down at one of the many tables arranged along the level top of the old wall and overlooking the valley, and soon the waiter came, from whom we ordered a pot of coffee (German coffee won't hurt even a child, it is mostly chicory), for forty pfennig, with milk and sugar, and enjoyed ourselves to the full. From the waiter I got a great deal of information about the old ruin, as well as learned his own attitude towards the ruin in general. He was an inoffensive peasant lad from the "Heide," which means the moorland about Hamburg. He explained that the women did not work so hard and were not so badly treated there as here in the mountains—besides, they (the peasants) were not so poor and had a much higher sense of honor.

I cannot say enough of the excellent roads and foot-paths here in Germany, and especially here in the Hartz, and, though the wild grandeur of our American scenery is lacking, it is agreeable to see the perfect state of cultivation everywhere, not a weed to be seen nor a fence corner untidy (they have, however, no fences at all). The meadows are green up to the edge of the trees or to the border of the brooks, and in the woods there is seldom loose brush to be seen, because the poor people collect it all most carefully in order to have it to burn. Even when not carrying hay, one scarcely sees a peasant woman without a large basket strapped to her back, in which she puts sticks or weeds she digs up for the pigs. They are often knitting, too, as they go along, or else carrying a baby, and with one or two more at their skirts. The general salutation to every one they meet is, "Tag," short for "Guten tag," which means "Good day," and I find I get into the habit, too. Occasionally they say, "Mahizeit," which means, literally, "meal-time." This seems very strange, but must bear some relation to the fact that a German is mostly ready for a meal. After meals, the universal custom on leaving the table is to say, "Gesegnet mahizeit" (may the meal be blessed to you), and in many families where I have visited, the heads of the family shake hands with the guests, each giving the short salutation, or else the entire company join hands on rising, repeating the same. It is a very pretty custom, but "Mahizeit" as a passing salutation, seems funny enough.

Not far from this old ruin, Scharzfelds, which I have described, are many other places of interest, among others a series of excavations in some neighboring similar rock-masses, used in the very early times as a place for performing the rites and ceremonies of the Christian brotherhood, then struggling to gain a foothold in these wild regions. The rock is a soft limestone, and many of these excavations are the work of nature, and in some of them are stalaclitic formations.

TWO NAMES FOR THE SAME THING.—Some time ago the late Bishop of Derry delivered an address before the undergraduates of Oxford University, in which he administered the following deserved rebuke to those immature "thinkers" who, with ill-concealed superciliousness, proclaim themselves as "agnostics." He said: "You young men are very proud to call yourselves agnostics. It's a Greek word. I don't think you're equally fond of its Latin equivalent, 'ignoramus.'"—Christian Advocate.

William Penn's Address to the Thoughtless and Unconcerned.

Friends, as you are the sons and daughters of Adam, and my brethren after the flesh, often and earnest have been my desires and prayers to God on your behalf, that you may come to know your Creator to be your Redeemer and Restorer to the holy image (that through sin you have lost), by the power and spirit of his son Jesus Christ, whom He hath given for the light and life of the world. And O that you, who are called Christians, would receive Him into your hearts! For there it is you want Him, and at that door He stands knocking, that you might let Him in, but you do not open to Him: you are full of other guests, so that a manger is his lot among you now, as well as of old. Yet you are full of profession, as were the Jews when He came among them, who knew Him not, but rejected and evilly entreated Him. So that if you come not to the possession and experience of what you profess, all your formality in religion will stand you in no stead in the day of God's judgment.

I beseech you ponder with yourselves your eternal condition, and see what title, what ground and foundation you have for your Christianity:—if more than a profession, and an historical belief of the Gospel. Have you known the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost, and the fan of Christ that winnows away the chaff in your minds, the carnal lusts and affections? That Divine leaven of the kingdom, that, being received, leavens the whole lump of man, sanctifying him throughout in body, soul, and spirit? If this be not the ground of your confidence, you are in a miserable estate.

You will say, perhaps, that though you are sinners and live in daily commission of sin, and are not sanctified, yet you have faith in Christ, who has borne the curse for you, and in Him you are complete by faith, his righteousness being imputed to you.

But, my friends, let me entreat you not to deceive yourselves in so important a point, as is that of your immortal souls. If you have true faith in Christ, your faith will make you clean; it will sanctify you: for the saints' faith was their victory of old; by this they overcame sin within, and sinful men without. And if thou art in Christ, thou walkest not after the flesh, but after the spirit, whose fruits are manifest. Yea, thou art a new creature: new made, new fashioned, after God's will and mould. Old things are done away, and behold, all things are become new: love, desires, will, affections, and practices. It is not any longer thou that livest, thou disobedient, carnal, worldly one; but it is Christ that liveth in thee; and to live is Christ, and to die is thy eternal gain; because thou art assured that thy corruptible shall put on incorruption, and thy mortal immortality, and that thou hast a glorious house eternal in the heavens, that will never grow old or pass away. All this follows being in Christ, as heat follows fire and light the sun.

Therefore have a care how you presume to rely upon such a notion, as that you are in Christ, whilst in your old fallen nature: for what communion hath light with darkness, or Christ with Belial? Hear what the beloved disciple tells you: "If we say we have fellowship with God and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth." That is, if we go on in a sinful way, are captivated by our carnal affections, and are not converted to God, we walk in darkness, and cannot possibly in that state have any fellowship with God. Christ clothes them with his righteousness that receive his grace in their hearts and deny themselves and take up his cross daily and follow Him. Christ's righteousness makes men inwardly holy; of holy minds, wills and practices. It is nevertheless Christ's, although we have it; for it is ours, not by nature, but by faith and adoption; it is the gift of God. But still, though not ours, as of or from ourselves, for in that sense it is Christ's, for it is of and from Him; yet it is ours, and must be ours in possession, efficacy and enjoyment, to do us any good, or Christ's righteousness will profit us nothing. It was after this manner that He was made, to the primitive Christians righteousness, sanctification, justification and redemption; and if ever you will have the comfort, kernel and marrow of the Christian religion, thus you must come to learn and obtain it.

The world talks of God, but what do they do? They pray for power, but reject the principle in which it is. If you would know God and worship and serve God as you should do, you must come to the means He has ordained and given for that purpose. Some seek it in books, some in learned men; but what they look for is in themselves, though not of themselves, but they overlook it. The voice is too still, the seed too small and the light shineth in darkness; they are abroad, and so cannot divide the spoil, but the woman that lost her silver found it at home, after she had lighted her candle and swept her house. Do you, so too, and you shall find what Pilate wanted to know, namely, Truth—truth in the inward parts, so valuable in the sight of God.

The light of Christ within, who is the light of the world (and so a light to you, that tells you the truth of your condition) leads all that take heed unto it out of darkness into God's marvellous light. For light grows upon the obedient, it is sown for the righteous, and their way is a shining light that shines forth more and more to the perfect day.

Wherefore, oh, Friends, turn in, turn in, I beseech you. Where is the poison, there is the antidote. There you want Christ, and there you must find Him; and blessed be God, there you may find Him. Seek and you shall find, I testify for God. But then you must seek aright, with your whole heart, as men that seek for their lives, yea, for their eternal lives, diligently, humbly, patiently, as those that can taste no pleasure, comfort or satisfaction in anything else, unless you find Him whom your souls want to know and love above all. Oh, it is a travail, a spiritual travail! Let the carnal, profane world think and say as it will. And through this path you must walk to the city of God, that has eternal foundations, if ever you will come there.

Well, and what does this blessed light do for you? Why, first, it sets all your sins in order before you; it detects the spirit of this world in all its baits and allurements, and shows how man came to fall from God and the fallen estate he is in. Secondly, it begets a sense and sorrow, in such as believe it, for this fearful lapse. You will then see Him distinctly whom you have pierced, and all the blows and wounds you have given Him by your disobedience, and how you have made Him to serve with your sins, and you will weep and mourn for it, and your sorrow will be a godly sorrow. Thirdly, after this it will bring you to the holy watch, to take care that you do so no more, and that the enemy surprise you not again. Then thoughts, as well as words and works, will come to judgment, which is the way of holiness, in which the redeemed of the Lord do walk. Here you will come to love God above all, and your neighbors as yourselves. Nothing hurts, nothing harms, nothing makes afraid on this holy mountain. Now you come to be Christ's indeed, for you are his in nature and spirit, and not your own. And when you are thus Christ's, then Christ is yours, and not before. And here communion with the Father and with the Son you will know, and the efficacy of the blood of cleansing, even the blood of Jesus Christ, that Immaculate Lamb, which speaks better things than the blood of Abel, and which cleanseth from all sin the consciences of those that, through the living faith, come to be sprinkled with it from dead works to serve the Living God.

Thus says one that God has long since mercifully favored with his fatherly visitation and who was not disobedient to the heavenly vision and call; to whom the way of truth is more lovely and precious than ever, and that knowing the beauty and benefit of it above all worldly treasures, has chosen it for his chiefest joy, and therefore recommends it to thy love and choice, because He is with great sincerity and affection thy soul's friend.—Rise and Progress of the People called Quakers.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Patagonia, its Nomads and Animals.

Patagonia, east of the Andes, was the home of the Tehuelche Indians, a well developed race of men, who inhabited what was regarded as a desert country, that had been lifted up from the bottom of the South Atlantic Ocean. There are salt lakes and beds of salt left where the sea water drained away. The soil is alluvial, and a well-driller finds beds of sand, gravel, clay, etc., but no rocks. The desert seems to have been peculiarly well adapted to guanacos and ostriches, and the flesh of these with dandelions, bunch grass seeds, fungi, etc., seems to have been well adapted to sustain a race of men that were physically magnificent.

For three hundred and sixty years after Magellan's voyage, the Patagonian Indians held their ground, but finally the demands of the Argentine cattle and sheep men for more land, required that the hunting grounds of the Indians should be taken, and the cheapest way to obtain them was thought to be by war. Spears says: "In these matters the civilized people of Argentine have been as much like the civilized people of the United States as two bullets from one mould." A war of extermination was waged, which reduced the Tehuelche nation from an estimated population of three thousand to about five hundred.

Of the Panther (Felis concolor), our author says, nowhere in the world does it reach greater size, or accumulate more fat. They are said not to disturb men, but in addition to the Guanacos on which they feed, they are quite destructive to the sheep, and hence are hunted by the sheep growers. Its flesh is freely eaten. It is called by the plainsmen a name which means "the friend of man," and an anecdote is told of a young woman named Maldonado, who in a time of famine caused by war with the Indians, wandered into the world seeking edible roots. At the close of the war she was restored to her people, and on the supposition that she had deserted to the Indians, was condemned to be tied to a tree three miles from town and left there to be eaten by wild beasts. After two nights and a day soldiers were sent to bring in her bones for burial, but to their great astonishment she was found unharmed. She said a panther had remained with her and had driven off the jaguars and other beasts of prey that came to destroy her.

Spears compares the armadillo to a thick turtle without any breast-plate. It eats anything. It kills serpents by squatting on them, and sawing its body to and fro, so that the edges of its protective shell cut the snake to pieces. Although it eats many things that are repulsive to civilized tastes, the armadillo is itself a most delicious article of food.

The ostrich is one of the most interesting birds of the desert. The old cock-bird has a harem of several hens. He builds a nest, and the hens take turns in depositing their eggs in it until it is full. Nests having forty eggs in them are not uncommon. When the nest is full enough, the old cock takes possession, and sits on and cares for them until they are hatched.

When the eggs are hatched the male looks after the brood—leads them about where food is most abundant, and keeps his eyes open for the ever near dangers, sounding a loud snorting or rasping call when he sees a danger. When a brood of young ostriches is warned by their guardian, they instantly fade out of sight. Squatting motionless, with his head in the sand, the ostrich is so near in color like the sand and the scant herbage that grows there, that even experienced hunters fail to see him.

Ostriches readily learn the habits of their persecutors. When Patagonia was first discovered by white men the aborigines were afraid, and the ostriches, being hunted by men afraid, were accustomed to flee at the sight of a man. The Spaniards introduced horses on the pampas, and at first ostriches were not greatly frightened by a man riding. Very soon, however, they found the mounted man dangerous.

A ranch owner is found here and there who will not permit ostrich hunting on his grounds. The birds quickly learn where they are safe, and gather from surrounding districts in great bands, leaving the hunting grounds bare. And, what is more remarkable still, the very birds that will flee for their lives when started by a man on the hunted grounds will show not the least concern at the approach of a man when on safe ground.

HOW THEY MAKE THEIR MONEY.—When a patent-medicine advertiser or a quack doctor offers to send two or any other number of bottles free to persons who have chronic diseases that require months or years for their termination or cure, the presumption is that the medicines consist of stimulants or narcotics, which will in the one case produce a spurious vigor that is taken for improvement, and in the other a dullness of sensibility to pain which is taken for the departure of its cause. The vendor in such a case expects to make his money upon the bottles which will be bought by the victims before they discover that they are deriving no real benefit. But the man who sends an apparatus with unknown powers, such as "magnetism," "rings," "electricity," "polarization," "ozone," "X rays," or "vitaliveness drawn from atmosphere" has a shrewder scheme than the others, for he can at least get his machine back; and the more absurd a thing is or the less known, the more it stimulates faith, imagination, and hope. So it is a "faith cure" besides. Every time the patient feels better he attributes it to the apparatus; when he feels worse he thinks he might have died without it.—Christian Advocate.

IN MOTHER'S PLACE.

In mother's place—so father said,
His kind hand resting on my head,
While all the burdens of the day,
The care and trouble, fell away!
New purpose seemed to grow into me
To struggle for the victory,
And by the fireside's happy light
I breathed a silent prayer to-night!

I never grieved in times gone by
When much there was to fret and cry
The sweetest temper all day long!
Was it to-day when things went wrong,
I checked the hasty, angry word,
Hearing the tones my childhood heard,
Seeing, in memory, the while,
The vision of a vanished smile?

The children, crowding at my side,
Need me, and will not be denied.
The home her presence made so bright
Needs me, and I must be its light.
The girls and boys too soon will go
From sheltering arms of love, I know—
May the sweet influence of home
Be theirs, wherever they may roam!

Yes! it is little I can do;
Yet faith in God will bear me through,
And give me wisdom to fulfil
My duty, since it is his will!
That these, who need a mother's care,
Should find in me—benefit of her,
And longing for her lovely face—
A guide and friend in mother's place!

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Picnic by the Ranocacs.

On the eighth of the Eighth Month I accepted a kind invitation to join a family of friends in spending a day by the banks of the Ranocacs. The loose boards that are used to separate the baskets of produce in the farm-wagon made comfortable seats, and although twenty were seated thereon, there was yet room for more. There were five young people from one family and seven or eight from another, and a little sprinkling of older people.

The day was warm, but a gentle breeze made it rather pleasant riding. After leaving the stone road, we soon entered on a farm, valuable principally for the layer of moulding sand with which it is underlain—much of which has now been removed. The land appeared to be worth almost nothing for agricultural purposes, yet much of it was overrun with a native product of wild plants, conspicuous for its abundance among which was a species of wild bean (Strophostyles augustosa). It is a vine, sometimes growing to the length of several feet, either prostrate on the ground, or climbing, if it finds suitable plants near by to attach itself to. The flowers are purplish in color, and the seed-vessels are pods or legumes as they are called by botanists—similar to those of the pea and bean. Hence the natural family to which they belong is termed Leguminosae, or plants bearing legumes.

It was interesting to note how large a proportion of the plants growing on this barren sand belong to this "pod family." The most notable among these for the size and abundance of its yellow blossoms and the beauty of its foliage, was the Partridge Pea or Sensitive Pea (Cassia chamaecrista). The flowers are about an inch in diameter, and often from twenty to fifty of these bright blossoms are clustered in a single plant, making a most showy and beautiful object; closely allied to this, but with much smaller flowers, is the Wild Sensitive plant (Cassia nitida). If a specimen of either is plucked, the numerous leaflets which are so systematically arranged on the opposite sides of the common leaf-stalk, at once begin to close up, so that it is difficult for a botanist to preserve specimens in such a shape as to show the natural appearance of these beautiful plants.

We found also many plants belonging to this natural family, in which the pod, instead of having the regular outline of a pea or bean-pod, was indented on one or both sides, as if it was built up of a number of separate pods joined together. These belonged to one of several species of Desmodium, and had purple flowers. These pods are generally covered with minute hooked hairs, which adhere to clothing or to the fleeces of animals, and are thus distributed over the country.

We found also the Rattle-box (Crotalaria Scitellalis), a small, yellow-flowered plant, in which the pod is inflated, and when mature, contain several loose seeds, which when shaken rattle in their dried enclosures, from which circumstance is derived both its common and its botanical names. This was a pleasing find, since it brought to memory the botanical researches of more than half a century ago.

Another interesting plant was the Groundnut (Apis tuberosa), a vine which climbed over the adjacent bushes, and bore clusters of brown purple flowers. It owes its common name to its habit of bearing edible tubers on underground shoots. It is a totally different plant from that which is so extensively cultivated in Virginia and North Carolina, which has a yellow blossom and produces pods, often under the surface of the soil, which are called groundnuts or peanuts. Although that also is a member of the Leguminosae.

This natural family contains an immense number of species. Some, as the beans and peas are cultivated for food, others as clover and lucerne, furnish fodder for cattle; logwood and other tropical trees yield important coloring matters; and Indigo is prepared from a plant of this order. It furnishes also valuable balsams and gums, such as Gum Tragacanth, Gum Arabic and Gum Senegal.

We found refuge from the sun's rays in a thick shade near the banks of the Ranocacs, and close by a fine spring of cold water, which added much to the pleasantness of the situation. The little people seemed to enjoy trotting about in the sand, freed from the incumbrance of shoes and stockings, and made a playhouse in the sand, enclosed by a circle of little sticks set upright, and containing a central pile of sand for a table, and four small piles around it, to represent chairs. They showed considerable agility in climbing into the wagon in pursuit of apples, which it contained.

In due season a fire of sticks was built and dinner prepared, and this together with bathing in the stream and some slight exploration of the neighboring country occupied the time till it was seasonable to return homeward.

Among the plants we met with were two species of Dodder (Cuscuta). This curious plant is without leaves, and has thread-like yellowish stems. Soon after rising from the ground it commences to twine around the stems of plants growing near it, and becomes entirely parasitic, deriving its nourishment from the bark of its host. One of the dodders we found was a confused tangle of yellow threads spreading over the branches of the shrub it had selected for its foster-mother.

In walking along the margin of the stream my attention was arrested by a spike of violet blue flowers, surmounting a water plant with a large heart-shaped leaf on the stem. It was the Pickerel-weed (Pontederia cordata), which grows abundantly in reach of tide-water along the Delaware River and its tributaries. On the upper part of each flower are two small yellow dots. A botanical friend had given me some weeks before a South American specimen, the Pontederia crassipes, which when placed in a pot of water seemed to thrive well. In this the foot-stalk of each leaf contained a large oval swelling, probably an air bladder, designed to support the leaf on the surface of the water, and hold up the flower stems. One morning we were surprised to find that during the night the plant had developed a flower stem of several inches in height, and had five large flowers fully opened. On each of these were two yellow spots similar to those I observed on our native Pontederia. This common trait on two species so different from each other was an interesting phenomenon.

The Reed (Phragmites communis) was in bloom plentifully in the adjoining marshes. This tall and coarse grass somewhat resembles broom corn in appearance when in flower. Its seeds are a favorite food of the Bob-o-link or reed-bird, which is sure to be here when the seed ripens. J. W.

Marriage Customs Among Chinese.

An instance of the breaking up of an early betrothal came under my notice, illustrative of both the old and the new order of things. At Go-ho-ki, where our first chapel was built, there lived a man of great local influence, named Tan Phauh. He was a powerfully built man, who had been through several rebellions on the mainland, and was not used to having his plans thwarted by anybody. His services in connection with the establishing of our first church are told hereafter. He was a loyal Chinese, and, although he became one of our earliest converts, he never was unpatriotic or disloyal as a citizen.

There lived with the family a girl who was betrothed to his second son. She was a good, hard-working girl, and was kindly treated, and really loved as a daughter. The whole family became Christian, and this son joined my class of students and travelled with us, preparing himself for the ministry. Association with other students, and college life at Tamsui, widened his horizon and greatly developed his intellectual powers. He began to think for himself, and self-consciousness developed independence. His ideals were enlarged and his standards of life changed. The thought of his betrothal began to be burdensome. He had nothing against the girl, but she was not his ideal, and he could not cherish for her the "supreme affection for one" that philosophers call love. She was uneducated, and took no interest in the larger subjects and ambitions that now fired his soul. Under such circumstances young men who, thinking themselves in love, voluntarily entered into an engagement without the advice or knowledge of their parents have been known to fret and become discontented. Poor Teng cannot, then, be blamed for fretting over a betrothal to which he was not a party, made years before he understood or cared.

On the occasion of one of his visits home the question of his marriage to Sim-pu was raised, and he distinctly refused. He did not love the girl and could not marry her. The grief, disappointment, and anger of his parents were almost beyond control. They were Christians, but the custom was an old one, and besides, they loved Sim-pu. The father went to bed and stayed there till his anger cooled. The mother felt even more strongly. I visited them and reasoned with them, explaining the nature and terms of Christian marriage, and the teachings of the Bible on the subject. The eldest son agreed with me, and thought his brother should be allowed to choose for himself. The younger son stood by the venerable social custom, and wanted to know what kind of a lady Theatre would like for a wife, that he should refuse one whom they all loved so much. But Theatre was unmoved. In the struggle between love and custom the tender passion prevailed. He would not give his hand, for he could not give his heart. The girl felt badly, for she had had her day-dreams.

Theg married a girl he loved, and Sim-pu married a young farmer living a few miles away. The old man often told me that only Christianity and the grace of God could reconcile him to his son's action. The girl did not cherish any hard feelings, as she would have done were she not a Christian. When passing near where she lived, she insisted on my visiting her new home, and her welcome to myself and the students who were with me had no suggestion of animosity or secret regret.

Waste and Hard Times.

This nation wastes, yea, worse than wastes, $1,500,000,000 annually on rum, for the waste has a reflex influence. It breeds indolence, crime and vice of every character.

Although we hear the constant cry of "hard times," yet if any one stands on a principal street of our city on Saturday night, between seven and eight o'clock, and sees the laboring classes pouring in and out of the saloons, like bees in a hive, they could not tell that we were in the midst of "hard times." Then it certainly is our wasted resources that produce "hard times," all talk to the contrary notwithstanding.

For the next few months we will have a nation of lunatics so far as actions are concerned. I mean they will get in line, with banner and torch, march through rain and mud, clap their hands, stamp their feet, and halloo themselves hoarse, at the statement of men who willfully deceive them as to the real cause of "hard times."

Let the nation bear in mind that no system of protection nor tariff can bring permanent good times while the American or un-American saloon is allowed to exist. The vast resources of this country are amply sufficient to put every man, woman and child beyond the reach of want, and yet intemperance is stalking abroad in the land, devouring half of our substance each year.

Then think of the amounts consumed each year for tobacco. Here, many Christians are to blame, and some who are ministers of the Gospel will chew and spit, smoke and puff, snuff and sneeze, and not only injure their constitutions, and their reputations, but waste the Lord's money. "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." Millions of the nation's money is wasted annually for superfluous ornaments, such as do the wearer no good at all. There can, I am sure, be no excuse for a Christian wearing finger-rings, car-rings and such trinkets. They can do no good at all, and only indicate pride in the heart of the wearer.

I know it is urged by some Christians that these things do not make them proud. Possibly they do not, but they are sure signs that we are proud. If I go out on the commons and see a horse or cow with a yoke on, my first impression is, that is a rogue. The yoke does not make it a rogue, but it is a sure sign that it is one; and if it was not it would not wear the yoke. Millions are wasted for costly burial outfits and granite monuments, which do no good. I wonder who started such customs, and why Christians could fall into the habit. Some one will call me an extremist, a fogy, and I do not care. These are my sentiments.

But, in conclusion, our city has a committee raising six thousand dollars to expend on fireworks to-morrow, July 4th, and there will be twice that amount wasted by private individuals. What for? Just for show. It means "sounding a trumpet of patriotism," showing to the world our patriotism, when we are indulging in some of the most unpatriotic habits and customs, and thousands of our citizens on the point of starvation. Shame!

To be sure, millions now are worse than squandered in secret societies each year. These are among the most gigantic swindles known to men, and are among the causes of our "hard times."—(Portland, Ore.), Christian Cynosure.

Ought Christians to Patronize the Theatre?

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

In attempting to answer the above question I shall speak of the average theatre and the general character of performances on the stage in this country. I do not deny that there are clean plays performed by clean actors, and that some Christian people may sometimes derive a pure intellectual enjoyment from witnessing "Hamlet" or some kindred masterpiece of genius impressively rendered. Nor do I deny that there are many good people who would rejoice to have the stage everywhere and always a school of pure morals and ennobling influence. It is not the theatre as it ought to be that I am discussing, but the theatre as it is, and as a totality. The play-house is a popular institution; and as an institution does it deserve the moral support and the pecuniary patronage of the followers of Jesus Christ?

When the question was once up for discussion, my old friend, the late Dr. Howard Crosby, affirmed in his terse, blunt fashion that "the theatre is a nasty place," and he confirmed his bold remark by a startling array of facts gathered during his long life in his native city of New York. Dr. Crosby was a minister of the Gospel, and some might contend that his point of view was too puritanical. Mrs. Fanny Kemble Butler was, in her early life, a celebrated actress, and belonged to the most famous histrionic family that ever lived; in her later years she uttered a very emphatic condemnation of the general influence of the stage both upon its performers and its patrons. The brilliant novelist, Mr. William D. Howells, has never been regarded as extremely puritanical; but a few months ago, in a leading literary journal, he said that while the theatre is often called a school of morals, "it is far oftener a school of immoralities," and that it frequently teaches, by example if not by precept, infamous things and atrocious things. Mr. Howells, with vehement earnestness, remarks: "If any pulpit vice were preached by mockeries of purity and appeals to lubricity such as we are used to in the theatre; if lying were inculcated, and passion put above duty; if revenge were taught as something noble; if homicide were lightly invoked, and adultery treated as a comical affair, somehow the law would reach that pulpit, although the State professes to have no relation with the Church.

In like manner, if in any private school or college the humanities were imparted by a chair devoted to the study of those authors whose work befalls literature, the law would somehow intervene to prevent the mischief, although the effect might be logically blamed as a socialistic meddling with private enterprise. The theatre, however, is left unmolested in almost any excess; ideas are enacted if not expressed there which are simply abominable. We all know it; we can prove it at any time; it is undeniable."

One of the reasons why a Christian should not patronize the stage is that it constantly unsexes women by presenting her before the public gaze in masculine attire. The common law forbids this elsewhere, and a woman who is detected on the streets in a man's dress will be subject to arrest by the police. Far worse than the assumption of a masculine dress is the well known fact that hundreds of women exhibit themselves on the stage in such a pitiless scantiness of attire as to outrage common decency. Christian brother, would you like to see your own sister or any lady friend exposing herself in such a plight? Yet when you enter the play-house you pay your money to encourage somebody else's sister or wife or daughter to make a sorry spectacle of herself for your amusement! "Be not partakers of other persons' sins" is a wholesome text for you to consider before you buy your ticket to the theatre; for whatever you pay the manager to present on his stage you are to a certain extent responsible for. How any Christian lady can patronize an institution that degrades her own sex is an enigma for an honest conscience to solve.

If the theatre is a school of morals, as its defenders constantly contend, then the teachers in that school ought not only to learn their own lessons, but to bear the most high and irreproachable character. I do not affirm that every actor is immoral or every actress is impure; but I have no doubt that the best of them would confess that if they manage to preserve a delicate purity of heart they do so in the face of terrible temptations. A celebrated actress told a friend of mine that she "only enters a theatre to enact her own part, and has as little association as possible with the members of her own profession." An actor who had quit the stage from conscientious convictions once said to me, when we passed the play house in which he had often performed, "behind those curtains lies Sodom." It is notorious that a very large proportion of the plays presented in the average theatre contain more or less of immoral teaching; and the exhibition which the theatre makes of itself in the pictorial advertisements that cover the dead walls is enough to reveal its true character. The theatre, as I have already remarked, is a public institution to be estimated by the sum total of its influence, just as the pulpit is. And if a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ bestows his pecuniary patronage upon the theatre, then is he to that degree responsible for it, and in a moral partnership with it.

There is an old and plausible theory that if Christian people would all agree to sustain an entirely unexceptionable drama by unexceptionable performers, the theatre would be regenerated. It is a lamentable fact that this has proved to be an "iridescent dream." The experiment has not proved successful when fairly attempted. The theatre manager is not a professional philanthropist; he "runs" his business simply and solely to make money. He produces what pays best; and if he can spice his veining entertainments with a plot that turns some sort of sexual depravity, or burlesque of evangelical religion, or a shameless exposure of physical beauty, the temptation to fill his offers is too strong to be resisted. The licentious stage and the Sabbath-breaking press are both conducted for filthy lucre; and the Christian who contributes to the support of either or if both is responsible for the spiritual mischief that they work.

A Christian needs recreation as much as any one else; but that recreation only is fit for a true Christian which makes the body healthier, the mind clearer and the immortal powers more vigorous. Whatever endangers self-purity and inflames evil passions is a sinful amusement. Wherever a servant of Christ cannot take his Master with him, he has no right to go; wherever he cannot ask a blessing on his pleasures, he has no business to be. Let him try this simple test on the average theatre, and he will find that the outside of the play house is the right side. There are certainly enough innocent and wholesome recreations without venturing upon one of doubtful morality—much less upon one which has wrought spiritual shipwreck upon thousands of souls. If the theatre has not helped many toward heaven, it has assuredly been to multitudes, especially of the young, a gateway to perdition.

Jesus Christ commands his followers to "come out and be separate." He drew a sharp, distinct dividing line between the "walking in the Spirit" and fulfilling the lusts of the flesh—between the pleasures of sin and the pleasures of a clean heart and a useful life. There is a tendency in these self-indulgent days to reduce this line to a mere chalk mark easily rubbed out! And when that dividing line is entirely effaced, then the nominal Christian and the people of the world can dance together in the same ball room, sit together around the same decanters of wine, and occupy adjoining boxes in the same theatre! How long will it take for such a Christianity to convert this world to the service of God?—The Presbyterian.

An Experience at Kano.

Soon after our arrival, a supplementary present from the king appeared, consisting of a hundred thousand cowries, an ox, a goat, three immense sacks of rice and a large bag of wheat. On receiving the cowries I was informed, what I subsequently ascertained to be correct, that it was customary to give the bearer ten thousand cowries for himself. They are delivered as a rule in bags containing twenty thousand each. Noticing that the man who was responsible for their safe carriage had brought one which was obviously underweight, some two thousand cowries having been extracted from it, I asked him if he was certain that this particular bag contained its proper amount. On receiving his assurance to that effect, I told him to sit down and count from this bag the ten thousand cowries, which, according to the native custom, I owed him. He did so with great alacrity, thinking, no doubt, that the white man was sadly lacking in sagacity to allow a creditor to count his own money unchecked. I noticed that he took full advantage of his privilege, and so far as I could judge, the sum which he counted exceeded by at least two thousand cowries that to which he was entitled. His task completed, I asked him again if he was sure that the bag as delivered by him had originally contained twenty thousand cowries. On his reply in the affirmative, I suggested to him that this being so, the amount which remained over must therefore be ten thousand. On his assuring me that my calculation was correct, I told him to leave with me the ten thousand which he had just counted, and to take the rest as his due. He departed with a look of chagrin on his face which it was piteous to see, but doubtless with his opinion as to the intelligence of the white man very considerably improved.—Hausaland.

Taming a Humming-Bird.

Several cases are on record of attempts to tame humming-birds, but when placed in a cage they do not thrive and soon die. The orange groves of Southern California abound in these attractive creatures, and several can often be seen about the flowering bushes, seeking food or chasing each other in play. Once, when flying on the slopes of the Sierra Madre Mountains, where they were very plentiful, I accomplished the feat of taking one in my hand.

I first noticed it in the garden, resting on a mustard-stalk, and, thinking to see how near I could approach, I gradually moved toward it by pretending to be otherwise engaged, until I was within five feet of it. The bird looked at me calmly, and I moved slowly nearer, whistling gently to attract its attention, as I began to think something was the matter with it. It bent its head upon one side, eyed me sharply, then flew to another stalk a few feet away, contemplating me as before. Again I approached, taking care not to alarm it, and this time I was almost within reaching distance before it flew away.

The bird seemed to have a growing confidence in me, and I became more and more deliberate in my movements, until I finally stood beside the little creature, gazing at me with its head tipped upon one side, as if questioning what I was about. I then withdrew and approached again, repeating this several times before I stretched out my hand to take it, at which it flew to another bush. But the next time, it allowed me to grasp it, and I had caught a wild bird, open-handed, without even the use of salt!

Such instances must be rare where birds are familiar with human beings. In some of the islands of the South Pacific, birds have been found that had never seen a man before, and allowed themselves to be picked up, and even had to be pushed out of peoples' way.

One of the curious features of humming-birds is that they are never found in Europe, being exclusively American, ranging in this country from the extreme north to the tropics, adding to the beauty of field and grove, being veritable living gems. Nothing can approach the humming-bird in its gorgeousness of decoration. It is especially rich in metallic tints, seemingly splashed with red, blue, green and other bronzes. Some appear to be decked in a coat of mail, others blazing in the sunlight with head-dresses and breastplates that are dazzling to behold, and defy description. The smallest of birds, they are one of the most beautiful of the many ornaments of our fields and gardens.—From Our Animal Friends.

AMONG all the agencies for bringing about the regeneration of men the lives of Christians are to be reckoned as belonging to the most effective. Every man makes the world better by making himself better. The power of the Holy Spirit attests genuine Christian example.—Parish Visitor.

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 29, 1896.

We have received a communication from our English Friend, John William Graham, correcting what he regards as a misunderstanding in an extract from a letter published in THE FRIEND of Eighth Month 8th, which conveys the impression that some of the members of London Yearly Meeting absent themselves from its sittings because they do not sympathize with its proceedings. The following extracts from J. W. G.'s letter explain his view:

Dear Friend:—The editorial position in thy issue of Eighth Month 8th, is occupied by a paragraph calling attention to the fact that a communication in The British Friend "states up" implies that true Friends have lately found the condition of the meetings of London Yearly Meeting so uncomfortable that they have tacitly consented to remain absent, thus preventing the Yearly Meeting from being truly representative of the condition of the Body."

There is a great misunderstanding here. I know of no English Friends who so absent themselves. If there are such, unknown to me, it is limited to a very few, and the reason is more one of personal peculiarity than anything else. There is no wide abstention such as would affect the representative character of the Yearly Meeting. On searching the British Friend for the alleged statement, I was surprised to find what must have been its basis in an article of my own, an editorial of Sixth Month 5th, on "The Second Yearly Meetings." I then wrote that the Yearly Meeting was only partially representative because "its arrangements can only be met by the wealthy and the leisured," changed circumstances make most of our members unable to spend a fortnight or even a week in London in Fifth Month."

This is apparently the text which has been so misconstrued. It seems worth while to correct a statement which tends to cause an unwarranted alienation of sympathy and respect between thy readers and our Friends in England. I find in moving among Friends in America, that distance and want of knowledge have caused differences to be exaggerated in more cases than one.

Thy Friend truly,

JOHN W. GRAHAM.

PHILADELPHIA, Eighth Month 29th, 1896.

We forwarded his communication to the friend whose letter gave occasion for it, with the hope that he would be able definitely to state whether or not his inference was derived from the editorial in The British Friend of Sixth Month 5th, but the reply received from him states that he has not on hand a file of The British Friend, and he appears to be unable from memory to answer the question decidedly. Under these circumstances, it seems to us proper to accept the explanation given by J. W. Graham.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A conference of Friends, principally of the Bangs Yearly Meeting, has been held the past week at Swarthmore, Delaware County, Pa. The principal subjects considered were: Education, philanthropic labor and the interests of Friends. The attendance has been large, one day numbering about four thousand.

From official information received by the Treasury Department from twenty-one countries, the exchange of silver during the calendar year 1895 amounted in the aggregate to $113,367,220.

Ex-Congressman Bourke Cockran addressed a great Democratic meeting in Madison Square Garden, New York, on the night of the 18th instant, in reply to the speech of William J. Bryan, the Chicago nominee for President delivered at the nomination meeting on the 12th. The attendance was the largest at any meeting ever held in the Garden, about 18,000 persons being present.

A mortgage for $2,000,000 was recently placed on a single building in New York.

Several of the big railroads leading out of New York have issued notices ordering retrenchments. This is chiefly due to the falling off in freight owing to the uncertainties of the business situation. Officials say that shippers seem to be limiting themselves to the necessities of the next three months, and are apparently restricting the amount of the freight.

The output of salmon from the Columbia River, which was expected to be 50 per cent. short this year, will be within 75,000 of the large total of 312,000 cases put in 1895.

Madison, the last salmon county on the main line of the Atlantic Central Railroad, between the Tennessee and Louisiana State lines, a distance of some three hundred miles, has voted against license in a Local Option election, by a majority of 20 votes. All the leading politicians of both parties were on the side of the no, the preachers, the women and a few brave laymen led the fight for prohibition.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune, writing from Atlanta, Ga., on the 15th instant, says: "Today the Populists nominated a Prohibition candidate for Governor of this State on a Prohibition platform. Morgan County, one of the strongholds of whiskey, with bar-rooms in full blast and an immense jug trade to boot, has voted for prohibition. The official, an official, all Democrats, in open advocacy of the saloons, went Prohibition by a large majority. The county had 2,400 voters on that day, and the 1,500 negro voters put out the saloons, with a majority of 528 for the Prohibition ticket. This is a pointer for the coming State election, and gives warrant to the belief that Seaman Wright, the anti-room candidate, may be the next Governor of Georgia."

Nansen's Arctic expedition has at last, after an absence of three years, been heard from, and the news is full of interest. He did not reach the North Pole, but he came within 250 miles of it, which is about 150 miles nearer than any other man is ever known to have gone.

The specific charge was that he had refused to give one of his patients alcohol who was supposed to need it. CORRECTION.—In the poem "In Memoriam," on page 25 of THE FRIEND and in ninth stanza, first line, the word "unfolds" should be "enolds."

The Memorial of Deborah B. Webb, issued by Kennet Bond Meeting, has been printed and is for sale at Friend's Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. Price, 5 cents.

DIED, on Eighth Month 12th, 1896, at his home in Germantown, WILLIAM HEXTH BRIGGS, aged forty-six years, a member and overseer of Frankford Monthly and Germantown Particular Meeting. This dear Friend was brought, in early life, to feel his great need of a Savior, and as he yielded to the precious invitations extended from time to time, he was favored to grow in grace and to experience the efficacy of the redeeming love of Christ, with a full assurance that, if faithful to his convictions, he would realize the promise, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." He was a useful and consistent member of the Society of Friends, and was firmly convinced of the Truths of the Gospel as held by it. His faithfulness in the attendance of meetings and in other things which he felt were required of him, and his cheerful submission to him many trials, which were cheerfully submitted to. He was gentle and loving in spirit, and manifested in his daily walk and conversation that he was endeavoring to follow Christ. He was deeply concerned to testify publicly of the joy and peace which he had experienced, and to encourage others to be faithful in seeking for a like blessing. The last year of his life was one of bodily suffering and weakness, and though he expressed but little towards the close, his family and friends have the comfortable assurance that he has been gathered to the just of all generations.

At her residence, the tenth of Eighth Month, 1896, Annice died at the fifty-sixth year of her age. A beloved member of Springfield Monthly Meeting of Friends, Linn County, Iowa. Although the summons came suddenly to her mourning friends, as they were hopeful until near the last, yet she gave evidence that she had not left the all-important work of preparation for the final change until prostrated unweakened, and patiently endured her suffering, which was great at times, saying, when desired were expressed for her recovery, "We must be in submission" and a short time before her death she said she had nothing but love for everybody. And we humbly trust our loss is her eternal gain, that, through the mercy and grace which has been gathered to a better inheritance.

—, after a short illness, at her late home, the residence of Jonathan Briggs, Coal Creek, Iowa, on the thirty-first of Seventh Month, 1896, JANE H. SEARS, in the fifty-eighth year of her age. A beloved member and overseer of Coal Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends.

—, on the eighth of Seventh Month, 1896, at her residence in Wilmington, Clinton County, Ohio, CAROLINE OSBORN, wife of Charles N. Osborn, aged nearly seventy-seven years. An esteemed member of Wilmington Monthly and Particular Meeting of (Conservative) Friends.

Our dear Friend was gifted with the pen of a ready letter writer, and quite a number of her letters having been placed in the hands of the compilers of these notes, it is proposed to insert one extract from them under their respective dates.

To a brother and sister, alluding to the death of their child:

WEST CHESTER, First Month 3rd, 1854.

Much during the past month, have thoughts of you been crowding on my mind. I know it as been a trying period for thee, dear sister. I am sure that thou art feeling her loss as each anniversary rings thoughts of the dear one. And though have been very silent on account of many cares and kind my time, yet I have sympathized with and desired for you as much as my poor mind as capable of, that you may be strengthened to bear all trials, that you may have to meet with. I don't know when I seemed to realize fully as last First-day, that if we try to do all that is required of us, we shall in a measure draw down the blessings of Heaven.

Last First-day evening after our usual family reading, Anne (Sheppard) read to us from one letter she had received from Friends, now ceased; then a little account that I had never card before, of the last sayings of her husband; all were excellent and instructive. We seemed to be dwelling on the thoughts of them in silence, when dear Friend Jefferis expressed a desire she felt to encourage little C. and G. in trying to do rightly, and wished we might be a family of love and still conduct ourselves so as to draw down the blessings of Heaven. We had such a good Monthly Meeting on Fourth-day. Dear Phoebe W. Roberts was here and spoke so singly to us, quoting the language, "Thus saith the High and Holy One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy, I dwell in a high and holy place, with Him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, to revive the heart of the contrite one," etc. Her communication was so comforting, if we only deserved so good a one. H. H. and others were here too. She spoke also, telling us that He who has been with us in the beginning would be with us to the end if we were obedient. They all dined here, it is a great pleasure to me, to wait on good friends, though I had not much time for I had to return to school."

1854.—Second Month 5th.—Last First-day we had a silent meeting. Samuel Cope was here to attend a funeral. On Fourth-day was our Monthly Meeting. Dear H. Gibbons spoke: "After the disciples had toiled all night and had taken nothing," upon following the Master's directions they enclosed a great multitude of fishes." "Ye ask and receive not because ye ask amiss." Ye should be more humble. If we were humble enough we would say with David, "I am a worm and no man." William Parke and Anna Mary Darlington passed meeting.

Dear Friend Gibbons addressed them, saying she felt her mind drawn into solitude, that they who were about to enter into Covenant, one with another, would also enter into Covenant with their God, that in serving Him there would be peace, and no sorrow added.

Dear Mary Kite spoke so kindly to me, after meeting, but I do not deserve any kindness from her. To-day dear H. Gibbons said the "Heart of man is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." If we did not give up to obey, the Holy Spirit would give us up, and when given up to ourselves we would become desperately wicked. Earnest were her desires that this might never be the situation of any one then present. Spoke of those to whom ten and five talents were given, then much of the one to whom one was given, who thought he had a hard Master; the answer was—bind his hand and foot. She did desire, that this might not be the case of any of us. I felt it, poor I, am rebellious yet—but I did not know it then. How thankful I ought to be that my merciful Heavenly Father would tell me again. I am going on in that easy way without enough of the Cross, too apt to think it hard. She also quoted, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden," etc. Some, in an especial manner should be willing, while mercy is extended. He would give them joys, she did desire that the partition which separated from these joys might be taken down. Then she so feelingly supplicated for some to be enabled to give up, for mercy to be continued to be given to them, recommending us to his grace with her own soul. I do earnestly desire strength to be faithful.

Second Month 12th.—Dear Lydia Kite at meeting spoke, "Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father, and serve Him with a perfect heart and a willing mind. If thou seek Him, He will be found of thee, if thou forsake Him, He will cast thee off forever," encouraging to believe that all could be saved by coming to Him. None need despair, "Him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." He will abundantly pardon. Poor H. F. felt it, I think, and I did try to desire for her to feel comfort, too, in my small way. I believe I have been enabled, part of this week to take up my cross. I mean to try still more.

In reading, I met with this, "But whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely and shall be quiet from fear of evil." What a favor to have perfect confidence. "If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God."

19th.—Did not get to Quarterly Meeting. A great disappointment, but good for me, no doubt.

25th.—A very rainy morning, Anne and myself got out, though we were nearly discouraged when we found the pavements flooded with running water. When I came down stairs Friend Jefferis kindly offered me her cloak to wear outside of mine, but partly through pride, and partly through a great dislike to wearing what is not my own, or hesitating to borrow, I refused. It was attributed to pride. I know I have much unmortified pride in me, and I felt sad in meeting. I thought the rain did me good in letting me have an opportunity to see more of my wicked self, though I feel thankful to Him who can give power, that He has given me power to live a somewhat more dedicated life for about two weeks past. I feel afraid all the time, I shall fall in another way. Be pleased, H-avenly Father, to enable me to be a servant of Thine. How sweet it is that I have been enabled in a little measure to give all up, not to feel such a host of condemnations against me. Oh! that this may not be a delusion, but I know I have borne a deep cross sometimes. May I do so still more, and be more worthy to be instructed in the knowledge of God and my Saviour.

Third Month 5th.—First-day. Dear Hannah Gibbons spoke and appeared in supplication, recommending to look for the Kingdom of God within us. I had been troubled with wandering thoughts, and was looking for and thinking of God in the wrong place. May I only look more within me.

I feel so poor and unfit for any good thing to dwell in me, and this can only be, as I try to obey that which leads me.

He is able to succeed all those that are tempted, "Touched with a feeling of our infirmities," etc.

The eminent apostle Paul said "When I would do good, evil is present with me." We must walk in the Cross. "If any man taketh not his cross and followeth after me, he cannot be my disciple." She earnestly desired that the faith of some might be increased. Wait upon Him, He will strengthen us to do rightly. Wait inwardly; Oh! I will try.

She supplicated for tossed ones, who were almost ready to say with the disciples formerly, "Carest Thou not that we perish," and for those who had too long put off bending their necks to the yoke, for He is worthy to be served with holy dedication. Oh! I feel particularly of the last class. I will try yet more, for I slip so often. "Man looketh upon the outward, but God seeth" my heart.

"If a man's ways please the Lord, He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him."

Though troubles and trials await, yet walk singly with Him and He will support.

Monthly Meeting was good to me, Dear Mary Kate petitioned for us to Him, who is worthy of full dedication of heart, worthy of praises, high praises.

Oh! He is wondrous, yet, so compassionate to me, a poor sinner yet, though I do try much.

19th.—Oh! may a greater and greater resignation of my will be to Thee, oh, most Merciful Father, Oh! strengthen me by thy strength to walk soberly and meekly, as Thou would have me to do—be pleased to forgive my sins and help me, or I shall perish.

When I hear of those so much younger being so much better than I, it makes me feel so ashamed. Last night this text came sweetly into my mind and again now, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest," etc. I must have more faith.

Trading in Africa.

Buying and selling, where Arabs or natives are concerned, is a far more tedious operation than can easily be explained. If the article in question be of any considerable value, the purchase or sale, as the case may be, is often a work not merely of hours but of days. When travelling to the north of the Sahara Desert, my companion and I were anxious on one occasion to dispose of two camels, for which we had no further use. The camels were in very good condition and had no visible defects of any kind. Two Arabs who were desirous of becoming purchasers, came to us and said that, as a result of a careful examination of our camels, they had discovered that they were both suffering from almost every disease to which a camel is liable, and would soon become absolutely useless to their owners, but that nevertheless they were willing to purchase them, naming a price which was about a quarter of their actual value. We replied by pointing out several unique virtues that the camels possessed, which would render them quite invaluable to any purchaser, offering at the same time to sell them for about six times the amount which they had named. The Arabs withdrew with an expression of horror and contempt, but in about half an hour came back to say that they had discovered one or two further deficiencies which our camels possessed, but that, this discovery notwithstanding, they were willing to make some considerable advance upon their original offer. We replied by pointing one or two further merits on the part of the camels which we had before omitted to mention, but said that despite this fresh discovery, we were willing to accept a somewhat lower price than that which we had at first asked. Negotiations of this kind had to be carried on for no less than three days before we succeeded in selling the camels at a reasonable price.

The above is a very fair illustration of the trouble and waste of time connected with buying and selling where either Arabs or natives are concerned.—Hansa-Laud.

A SINGING "BEAST".—A Chinaman lately visited Europe, where he saw many strange things, and, like other travellers, took pleasure in describing to his friends, when he returned, all that seemed to him strange or wonderful. Among the things he had never seen before were pianos, and this is what he said about them:

"The Europeans keep a four-legged beast which they make sing at will. A man, or more frequently a woman, or even a feeble girl, sits down in front of the animal and steps on its tail, at the same time striking its white teeth with his or her fingers, when the creature begins to sing. The singing, though much louder than that of a bird, is pleasant to listen to. The beast does not bite, nor does it move, though it is not tied up."—Lute Paper.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The contention having been made that the early Friends supplied pecuniary support to their ministers in consideration of their Gospel services, and have thereby set a precedent which justifies the present form of a paid pastorate as it exists in several of the Yearly Meetings of Friends, the following is extracted from "The Life of George Whitehead" as his testimony to the entire freedom of their Gospel ministry in his day. G. W. became associated with Friends about the year 1654 when but a youth, and his life for seventy years was much dedicated to labor in the cause of Truth. His residence was long in London as a member of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting, and by travelling and correspondence he became intimately acquainted with the affairs of the Society. He actively participated with other well-known Friends in watching the course of legislation that might affect the new Society's interest, and efficiently advocated its principles and the rights of conscience before the rulers and lawmakers of the realm. His statement of our Christian doctrines, written in refutation of George Keith's charges, is among the most lucid extant.

"There was a suffering case and complaint of some of the people called Quakers, concerning an undue execution of the late Poll-acts by distraining goods of certain persons as preachers or ministers for twenty shillings quarterly, who had no contributions or wages for preaching. There being a clause in a late Poll-act which runs thus: 'Every clergyman not being a lord spiritual, having or receiving, in or by any benefice or contribution or otherwise sixty pounds by the year or upwards; and every preacher or teacher in any congregation whatsoever not having taken orders according to the discipline of the Church of England, other than French Protestants, shall be charged and pay twenty-shillings quarterly.'

"These last words relating to every preacher or teacher, being general and without limitation—advantage has been taken thence on a literal construction—to extend the same to the great injury of divers persons, as preachers among said people who have no profit, gain or contribution at all on that account. When the said Poll-act was near expiring the Parliament ordered a new one to be drawn up, or the old one renewed in the year 1695, and many of our Friends were liable to suffer as they did before (the same clause being recited in the new act). Some of us, particularly Thomas Lower and myself, renewed the remembrance of our suffering case to divers eminent leading members of Parliament, and acquainted them how undeservedly many of our Friends had suffered as preachers, by a mal-administration of said act when they have no profits, gain or contribution on that account. Whereupon I proposed a brief emendation to the aforesaid clause, in order to defend our Friends from the undue imposition of the said tax as preachers.

"I proposed ten pounds per annum [as receipts] in relation to dissenting preachers, though that might seem to pinch harder upon us than other preachers who receive sixty pounds or upwards per annum, and might pay twenty shillings quarterly, better than we who receive no contributions, wages or profits for preaching or teaching, yet considering how clear our ministers are in this case from making the Gospel chargeable and how free they are from making a gain of their hearers for preaching to them; it being our principle and practice to preach the Gospel freely as Christ our Lord commanded, and not for any worldly profits or filthy lucre, I was the more ready to offer what I then did in this case in order to give the design of charging any of us as preachers a short turn, that we might not have twenty shillings quarterly imposed upon us for teaching or preaching the Gospel freely as we do.

"My said proposal for an emendation being approved of as reasonable, took such effect that our ministers were not taxed in that last Poll-act—nor did they suffer thereupon as many of them had before."

The Sphecicus Scroscius.

A few days since the writer received by mail a small box containing two interesting insects one a specimen of the large green cicada, commonly but erroneously termed locust. The true locust is a species of grasshopper.

The female of the cicada lays its eggs in little slits which it makes in the twigs of trees. When these are hatched the young drop to the ground and bury themselves in the earth, where they subsist by sucking the juices from the roots of trees. When full grown, which, in our large black and green species, requires two years they emerge from the ground, and fastening their claws in trunks of trees or rails of a fence the skin splits open, and the winged insect comes out in its mature state.

There is another species of cicada, which requires seventeen years to perfect its growth. This is called the seventeen year locust, and is better known than the other. Its habits are much the same.

The other insect, which my friend calls a large species of hornet, is a truly formidable specimen of the "sand-wasp," so called because it digs deep burrows in sand or gravel, some times two foot or more in depth. In the bottom of these it stows away a cicada, designed for the nourishment of the grub of the wasp. An egg is laid in the burrow, which hatches there and feeds on the helpless cicada.

The letter which accompanied the box says they fell to the ground at their feet, under the shade of a tree, in the meeting-house yard. In a moment it was evident that the hornet would be the victor, stinging the fly in quick succession in different parts of the body, and then seizing its victim, started to fly away with it. The fight was arrested by my friend, who made a captive of the sand-wasp. If he had allowed the wasp to follow its instincts, and watched it further movements, he would probably have been much interested in seeing it force its prey into a hole that had been previously excavated in the sandy ground at Cropwell. J. W.

SALT IN AFRICA.—The next most important article of commerce imported into Kano is probably salt. No salt is found throughout the whole of the Hausa States. The parts of the country which lie within a hundred and fifty miles of the rivers Niger and Benue are for the most part supplied with English salt imported by the Royal Niger Company. Kano and the entral districts are dependent upon native salt brought upon camels across the southern portion of the Great Sahara i. e., from A-shen and Ilma. The price of salt, as sold by retail in the Kano market, is about one shilling per pound, being very nearly equal to that of sugar which is imported from Egypt via Tripoli. Dr. Barth travelled some distance in company with salt caravan consisting of no less than three thousand camels.—Haus-land.

Friends in Westphalia.

F. Brande, pastor in Göttingen, Germany, has published an account of the Society of Friends in the County of Ravensberg, in the Russian Province of Westphalia, so far as they are connected with the administration of ecclesiastical affairs. A translation of this has been made by our friend, William Archut, from which the following article has been condensed. —[Ed.]

That district of country has long been remarkable for the susceptibility of its inhabitants to religious thought and agitation. They early adopted the Reformation as preached by Luther. Brande says Pietism always had a great many followers in those regions, and that conveniences are held on the farms, in which awakened peasants are the speakers. We there meet with persons, plain men of the people, who do not only know the Scriptures by heart, but also try to live according to them, and who, perhaps, understand many things better than we with our studied Greek, Latin and Hebrew knowledge. On the other hand, there was much superstition, belief in ghosts, sorcery, &c.

The most prominent member of the Society of Friends residing there, and whose name most frequently appears in the legal records, was the peasant Reckeffuss. This man was known to our author when a child. He and his wife wore the dress of the peasants. His beard was unshaven. They patiently endured the derision which they were exposed to. "It was strange to me that they never replied to a 'God-day,' with anything else than the words, 'I thank,' without uncovering the head, while the 'Thou' with which they addressed everybody with whom they had to do, put in my mind the Greek and Roman classics, which then had commenced to be my pleasure."

The attention of the government appears to have first been called to the Quakers in 1790 by information filed by the pastor of Valldorf, that Derrick Reckeffuss, a brother of the peasant already mentioned, had married a woman named Cordes without ministerial consent and without previous proclamation at church, and without priestly marriage, in the presence of several relatives, according to the rites customary among the Quakers, to whom they both belonged. The authorities informed Reckeffuss that his marriage with the woman Cordes could not be considered a lawful matrimony, and the children perhaps begotten could not be considered to be legitimately born, unless he would submit to be proclaimed at church, according to the laws of the land, and be married by an ordained minister.

An extract from the wedding address of Reckeffuss is worthy of attention:

"Whereas I, John Derrick Reckeffuss, am obligatorily engaged with Christina Cordes to enter into the state of holy and chaste matrimony, I feel myself compelled to renew faithfully thee, Christina Cordes, my consent or promise, in the name of God, in the presence of my dear Lord and Saviour, publicly and in the presence of thy and my brothers and sisters, or also fellow-pilgrims on the narrow way to eternity, and I promise solemnly thee, in the name of God, to be thy faithful husband, to live with thee in holy and chaste matrimony from now till death; to be salutary and profitable to the salvation of thy soul in all things, by (with) advice and assistance, prayer and labor (in), by temperance and sobriety, to give up all avarice and jealousy against thee and everybody with all my heart; to be neither quarrelsome nor extravagant, neither unfaithful nor keeping anything secret; neither to judge of thee against anybody nor to calumniate anything neither, whatever may happen privately or between us; to consider all thy faults and infirmities to be my own; neither to dishonor thee of them to any one, nor to make public frivolously anything; to be also satisfied with all, together with thee (as thou), with sour and sweet, love and sorrow, poverty and wealth, to consider thy cross to be my cross, to let it be only our endeavor to walk as obedient children in the inward presence of the dear Father, that our deeply fallen spirit may again come to its origin."

And then the question to the bride: "Shalt thou turn to thee, Christina Cordes, as a dear sister and bride, and I interrogate thee, in the presence of God and of my dear brothers and sisters, whether thou consentest in thy heart, by God's grace, to devote thyself now in the same manner, to wit: To be as a faithful wife till death, and to be subject to me as thy head, according to the order of God? Here, now, examine thyself well, whether thou feelest an honest desire for entering with me into such a holy state, wherein we may again find our image of God, lost by sin, and come to our blessed origin, into (to) the co-eternity and consubstantiality of God. Is this thy heart's will and opinion to a firm resolution? Give me at last thy clear and plain consent, by the grace of God, and give me thereto and our brothers and sisters thy right hand, with a kiss of love."

A document of the marriage which Reckeffuss sanctioned by his name, written by his own hand, was then also drawn, and both parties then thought their marriage to be performed in the sight of God and men, further things being not required. From that time they lived like married people, and that on the farm of Cordes at Valldorf, in the possession of the bride.

The administration of justice summoned Reckeffuss and his pretended lawful wife, and now here heard from the mouths of the couple that the things were as mentioned—they had married without proclamation and marriage ceremony, and now lived with each other like married Christian people since that time. At the same time Reckeffuss (then) also declared openly that he considered the marriage by a minister of the Established Church to be superfluous, because nothing was commanded of it in the Bible. He rather considered marriage of that kind, by unconverted pastors, to be even most sinful, on account of receiving the sign of the beast, either on the forehead and on hand, described in the revelations of St. John by the thereby occurring ceremonies, and especially by the exchanging of the rings, against which God may (guard) him in all grades, and not anything was there to do with him. He would not meddle with a supplementary marriage afterwards by any means, in spite of all the remonstrances made to him; also on account of the civil losses which his children would have received. He absolutely continued in his notions, adding that he and his children would sooner suffer all than injure his conscience and bear on him self the sign of the beast. All the stubbornness, or, we may better say, faithfulness of conviction, of the Westphalian natural disposition, came here to light in Reckeffuss. The Administration of Justice of Vlotho took the wedding address of Reckeffuss, which he handed over, that government and consistency might see that everything took place in a good and Christian-like order, and sent them, for further directions, to the Government of Minden, which then applied, going on to the ecclesiastical department in Berlin, in order to obtain instructions from there.

The ecclesiastical department, that is, the Minister of the State, Von Wellner, now replied that co-habitations of that kind were not allowed anywhere, and therefore Reckeffuss and Cordes were to separate by legal means in case of need.

The Government of Minden, indeed, once more ordered the Administration of Justice of Vlotho to propose to the man lawfully married according to his persuasion, to have his marriage performed by the forms of law, in failure of which his co-habitation with the woman Cordes could not be tolerated. He rather was to be proposed, upon pain of imprisonment, to keep away at a distance from her for the first, but entirely in vain. Reckeffuss insisted on it that his marriage was lawful in the sight of God, and therefore not any sin, but that he could not submit to a marriage ceremony by the pastor in ordinary for the sake of conscience, and just as little he acknowledged the proper authorities this privilege of separating him from his wife. His marriage was in-dissoluble, according to the law of God, and "we must hearken unto God more than unto men." Even punishment by imprisonment, which it had now commenced to impose on Reckeffuss on that account, did not prevail, as the Administration of Justice of Vlotho reported on the fifth of October upon him, and, although the Government now ordered to direct once more the man that, if he would come again to the woman Cordes, a punishment by imprisonment of four weeks, with water and bread, would be imposed on him. The Administration of Justice informed, by proclamation, on the twenty second of January, 1791, that Reckeffuss, however, persevered in his stubbornness, and the pain of imprisonment did not produce any effect. He had declared that he would rather suffer all than have given himself the sign of the beast, and the separation from his wife was, therefore, impossible, because they had been long ago married by God himself, but on the contrary, as to the obedience of the orders of his Majesty, not any king had a right to command him anything in matters of conscience, and he had to submit to all that would be done with him, and the bailiff S'rave, of Vlotho, therefore, openly acknowledged that he did not know what he should further do with that enthusiast, who was very much afraid of the beast in the Revelation of St. John, and firmly resolved rather to become a martyr than to expose himself to the sign of it by the marriage. "I pre-suppose," Bailiff S'rave writes, on the twenty-second of January, 1791, "that this stubborn enthusiast, who firmly believes that he suffers for the Truth's sake and has become a martyr, will not be brought to obedience by corrections of that kind, but will rather be crucified than married in a friendly manner."

It, therefore, was considered best to apply for and obtain directions in this matter of his Majesty, that is, of Woellner, and these, under the date of twenty-first of February, 1791, were, indeed, again of a strict enough meaning. The co-habitation between Reckefuss and the woman Cordes is not to be allowed by any means, but a punishment by imprisonment of eight to fourteen days, with water and bread, is to be imposed on the former as often as he is found with her, and then he is to be brought back to his (home) place of legal residence of Exter at his expense. But that these means, now made use of several times, were effectual, now at last the Government could not at all positively mention. On the contrary (in the year of 1796) it says, in an account of the thirtieth of March of the same year, that Reckefuss suffered already punishment by imprisonment more than a few weeks, according to the rescript of his Royal Majesty, of twenty-first of February, 1791, but without any effect. In spite of all these already used practical coercive measures, these people (they had increased in the meantime), would not be married by any means with their wives. Without any doubt, Woellner had thought if he ordered continued punishment by imprisonment in every case of disobedience, that this stubborn man should be made tired and humble by this punishment. But he who became tired was not Reckefuss, who, of unbroken courage, rather went to jail as often as he was met, with his wife, at Wehrdorf, in order to be brought from thence to Exter to his mother, but also to return immediately again to the farm of Cordes, but the Administration of Justice of Vlotho and the Government of Minden seem to have become tired. It had, indeed, been politic(al) even not to give the population the view of this continued and unbroken disobedience against the magistrate, not further to regard this case with attention, if it had remained a single one, and if there had not been added other circumstances, which, however, made appear this matter to be extremely important on account of its disadvantageous consequences to the Government of Minden, and moved it to take up again the matter, delayed for some time, in the beginning of the year of 1796, not only that the brother of the hitherto mentioned Derrick Reckefuss,* the peasant, Christian Reckefuss, in the parish of Bergen, also likewise lived in an irregular matrimony, according to the State's and Church's idea, and refused to submit to the regular marriage ceremony. He and the tailor, Koenig (King), living on the farm belonging to Reckefuss, had not also christened their children, and did not only refuse to have them entered into the parochial register, but also to send them to public school, yea, which seemed to have been hazardous to the proper authorities. They refused to bear the usual burdens of conveyances required in war and other neighbors' burdens, and there was no hope that their sons might be drawn with effect to the enrolment, because they would rather escape, leaving behind all their property, according to their enthusiastic principles, than take upon themselves the duty of serving the Fatherland. Therefore, for the prevention of public scandal which such conduct might cause among the neighbors, the Government of Minden then considered it necessary to take up again the matter, and so much the more because the pastor, Mumperow, on the hill before Herford, in whose parish the farmer Reckefuss lived, had also preferred complaint against the Quaker and informed that they would not sub-

THE LITTLE HARVESTER

"I help to gather in the wheat,"
The reaper's daughter said,
With dimpled smile and accent sweet,
And toss of golden head.

The child was young and very fair,
Her cheeks were all aglow;
Her eyes like purple posies were,
Her teeth a shining row.

"You help to gather in the grain?"
You are too young, my child!
You could not fill the creaking wain,
Why speak a thing so wild?"

"I am a harvester, I say,
And papa says so, too;
I bear his dinner every day
To yonder shabby yew.

"And though I cannot cut the blade,
Nor fill the creaking wain,
I do my part," she gently said,
"Toward gathering in the grain."

To do her part, what more could she?
Could you or I do more?
The less on soil abides with me,
I can it o'er and o'er.

Oh, rich would be the golden yield,
If each would do his part
Upon the world's great harvest field,
With brave and earnest heart.

FOR "THE FRIEND." ILLUMINATION.

Do you know why some little, common thing,
Some tender words low-spoken long ago,
Some fragrant blossom of a vanished spring,
Has power to thrill the heart-strings, strangely, so?
Some text faint as the morning's dawn,
Some homely verse or half-forgetten word
Seems from the dim and distant spaces drawn,
And one knows truly that a soul has heard!

Can you explain it, or can you and I
Lay our burned hearts together, listening,
And wait for some still answer to our cry
Until the stars of morning in their courses sing?
Lowly and humbly in some intervals of calm,
In the still patience all our souls possessed,
Comes the sweet answer and the healing balm,
And in the stillness cometh peace and rest.

After midnight darkness cometh morning's light,
Out of blackest storm cloud comes refreshing rain!
And so, from all our crosses, crowns may be more bright,

And so, from all our losses cometh, somewhere, gain.
God knoweth just the day and time,
Just the way and place and all the need
Of any longing soul, the steps we climb,
And all the pleasant pastures where the weary feed.

His are the cattle on the undulating hills.
Is any child forsaken, or righteous begging bread?
His are the waters singing down the rills,
Is any soul athirst? Behold the Fountain-head!
His grace within the heart with saving power
Is all sufficient for the seeming good or ill;
Be still, oh, thinking heart, in every trial hour,
Just trust Him and be still! G. G. M.

MAKING OUR CHOICE.—It is easy to make a choice between two things when one of them is obviously a great deal more attractive than the other. It is not so easy when the difference is less apparent. Even a child will choose gladly to leave his play when his mother asks him to go with her to see a sight he has been longing to see. A treasure-seeker has no unwillingness to pass by bits of lead ore when he knows that gold is in abundance a little farther on. A lesser pleasure has no temptation to one who is offered greater pleasures, and sees them just ahead. So all the way along in life's path,

We choose what we like best, all things considered. Our preferences decide the choice, which of course, carries with it its inevitable consequences. God or self is taken, because we prefer the one or the other. In making this choice we accept all that it involves. Hence no man will be finally lost, unless he prefers hell to heaven. He goes to the place of his own choice.—Sunday School Times.

About Portland and the Merrimac's Side.

The passenger trains of the Boston and Maine railway stop at Portsmouth, New Hampshire as announced, "ten minutes for refreshments." Being on such a train early in the present month, and strolling a square or two from the station, I observed by the signs on the fronts of a half a dozen properties, that "wine, beer and other refreshments" were brought prominently to the notice of all who might have any yearning therefor. We were about to cross the Piscataqua into the prohibition State of Maine, and here was the thirsty traveler's chance for a parting drink of liquor. Arriving at Portland, I had occasion to pass along several miles of its streets, and failed to see anywhere the liquor seller's legend that was so conspicuous before coming across the State boundary river. I met later (out of the city) at table a Portlander whom I did not take to be a teetotaler, and said I would like to make a little statement and ask of him a question. In my native city of Philadelphia and its suburb of Germantown where I had resided quite a number of years, I had noted that at stated times, particularly on the morning after the day of rest, great wagons drawn by powerful horses would be seen passing through the streets, and, stopping at the street corners or otherwheres where were licensed liquor saloons, would load up the piles of empty kegs and barrels that had been rolled on upon the sidewalk. Had he ever witnessed a spectacle of that kind in Portland? No, he had not, though he had noticed some collecting of bottles. He did not know of a sign any where in Portland that directly advertised strong drink.

Having had a little correspondence with Neal Dow several years ago, and my wife, who was with me, being desirous of saying somewhat to the veteran "father of the Maine law," we found him in the library of his wide-fronted, old-time mansion on Congress Street. I said to him that a policeman had volunteered to me the information that Portland had more than sixty apothecary shops, and of course we knew what that meant, and that it was an unnecessary quantity for a city of forty thousand inhabitants. Neal Dow replied that forty pharmacies, or one to one thousand of the population, ought to suffice for all proper needs, but agreed with me that it was a matter for satisfaction that, wherever one would about the city, the public advertising of intoxicating drinks was nowhere to be met with. If one were bent on finding out where such beverages were to be had, his quest would probably be rewarded, as it might also be if he went after hidden resorts that shunned the daylight. The Captain of the steamboat plying between Portland and Orr's Island, and in which we took passage to the summer cottage of a friend on Harpswell Neck, said, in reply to my query, that the men who worked on the wharves could (as might be expected) easily find places where strong drink was dispensed.

Neal Dow having revived an incident or two in connection with the passage of the law with which his name is particularly associated, and concerning an early attempt that was made to bring about its nullification, my wife had then the opportunity to remind him of a circumstance (though our host of ninety-two years did not recall it) which happened in war time, when he was confined in Libby prison.

My wife's father, John Bacon Crenshaw, living a little outside of Richmond, often having occasion to see the authorities and to otherwise interest himself in behalf of the imprisoned, whether Union or Confederate, had called one day at the Libby, and presented testaments to some that were incarcerated there, Neal Dow among the rest. Friend Crenshaw was a believer in peace and was opposed to the holding of slaves, and so had been his father before him, manumitting a considerable number that he had inherited, and securing the freedom of many others that were illegally held in bondage. Neal Dow, too, was Quaker-born, was a strong Abolitionist, but was obviously not pronounced in his views upon the general practicability of peace. When his benevolent visitor called again some weeks later, the man who had been twice Mayor of Portland produced the copy of the testament which had been handed him, while he remarked: "Friend Crenshaw, it very much surprises me that a Quaker, and a man who preaches peace, should hand around a publication like that." Wondering at the meaning of this speech, Friend C. took the extended testament, and to his own surprise as well as exceeding mortification, saw that there had been inserted in the back part of it a leaflet which called upon its readers to remember their duty, to go into battle and fight for their country!

We step into a trolley car that passes by the door, while the historic figure, a little under medium size and slightly bent, with white locks about a cheery face, waves us a kindly farewell. Several days spent at North Conway, in the meadows of green between the imposing mass of Moat Mountain and symmetrical Kearsarge, and then we go down to Newburyport on the Merrimac, to be two days with friends Joseph and Gertrude Whittier Cartland, the relatives with whom the last months of Whittier's life were spent. Riding to the meeting at Amesbury (four and a half miles), we pass the home of the late James Parson, biographer of Greeley, Franklin and other eminent Americans, crossing the Merrimac by the chain bridge, whence we look down the last reach of the stream toward Salisbury's sands.

"The beaches glimmering in the sun,
And the low-winded capes that run
Into the sea-mist north and south;
The sand-bluffs at the river's mouth;
The swinging chain bridge, and afar,
The foam-line of the harbor."

Here upon Deer Island (which is practically part of the bridge) with its native pine trees and wealth of shrubbery, herbage and clambering vines, lives Harriet Prescott Spofford. A friend of our entertainers and of Whittier, we made a brief call upon her a little later. Her personality is associated with that delightful poem, "The Captain's Well," of Whittier's later verse, the poet's introduction to it saying: "The story of the shipwreck of Captain Valentine Bagley, on the coast of Arabia, and his sufferings in the desert, has been familiar from my childhood. It has been partially told in the singularly beautiful lines of my friend, Harriet Prescott Spofford, on the occasion of a public celebration at the Newburyport Library." On the right hand side of the road, going into Ames-bury, we passed the well itself. It is just within the paling of a good-sized grassy lot, and but a step or two from the porch of the house to which it belongs. It is uncovered and unadorned; better so than to be grandly marked by memorial blocks of polished granite, and yet (presuming that the water supply has not failed) there would be a fitness in making it accessible to the wayfarer, honoring thereby the intimation contained in the last lines of the poem:

"And when a wayfarer, weary and hot,
Kept to the mid-road, pausing not
For the well's refreshing, he shook his head;
If he don't know the value of water," he said;
'Had he prayed for a drop, as I have done,
In the desert circle of sand and sun,
He would drink and rest, and go home to tell
That God's best gift is the wayside well!"

On the same side of the way was passed the Old Ladies' Home, to which Whittier left a large bequest. The house in Amesbury, where Whittier wrote "Snow Bound" and many others of his poems is only a short distance from the meeting-house. Returning from attendance at the latter, we stopped at the burying ground. The family lot, surrounded by a hedge of low arbor-vitae, was nearly as we had seen it ten years before, with the addition of the plain marble slab showing where the poet had been laid, and giving simply the name and year of birth and of death, and, on the back, Holmes' line, "Here lies Whittier."

It may be appropriate to correct here a misstatement appearing in the Local News not long ago, and also, I think, in the Public Ledger, that the writing even of excellent poetry had not much to show for it, as illustrated in the case of Whittier, whose estate had not realized more than the sum of five thousand dollars. Twice that amount having gone to the Old Ladies' Home, already referred to, I have no doubt that the other legatees received their due portions.

Not caring to indulge in what might seem like sight-seeing on the first day of the week, we deferred our visit to the old Whittier homestead until the following day. Whittier sold the place, which is of forty acres, five miles beyond Amesbury and three from Haverhill, before the works of his pen had brought him any money return. After "Snow Bound" was published in 1866, he was desirous of buying back the possession that had been that of his forefathers of several generations, but the new owner had placed such an extravagant price upon it that Whittier declined to pay it. Since his death, however, the place has been secured by an association, and a further fund is being slowly raised, the interest of which is to maintain the property in good condition. The house, barn and outbuildings have been put in good repair. The large living room, with iron pot, kettle, etc., hanging in the ample fire place, also two other rooms on the first floor are open to the inspection of visitors. Some Lombardy poplars which had stood in front of the house, having disappeared, their places have been supplied by new ones. The farmer's boy obtained for us a few red-streaked apples from the thrifty orchard. One of them, upon my library table where I write, while extending a little the fragrant memory of our visit, brings brightly to view the winter evening's ingleside picture in "Snow Bound."

"And for the winter fireside meet,
Between the andirons' straddling feet,
The mug of cider simmered slow,

The apples sputtered in a row,
And, close at hand, the basket stood,
With outs from brown October's wood."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Rivers after Dry Seasons.—For many months the beds of the rivers are dry, and the sand and shingle are exposed to the heat of the fierce sun; when the first deluge of water comes down and flows over this hot bed it naturally becomes warm. I have often seen the water coming down after a dry season, and it is a very curious sight; quite a wave of water seems to come along, and it is quickly absorbed by the hot sand, and a cloud of steam arises into the air. Anyone who has not seen a river commencing business after a long drought would find this hard to believe; but they must bear in mind the fact that, where this is observable, the sun is shining brightly, and the rays are probably more powerful than at any other period of the season. The water that is coming down has been produced by heavy local storms, perhaps many miles distant. The amount of water that must be absorbed in the hot sandy beds of the rivers before they commence to flow must be enormous. Long after the rivers cease running one can generally find water by digging a few feet deep in the sandy bed.—Bicknell's Queenland.

The Wingless Bird of New Zealand.—E. Harrow, an Englishman, who has lived in New Zealand for the last fourteen years, arrived on the Mariposa with a fine specimen of the apteryx, or kiwi, the wingless night bird found only in New Zealand.

The strange looking creature is about the size of a domestic fowl, and is covered with what is apparently a hairy coat of mottled brown. This apteryx probably has the honor of being the first one of its kind that has ever breathed the air of America, though live kiwis have been obtained for botanical and zoological gardens in Europe. If there was ever any foundation in fact for the notorious filly-egg bird, the kiwi must have furnished the suggestion.

It is most active at night, and then it goes about rapidly thrusting its long, slender bill into the earth in search of worms, on which it feeds. While thus hunting it keeps up a continuous audible sniffing, its nostrils being situated very near the end of the upper mandible. The kiwi, for by this name it is best known in New Zealand, is sluggish in the daytime, and seems to have great difficulty in seeing. At night it often catches the large, luminous fire-worms, crushes them against the ground, and swallows them. During the operation the phosphorescent particles adhere to the beak, and the hermitlike bird can be seen in the darkness continuing its search for food. A remarkable thing about the kiwi, in addition to the absence of wings and regular feathers, is the great size of the egg it lays. The kiwi egg weighs over twelve ounces, or a quarter of the bulk of the bird itself.

This kiwi, E. Harrow had long ago accustomed to a meat diet, and that is the reason he has got it here alive. He hoped to dispose of it for twenty-five dollars to the park commissioners, but was told they would willingly accept it for nothing.—The San Francisco Call.

—The ways of the heathen cow are "peculiar." She seems incapable of complete domestication, retaining many of her wild habits. She yields milk only while rearing her young. If her offspring be taken from her, the milk-flow ceases. The attempt to milk her in the absence of her calf involves almost as much danger as will the endeavor to milk a giraffe, with its famel hoof power. One morning the guala (cowherd) informed that one of the calves had died in the night, and that the mother refused to allow herself to be milked. He explained elaborately that if the calf's skin should be stuffed and set up before the cow at milking time, she would continue to give milk and would allow the milk to be taken. He insinuatingly suggested that I should give him certain rupees for the purchase of materials he would stuff the skin. This story seemed to me not only improbable, but very. In America I had milked more than one kicking cow. Calmly not to say loftily, requesting the guala to bring his pail, I marched down to the cow house, inwardly resolved to see the reason why that cow should not be milked—meaning to show him that what an Indian could not do an American could.

Outside the cowshed, under the trees, the zebras were tethered in a row. They paid no attention to the half-naked, brown guala; but at my approach each, with wild eyes and up-lifted head, snorting and trembling, seemed, but for the restraining tether rope, about to bound away into her native jungle. The guala called a second man to his aid. With a new rope they lassoed the bereaveful's hinder legs, holding them in a slipnoose. One man held the end of the rope while the other with the pail cautiously approached the zebu. In a twinkling the pail was a rod away, the man with the rope was pulling as for his life, the man with the pail was with it still, I was gasping to regain my breath, while that zebu was kicking as nothing unpossessed could kick. She appeared utterly indifferent as to whether there were ground under her, as all four feet seemed continuously in the air.

Thankful that my valorous resolutions had been mental, later I meekly gave the guala exactly one-third the amount he had requested, and directed him to stuff the calf's skin. This having been accomplished, I was again summoned to the scene of action. Though no abnormal development of either quills or ears was discernible, there stood that remarkable cow contentedly licking and fondling her offspring, occasionally lurching scantly upon the hay stuffing which protruded through the rudely sewed seams of her progeny's hide, while the native merrily milked away, sitting as is customary, on the wrong side.—Effie Hallock Brad-dock in The Independent.

SUSTAINED IN DEATH.—To one who observed Archbishop Whately's sufferings and asked him if he suffered much pain, during his last hours on earth, he said, "Some time ago I should have thought it great pain, but now I am enabled to bear it." His intellect was unclouded by illness. He could think and speak. Some one said to him, "You are dying, as you have lived, great to the last." The reply was, "I am dying, as I have lived, in the faith of Jesus." Another said, "What a blessing your glorious intellect is unimpaired." He answered, "Do not call intellect glorious. There is nothing glorious out of Christ." Another said, "The great fortitude of your character supports you." "No, it is not the fortitude of my character which supports me, but my faith in Christ." With such a witness on his lips and in his acts, Archbishop Whately passed away.—Christian Herald.

Converts from Hinduism.

Some years ago I was out on a Gospel preaching tour in the Telugu country, in regions away from any of our Christian congregations. I had my travelling dispensary with me. There came to my tent one day an educated Hindu gentleman, high in office, in caste and in social position. He had previously sent, asking if I would see him privately, in my tent and prescribe for him for a physical ailment. I found that that was a simple matter, dispatched with a few words. He had merely used that as a cover to secure a conversation with me privately, Nicodemus-like, on religious matters. He, himself, introduced the subject. We talked for some time on the character and the claims of Jesus of Nazareth to be the Saviour of the world. At length, in a very earnest, feeling manner he spoke substantially as follows: "Sir, I am not a Christian, I am still regarded as a devout Hindu, but in my heart I dare not deny the claims of the Bible. I see the power of Jesus Christ in the lives of his followers so distinctly, that I cannot deny his divinity. He must be Divine, or He could not work such a change as I see in the lives of those who become his disciples. He is not yet my Saviour. Caste, wealth, position, family, all hold me back; but even now I never allow Him to be spoken against in my presence. I have long been reading the Bible in secret. The more I read of Christ and ponder over his life and teachings, and the power to conquer sin that comes from embracing his religion, the more do I feel that in the end I shall have to accept Him, at any cost, as my personal Saviour."

As compared with this in what a night of darkness does Hinduism leave even its most earnest devotees.

Never shall I forget an interview that I had over thirty years ago, with a venerable Brahmin pilgrim, an earnest seeker after relief from the burden of sin.

It was in February, 1861, that two of us missionaries were out on a preaching tour in a part of the Telugu country lying on the edge of the Mysore Kingdom, a region in which the Gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ had so far never yet been proclaimed.

Our tent was pitched under the spreading banyan tree. We had been there for several days, and had preached in all the villages and hamlets within three miles of our camp. That morning we had left our tent before sunrise, and gone out several miles to preach in a cluster of villages nestled in among the hills. In each village, after the oral proclamation, we had offered gospels and tracts in their own tongue to the people who had listened; but only a few would receive them, so suspicious were they at that time of everything new.

We returned to our tent weary with our morning work. The burden of our thoughts was, "Lord, who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?"

As we came near we saw a venerable, gray-haired Brahmin engaged in his devotions on a large stone platform around the central trunk of an adjacent banyan tree, where there was a small shrine. Slowly, with beads in hand, he performed his circumambulations, keeping his face toward the shrine, reciting his mantras, his prayers, his petitions. Each time that he came in front of the shrine he fell prostrate upon the ground, performing the Sashthangam of the Hindus, and then, sliding one bead on his rosary, he would slowly and reverently go around the tree again.

Much struck by his reverent demeanor and evident earnestness, we watched him through the corded meshes of our tent window; and when he had finished his devotions, and had sat down to rest, we went out and, courteously addressing him, asked him what he sought by these prayers and circumambulations.

"Oh, sirs," said he, in a tone that struck us as one of intense earnestness, "I am seeking to get rid of the burden of sin. All my life I have been seeking it; but each effort that I make is as unsuccessful as the one before, and still the burden is here. My pilgrimages and prayers and penances for sixty years have all been in vain. Alas! I know not how my desire can be accomplished."

Then, in answer to our inquiries, he gave us the story of his life. He told us how, in early life, he had been sorely troubled by the thought of his unexpiated sins; that his parents had both died when he was seventeen years of age, leaving him an only child, sole heir of their wealth; that the priests whom he consulted told him that if he would give all his property to endow a temple the burden of sin would be removed.

He gave his property, all of it. He endowed a temple; but the burden of sin was no lighter. His mind was not at peace. Obedient to further advice from the priests, his counselors, he made the pilgrimage on foot all the long way to Benares, the holy city. He spent two years in the precincts of the temples in worship. He spent two years bathing in the Holy Ganges. "But," said he, "the Ganges waters washed the foulness from my skin, not the foulness from my soul, and still the old burden was there, un eased." He told us how he had gone from thence, on foot, all the way to Raméswaram; begging his food all the two thousand miles; for he had given all his money to the temple, and thence again to Srirangam, and thence to other Holy places. He told us how he had spent his whole life in these pilgrimages, and in penances, and in desert wanderings, apart from his kind, living on roots and nuts and jungle fruits, remaining for years at a time in the forest jungles, in the vain search for relief from the burden of sin.

"And now, sirs," said he, "my life is almost gone; my hair is thin and white; my eyes are dim; my teeth are gone; my cheeks are sunken; my body is wasted; I am an old, old man; and yet, sirs, the burden of sin is just as heavy as when, a young man, I started in pursuit of deliverance. Oh, sirs, does your Vêla tell how I can get rid of this burden and be at peace? Our Vêlas have not shown me how."

"How gladly did we tell him of our gracious 'burden bearer,' and of his loving call, 'Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' How eagerly did he listen as we told him of Jesus Christ, the God-man, the Saviour of the world, and told him what He had done for our salvation. How gladly did he pore over the Gospels we gave him, and what earnest questions did he ask during the day as to points in their teachings which he did not quite understand. During that night he left and went upon his way, taking the Gospels with him, and we never again saw him.

Though so many years have intervened, his earnest, reverent countenance remains photographed on my memory, and I shall look for him up there among the redeemed; for I believe that he was in earnest in seeking deliverance from the burden of sin; in vain, indeed, as he said, through Hinduis; I trust not in vain through the Gospel of Jesus Christ.—I. Chamberlain in The Independent.

A Remarkable Scenic Region.

It will doubtless be a long time before Americans cease to find surprising and wonderful natural scenery in this great country of ours. The mountain regions of the West abound in exhibitions of beauty and grandeur. Some of them have already been discovered and have become celebrated, while many others unquestionably are yet to be found. The Great Northern Railway, youngest of our transcontinental lines, which was completed to the Pacific coast in 1893, passes directly through, or at least reaches the threshold of, several regions of remarkable scenic and scientific interest. Especially in crossing the Cascade and Rocky Ranges, the road passes close to many beautiful scenes of the aesthetic richness and instructive details of which but little is yet known.

In June, 1895, a small party of enthusiastic adventurers, of which the writer was a member, in penetrating the main range of the Rockies, north of Lake MacDonald, Mont., reached an enclosed valley or basin which exhibits exceedingly interesting scenic and geologic features. This newly discovered valley our party named Avalanche Basin. It might with propriety be called the Northern Yosemite, for in many of its features it reminds one of that famous valley.

Avalanche Basin is, approximately, the shape of an ox-bow. It is about seven miles in length, and averages a little over a mile in width. Beautifully nestled in the eastern part of the floor of the basin, near its head, is a charming little lake, only a trifle less than a mile in length by half a mile in width. During the summer season this lake is fed by a number of torrent streams of pure, cold water, fresh from the melting snow-fields, which lie a few thousand feet above the floor of the basin. The number of the streams at any given time depends upon the temperature on the mountain heights and the consequent rapidity of the melting of the snow which gathers on the summits in great abundance each winter.

The outlet of Avalanche Lake is a tumultuous, rollicking stream, which, flowing into MacDonald Creek, descends nearly five hundred feet in less than five miles, and in its course has cut some beautiful gorges and carved for itself many delightful cascades.

The buttressed walls which form the rim of Avalanche Basin rise precipitously to altitudes ranging from twenty-five hundred feet to forty-five hundred feet. So steep and smooth are the enclosing cliffs that the snow finds it difficult to cling to the slopes. Consequently, during the early part of the summer, avalanches are of frequent occurrence. Their startling crash, terrific rush and sullen roar may be heard daily, and on unusually warm days almost hourly, during the months of May and June. Later in the season, the greater part of the snow having been swept into the valley and melted, avalanches become infrequent, and finally cease. But the numerous streams, cascades and cataracts formed by the melting of the perpetual snow-fields which nestle higher upon the more level and distant heights are a source of delight to those who are so fortunate as to visit this spot in midsummer. The floor of Avalanche Basin is neither so wide nor so level as that of the Yosemite, but probably quite as much water pours through it during the summer months as is discharged through the world-famed Yosemite Valley during the same time. The streams which empty into this remarkable northern valley are more numerous than the tributaries of the Merced, and the flow of water in each stream is swifter than the currents in the Yosemite.

The more prominent peaks and ridges which immediately surround Avalanche Basin are as lofty and interesting as those which enclose the Yosemite, but most of them will long remain inaccessible to man, for it will require much hard labor to make trails which will enable tourists to reach the summits.

The shores of Avalanche Lake are closely skirted by timber, most of which is balsam fir. The shore line is almost destitute of sand and fine gravel, because the lake is so closely shut in by the surrounding mountain walls and so carefully guarded by the dense growth of forest trees that its surface is seldom, if ever, lashed into waves powerful enough to break up the rocky fragments which have tumbled from the frothing heights to the water's edge.—L. B. Sperry.

Redona Beach, California.

Starting from Pasadena early in the morning we drove four miles through beautiful vineyards and orange groves to the foot of the burro trail to Wilson's peak. Leaving our teams at the foot with a good supply of feed we were soon ascending the trail, the women on burros and the men walking.

A few minutes travel brought us to a place where the trail is cut in the face of an almost perpendicular cliff where my wife's sister spurring the use of the burro on such dizzy heights dismounted and walked the remainder of the way up and back, a distance of twenty miles. It was cloudy and drizzling when we started, and we were soon up in the clouds. The mist wet our clothing through and dripped from our hat rims.

In about two hours we passed what is called the half-way house, a small house in a beautiful shady camping ground on the north side of the mountain. Strange plants, ferns and menziesia wood abound, making it a fine field for the botanist or collector.

The Mt. Wilson trail is safe and well made and the grade is easy, making a trip above the clouds by this route a pure delight, unalloyed by the excessive fatigue of the usual mountain climb, yet for miles at a stretch the trail is cut in the face of the most precipitous places on the mountain side. In some places four or five parts of the trail that has just been passed may be seen below, rounding turn after turn till the senses are giddy and reel at the novel and inspiring spectacle below us, while great cliffs and crags of granite tower above our heads in the most menacing attitudes.

We reached the summit just at twelve o'clock, and a grander view never met our eyes, two thousand feet below a sheet of clouds of snowy whiteness surrounded us as the water surrounds an island in the sea, while above the sun shone with that peculiar tint and brightness unknown in lower altitudes. Our horizon was the meeting of a silvery sea with the blue expanse above, broken in a few places by mountain peaks which reared their bald heads above the rolling clouds while their bases are bathed for thousands of feet in the rain mist below. Not a spot could be seen of the hills, valley or ocean, for the clouds were as impenetrable to the eye as the earth itself, and a thrill of surprise came over us all when we heard the whistle of an engine coming ringing up the side of the mountain and we realized that our friends below were actually living in that apparent sea. About one o'clock the sea breeze came in and began to dispel the clouds. Immense white columns would roll up to a great height and topple over on the mass below. The turmoil kept on increasing till the whole cloud was so broken up that we could see the greater portion of the valley through it, seven thousand feet below us.

A rustic pavilion made of logs and surrounded by huge pine timber adorns the summit and provides a place of amusement for the crowds that repair to this mountain retreat in the summer months to avoid the excessive heat in the valley.

We ate our dinner in the shade of pines at a lovely spot in a canon on the north side of the peak, a beautiful stream of pure cold water came sparkling from the granite walls of the canon and rippled and tossed over the rocky bottom. The little stream was bordered with such a dense growth of ferns that for a long distance we could not reach the edge of the water.

We returned in about two hours, less time than it took to go up, reaching the foot of the trail none too soon as it was getting dark and some of the most dangerous places on the trail are near the foot of it.

WHERE can we find a name so holy that we may surrender our whole souls to it, before which obedience, reverence without measure, intense humility, most unreserved adoration, may all be duly rendered? One name there is, and one alone; one alone in heaven and earth—not truth, not justice, not benevolence, not Christ's mother, not his holiest servants, not his blessed sacraments, nor his very mystical body, the Church, but himself only who died for us, and rose again, Jesus Christ, both God and man.—Dr. Arnold.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—From official Treasury figures the receipts of the Government during Eighth Month, in round numbers, were $25,500,000, and the expenditures $26,000,000, making the deficit for the month $500,000. For the fiscal year the receipts have been $74,501,000, and the expenditures $78,001,000, making the deficit for the year to date $23,498,000.

The Treasury gold reserve at the close of business on the 31st ult., had increased to $104,526,653, the result of the deposit of recently imported foreign gold.

As far as Treasury advice goes, the total of gold ordered abroad for export to the United States aggregates $138,504,000, all of which is expected to find its way into the Treasury.

The Weather Bureau of the Department of Agriculture is sending from Washington to all the hospitals of the large cities for a tabulated statement of heat cases, prostrations and deaths. An inquiry is also made as to the extent of the alcohol habit among the patients of this kind.

Over 40,000,000 franked envelopes have been ordered to the present time for political uses in this campaign.

Less than one-seventh of the silver coined is in actual circulation.

Cal. game Anderson, Superintendent of the Yellowstone National Park, in his annual report recommends an annual appropriation of $100,000 until the road system of the park is completed.

A report of the Tuskegee (Ala.) Institute for Colored Boys and Girls, just issued, says: "A boy in the cotton field earns 10 cents a day. He graduates from the school and earns at his trade, or as a school teacher, $1.50 a day, a gain of $1.10 a day, or for a year,

[Some words have local meanings, and it may be proper in explanation of the word "wicked," as used by our dear friend, D. B. Webb, to say that in New England, where she came from, it not only used to express the committing of innumerable crimes, but, as defined by Webster, in small edition, it is also used for "Evil, sinful, evading from the Divine law. A word of light blame." The compilers of the extracts have thought best to use her own words.]

1854. Third Month 5th.—Dear — at our meeting and spoke. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, the Lord knoweth them that are his," encouraging us to believe that he Almighty's watchful eye is over all his workmanship, that in all our afflictions he is afflicted and will satisfy those whose expectation is from Him. He had been impressed with the history of Joseph, how he was separated from father, mother, brothers and sisters, and was alone; yet his Heavenly Father was with him and brought him through difficulties with honor, to his own gain, and caused him to be a blessing to them.

20th.—Dear — here at our meeting, he quoted, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest," and "ake my yoke upon you and learn of me for I am meek and lowly in heart and ye shall find rest unto your souls." Am not I one who longs for an assurance that my sins are blotted out, and for the more full enjoyment of his sweet presence in my heart? Have I not been like Zaccheus of old, climbing up high to see, or letting my imagination soar on high to find Him? Instead of seeking inward and waiting there to find his good presence? I have often felt that my heart is too poor, too base and sinful to think of his entering thus, but He assures us that He ate with publicans and sinners. He looked on Zaccheus' heart and said, "this day has salvation come to thy house."

Do I not feel some of his good presence and how thankful I am, that He enables me in some degree to obey. I know my sins are great, very great, oh! most merciful Saviour be pleased to forgive me, though I feel so unworthy of any pity for my long resistance. — said if we were humble enough He would give us of his good Spirit to comfort us at times here, and at last would lead us safely through the valley of death to the glorious regions above.

Fourth Month 2nd.—What a favored meeting. Dear H. Gibbons spoke first, "Except ye abide in the vine," etc., encouraging us to look to the Saviour and to bow low before Him, to walk in the strait and narrow path, to cease from our own strength, and watch and pray to be found faithful.

"Renounce all strength, but strength Divine, And peace shall be forever thine."

Then — spoke first of faith and addressed the audience so well, and then so kindly reasoning with them of another state of existence, mentioning Lazarus and the rich man; going through the whole account. Spoke of the other world, and of the state of punishment; that if we were not of those who were abiding and living with our Saviour, we must be of the other class, there were but two alternatives, to be with Him, or in the bottomless pit. Towards the last addressed the young, saying, let none be presuming that because some are visited and revisited all their lives long, that it will be the case with all. The day of visitation may go by, we may become as the heath in the desert, not knowing when good comes; "where much is given, much will be required."

We have had line upon line and precept upon precept, some have been designed to be polished shafts in his quiver, and to be messengers unto others. These would have baptism and they would love to be alone and pour out their souls in prayer, "sitting alone and keeping silence, if so be there may be hope." "When their tongue cleaveth to the roof of their mouth for thirst of God, He would open to them streams in high places and fountains in the midst of the valleys." Oh! it was a humbling time to me.

On Fourth-day was Monthly Meeting at Birmingham. Dear Phebe W. Roberts was there. Dear P. spoke so encouragingly, "Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." "Fear not, be not dismayed," etc., then speaking to the young, encouraging them to choose who they would serve — endeavor to be dedicated to be willing even to become fools for his sake. Oh! I thought I never would disobey again, but now, I feel that I did fret that evening; I hope to be forgiven. Then dear — spoke, "Some men labor and lay up substance of this world's goods, not taking care for the future life." The Lord's poor never know what may be their lot; to-day they may be exalted and honored and the next have to sit like supplicants at the gate, like Mordecai, one day honored the next low, but how greatly to be preferred is the latter state; closing with "How awful must the summons be oh death, to him who is at ease in his possessions."

Dear Phebe stood with us that night, it is so pleasant to me to see the Lord's servants. When I left her in the morning for school she encouraged me to hope that my labors would be of use to the children—but poor me, I feel if I could only wholly obey I should be enabled to do my whole duty in school. Oh! my merciful Saviour, be pleased to enable me to do what and all that I feel is right. Be pleased to grant me strength; Thou art ever worthy to be served.

9th.—Surely the Lord is very good; how much comfort and satisfaction He makes me feel, who have been such a hesitating and halting one against his commands. Oh! that I may obey in meekness and nothingness of self. How has way been made for me at this time to go to Parkerville and there to see A-seneth Hall.* I sincerely hope she may be led along the slippery path safely and be enabled to put her trust in Him, who certainly helped me who am so unworthy.

Last Fifth-day — was at this meeting again, to our mutual satisfaction and comfort. Dear H. Gibbons spoke first so comforting, so encouraging to the younger members. Will He be strength in weakness to me? Will He not quench the smoking flax? Is his grace sufficient for poor me? Oh! that I might be girt with holy armor to stand against my cruel enemy. Oh! send out thy light and thy truth, let them lead me, let them bring me unto thy Holy Hill and to thy tabernacle. Then dear — spoke so well to the young, unfolding the reason and utility of being plain and using the plain language, "Stand ye in the ways and see and ask for the old paths, where is the good way and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls."

23rd.—Just returned from attending Yearly Meeting. Oh! it has been a strengthening time to me.

First-day morning, went to North Meeting. W. Kennard from the West spoke so solemnly. Oh! I felt that I was one, wandering in the barren mountains of Gilboa, where there "was neither rain nor dew," and I felt bowed down and willing to be as clay in the hands of the Potter, desiring to come unto One, who will receive those who are weary and heavy laden, and who is so merciful and long suffering.

I did try to come to Him and in the afternoon meeting I did pray that I might so walk as not to be left without heavenly "rain or dew." Shortly after W. Kennard knelt in supplication for mercy to be shown—"Be pleased to forgive our iniquities, and blot out all our transgressions." Oh! I feel so thankful and could adopt part of it myself. May I be faithful, seeing my Heavenly Father makes a way for me, where there seems to be no way at all; wherein I am resigned. He makes the hills and mountains of opposition skip like lambs and rams. I was thankful for this day.

Second-day, commenced Yearly Meeting. Representatives were called, epistles read, some so very good; committee on treasurer appointed. One spoke, then dear A. W. said it was a fearful thing to say, "Albeit the Lord said it, when He hath not said it." The whole of the meetings have been so good to me. I think it was such a privilege to attend them.

* Teacher at Parkerville.

On Fifth-day morning attended North Meeting, where W. K. B. Hoyle and — spoke, to our strengthening and encouragement; also a young man spoke, and P. W. Roberts appeared in supplication. Oh! it was so good, his mercy is so great, his arm is not shortened that it cannot save, nor his ear grown heavy that He cannot hear. After all the good advice we had in the Yearly Meeting, I hope to be obedient and not consult with flesh and blood. I fear so much for myself. Be pleased Heavenly Father to help me. The testimony concerning Hinchman Haines was read, showing how the Lord whom he trusted, and whom he tried to serve had supported and preserved him all his life through.

Fifth Month 7th.—One week ago was sad indeed to us. Dear Anne is so stripped, dear friend Jeffers was taken from us at half-past twelve on Fourth Month 30th. I had just returned from meeting and assisted Anne to do some things for her, when she went into a sweet sleep and never awoke in this world again. Dear woman, I believe she has entered that Heavenly City where there is "no need of the light of the sun, nor of the moon, for the Lord God and the Lamb are the light thereof." Oh! I mean to try to obey my Heavenly Father in everything, then it seems He will, in his great mercy, let me go there too.

Last First-day dear Benjamin Hoyle was at our meeting. He commenced with When the Son of man cometh shall He find faith on the earth? Spoke much about faith. "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself." "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of all them that diligently seek Him." "Without faith it is impossible to please Him." "He knoweth our frame, He remembereth we are dust." It seems to me I am too young to think about faith, as possessing it myself. He said, if we had it, we should be enabled to say, "I leadeth me beside the still waters," etc., and though "I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil." I felt unworthy of hearing this comforting language.

He appeared in supplication to the Father of mercies, that He would enable us to walk free from sin and transgression. Oh! this is my desire and prayer. In the evening he came round here, and after a pause spoke to the dear children, whose parent had just been taken from them, that it was his intention to draw them nearer to himself. After a little, said again, that it was not the design of the Great Head of the Church to rob it of its ornaments, but that He was willing to pour out of his Spirit and raise up others. I did not speak to him, but was thankful to be in the room.

On Third-day the funeral took place; dear friend she was a tender succorer of me. I miss her very much and it is my earnest desire to do all I can for the comfort of dear Anne. She feels much stripped. Dear P. W. R. and Wm. Scattergood bore testimony to the worth of the departed, of her faith and zeal. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

On Fourth-day morning dear P. W. R. had a sweet little communication of encouragement. "The Master calleth thee," desiring to impress upon our minds the importance of obedience to the heavenly call. Oh! I try to exercise faith, it seems to me I feel his presence when I try.

I HAVE no doubt that shrinking from required duty, leading into darkness as it does, is often, very often, the beginning of a course which eventually leads down to the chambers of death.—Peleg Mitchell.

On that account the government first of all gave the civil officer Mueller, of Klausberg, the charge under the date of twenty-third of February, 1796, to gather further information on the behavior of the brothers Reckeffuss and of the hiring (tenant) Koenig and to give notice of it within eight days, but particularly to give information first once, whether the one or the other also tried to persuade several persons to embrace their enthusiasm and then and above all, whether they had tried to mislead other subjects to do the conveyances required in war. And the accounts given by Mueller according to this order are now worthy of notice in my respects. Above all he sees himself obliged to give the three defendants accused by Mumfern a testimony that might be absolutely acknowledged in regard to their morals.

In regard to the religion the farmer Christopher Reckeffuss has indeed got eccentric ideas and has fallen into a kind of enthusiasm, joining with not any Christian church, and living in a connection with a woman already these ten years without being married with her. The other reports of the pastor of Berg are also confirmed in this regard. He has not christened the two children, which he has got with that person and not till now (hitherto) sent them to any school. He and his wife also abstain from the Lord's supper, and he pretends that he does it on that account, because they are always obliged to pay (give money) for the performance of these actions every time, which is sinful according to his persuasion; the minister being obliged to work himself. And even from thence Mueller adds, it also proceeds that he refuses from time to time to give the clergyman the tithes belonging to them. On the other hand he is a very good and industrious landlord who keeps three horses for the field, and everything (all) on his farm is also in good, prosperous condition. He has especially got a good stock of cattle and he annually pays duly the royal duties and those relating to the lord of the manor, so that nothing disadvantageous may be said of him in this respect. And likewise also the tenant Reckeffuss, the husband of the woman Corders, only that he carries further his enthusiasm than his brother, because he has let grow his beard these two years, and if anybody converses with him he always speaks of the Bible, and especially (particularly) of the revelation of John. Mueller then reports still more of him, that he has put into his head some years ago that he must (should) go to Jerusalem, and that he having walked from one place to another had always had the Bible in his arm, but they have made no attempts of proselytism. They are for the most part at their residences at work and only from time to time they go on a journey, particularly the tenant Reckeffuss, and indeed sometimes to Pymont, where (also) some that have similar principles live and by whom they perhaps sometimes are visited. But in other respects they are peaceful and also have not tried to induce other subjects not to do the conveyances required in war. The farmer Reckeffuss (has) refused only at the very beginning to give his horses and carriages for the conveyances required in war, because he, as he said, waged war neither with the French nor with the King of Prussia. Nevertheless, he has given later, also given his horses, when the administration of justice of Vlotho ordered the conveyances required in war to be done by others, immediately in the first case of refusal at his expenses and had then, because he would not pay, taken away from him and sold as many goods as were sufficient to the payment.

Under these circumstances the local government again applied for advice to the general government, and at the same time forwarded a new charge—which was that the peasant Reckeffuss had lost his youngest child by death, and had publicly buried it in his garden in the presence of many Quakers who assembled on the occasion, thus declining to pay to the official pastor the church-dues to which he was entitled.

The Ecclesiastical Consistory evidently felt itself at a loss how to deal with such refractory people, who while paying their taxes and conducting as honest and peaceable subjects, were yet unbending in their opposition to whatever came in conflict with their religious convictions. Some correspondence followed with the Lord of Woellner, the prime minister, who laid the matter before the King, and obtained a decree that Reckeffuss' child should be disinterred from its father's garden and placed in the public cemetery, and that the tithes and usual fees should be paid to the clergyman, and that the three Quaker families should be separated from each other. The authorities at Minden reported that there were inseparable difficulties in the way of carrying out the separation of the Quakers.

In 1797 a royal rescript was obtained which forbid the Quakers the public and private exercise of their faith, but nothing further is said of the manner of marriage of the brothers Reckeffuss, who were no further molested on that account by the authorities.

Soon after this the Friends residing in Minden were exposed to renewed persecution owing to the magistracy prohibiting their religious meetings. This drew forth an appeal to the government in which they plead the merits of their case and ask for the granting to them of the same privileges as had been confirmed to the Mennonites and other sects. The government professed to allow religious liberty and freedom of conscience to the people, but it objected to some of its practical results. Such as the refusal to aid in the military matters, or to take oaths when required by the civil law, or to contribute to the expenses or submit to the requirements of the ecclesiastical department. The magistrates hoped that the Quakers would become weary of paying the fine of ten thalers for meeting for worship and gradually disband.

The persecuted Friends further prosecuted their case by sending a petition to the King of Prussia himself.

It commences with a grateful acknowledgment of the King's declaration in that the liberty of conscience of every one of his subjects is inviolable. It goes on to say, that this declaration given to us by thy own royal hand still seems to be misunderstood by the magistracy of Minden, because it continues in persecuting us and forbidding our Christian meetings for worshipping God, by fine of ten dollars. This vigorous manner of proceeding must be the more conspicuous to us as to all tolerantly disposed observers near and far, since it is evidently at variance with the before-mentioned solemn declaration bearing not any doubt, that the worship of the Almighty is merely a matter of conscience and of faith, which has nothing in common with civil regulations and duties, and it is impossible that it can be injurious to the state that a society of quiet, peaceful and industrious subjects are permitted to serve God and worship Him in such a manner as it thinks the most acceptable to Him, and to which it thinks to be obliged by its conscience.

We feel ourselves absolutely obliged to worship the Father in spirit and in truth, according to the teachings of our Redeemer Jesus Christ, and hold, as we believe, our Divine service with that simplicity which was customary among the apostles and first Christians, and agrees with the Holy Scriptures. If we be deprived of this liberty, our liberty of conscience will be entirely destroyed, for we cannot then serve God according to our conscience. And here, as we are convinced in our hearts, that vain faith without practice is only dead and useless, and in order to have peace with God in his mind, a man has to obey the conviction of his good Spirit and to that account a man has to hearken unto Him more than unto men in matters of faith and of conscience. We do not see before our face anything else but the certain loss of our income and fortune and the impoverishment of our families, by which we all be disabled at the same time and in the end to come to perform our duties as subjects, if we cannot make up our mind to the unprofitable choice of fleeing from the country and leaving our relatives, nor the king be pleased to give his words such a force so that the persecution be checked thereby and the liberty of conscience of his subjects be protected.

This petition was brought before the Council of State of the whole Ministry, and the final decree was that the Quakers must observe the civil order and perform the civil duties like their subjects and there the matter might rest.

The author of the narrative says, "Reckless we kept his convictions and had here and there a silent follower in the country and in the foreign country, to wit (viz.), in the country of Lippe and of Schaumburg, whom he, their patriarch, off and on visited; a figure, also still, as able to make an impression in its plain appearance and scriptural knowledge, always ready to debate. The people, although they hold a variety of absurdities, had still a certain respect for him: yea, it was, what always does not lose its impression, the wisdom (knowledge) of the word of God, which often enough spoke out of him."

WHAT is the basis of all honest commercial transactions? It is not gold or silver or Government notes or real estate; it is personal integrity. Banish that, and the business community would discover the difference as soon as you or I would detect the difference if every inch of pure air were withdrawn from our dwellings. Take conscience out of Broadway, or Wall Street, or South Street, and men of business would no sooner dare to trade there than they would dare to walk there if every foot of the pavements were mined underneath with dynamite.

What is true in commercial affairs is equally true in civil affairs. The life of our beloved country does not depend upon its statute-books, but upon the public sentiment behind the statutes. In a republic every voter is a ruler; and he only solid basis of good government is the individual conscience which seeks to know what is right and dares to do it. The ballot is infinitely more than a privilege; it is a solemn trust; and the man who uses it carelessly or corruptly or wickedly, is guilty of treason to his country.

One of the most prevalent and serious dangers is the tendency of so many people to divorce their religion from their politics. Their moral make-up seems to be divided into two separate compartments; in one they put their religion, in the other they put their citizenship. On Sunday they worship God in their church; during the week they worship a party-creed, however bad, and for personal or party aggrandizement are not ashamed to buy votes, or cheat in a caucus. Politics is not to them a matter of sacred duty; it is a game to be played at, and conscience goes under the table. To-day a man is wearing a striped jacket in Sing Sing prison who at the time of his conviction for outrageous political frauds was a prominent member of an Evangelical Church and the superintendent of a Sabbath-school!—The Independent.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Radnor Monthly Meeting.

BY GEORGE VAUX.

At the time of the separation in 1827 Radnor Monthly Meeting consisted of five particular meetings—Merion, Haverford, Radnor, the Valley, and Charlestown, near Phoenixville. It had a membership of four hundred and forty-five, but of these only seventy remained with Friends. Nearly if not quite all the latter resided within a circle of about five miles radius, taking Haverford College as the centre. Only two of our meetings survived the separation, and all the meeting-houses passed into the hands of those who separated. One of these meetings was held in a school-house a little above Hestonville, which was afterwards known as Blockley Meeting. The other has for many years been held in a modern meeting-house near Haverford College, built about 1857. The organization of the Monthly Meeting was continued until 1865, when its members were joined to Philadelphia Monthly Meeting for the Western District. Both of the particular meetings for worship were continued, but that near Hestonville was laid down some years since, the one near Haverford College alone remaining. Almost the whole of the records of this Monthly Meeting fell into the hands of the separatists, but a few years since, the Western District Monthly Meeting was afforded the opportunity of having them copied, which was done so far as they were then known to be in existence. The work was completed after several years' labor, in a number of large volumes, embracing Minutes of the Monthly Meeting, records of births, marriages and deaths, certificates of removal, and some other matters, all type-written, paged and indexed. These volumes are deposited in the Record Room at Friends' Library. It is a source of much regret that the minutes from Ninth Month, 1686, to Fifth Mo., 1693, and from Ninth Month, 1704, to Eleventh Month, 1712, could not be found. The first volume of copies has to a large extent furnished the material from which this article has been prepared. The district embraced within Radnor Monthly Meeting was mainly that known as the Welsh Tract. The great immigration of Welsh Friends concerning which it has been justly said that Wales emptied its Quakers into Pennsylvania, caused the establishment of the Monthly Meeting.

A recent writer has said "Quakerism has been a great power in many parts of Wales, where by this time, the very name of the Friends has been almost forgotten among the peasantry. A solitary burial-place in the mountains, a tradition of much suffering, the name of a rough stone pulpit, these are the only memorials of the men and women who taught the high ideals of honesty and peace during times of religious indifference and of religious fervor alike."

There is, however, one ancient meeting-house still standing in Merionethshire, in about the same condition, apart from a new roof and windows, that it was two centuries ago, though no longer owned by Friends. It was sold to the Congregationalists about fifty years since. Here many of the early Welsh Friends who emigrated worshipped before they came to America.

The original meetings of Merion, Haverford, and Radnor, appear to have been established about the same time, and very early after the first influx of settlers. The other meetings were of later date as will hereafter appear.

The first minute appears to be that dated Second Mo. 10th, 1684, and is in the following words: "At the men's meeting held at Thomas Duckett's house the tenth day of the Second Month, 1684."

Thomas Duckett's name is a familiar one to those who are acquainted with Friends' Records. He was in America before William Penn and is spoken of in the minutes of the city meetings as living "the other side of Schuylkill."

At this first meeting two couples passed. No meeting-houses having then been built, the Monthly Meetings were held at private houses. Each meeting seems to have designated where the next one was to be held. The second meeting was held at the house of William Warner, and the third at that of Hugh Roberts.

Hugh Roberts was an early settler. He was a minister, and is described as having been a serviceable instrument in the Church of Christ. His religious labors were mostly confined to the neighborhood where he lived, though he appears to have been twice in his native land, and travelled somewhat in different parts of America. He died in 1702.

The necessity of providing burial places was one of the first subjects which claimed attention, and it is noted in the Ninth Month, 1684, that such burial places had been set out both for Haverford and Merion. At the same time week-day meetings were established to be held at Thomas Duckett's house on Third-day, at Haverford on Fourth-day, and at Merion on Sixth-day.

John Bevan's name early appears. He was born about 1646 and came to Pennsylvania soon after William Penn, probably in 1684. He was a minister. After spending about twenty years in this country, he returned to his former home at Trevekyricke in Wales, where he died in 1710. Owing to a storm he was unable to board the vessel which he first took passage in, a providential circumstance, for it was captured by pirates. Of impending danger to that ship he seems to have had a clear intimation.

All of his children remained in America (they having married here), except his youngest daughter the saintly Barbara Bevan, who was a diligent attendant of meetings from her sixth year. At the age of sixteen her religious character developed, and a gift in the ministry was conferred upon her. She travelled on religious service extensively both in America and in Wales and laid down her armor and sweetly passed from works to rewards in 1705, at the early age of twenty-three, having been a minister seven years. Her last hours were marked by loving expressions towards her relatives and friends.

John German or Jarman is also referred to about the same time. He came from Llangery, Montgomeryshire, in 1683. He settled close to where the present Radnor Meeting-house stands, was an able minister and instrumental in building upon the meeting held at that place. He died in 1697. A memorial of him was probably prepared, but it does not appear to have been recorded.

In the early part of 1693 a statement is recorded of the concern of the meeting, on account of the tendency to follow the vain customs of the world "contrary to the express testimony of the Scriptures of Truth," and "the testimony of many ancient Friends," and a committee of several Friends was appointed for each of the meetings of Haverford, Merion and Radnor, to have inspection over those that profess truth, "that they may be prevented of going on in that broad way that leads to destruction."

From the Fifth Month, 1693, until the Second Month, 1698, the Monthly Meeting was held at Haverford. At that time it was concluded to hold it in course alternately at Haverford, Merion and Radnor.

In the Eighth Month, 1693, reference is made to a tax having been levied of "one shilling per hundred, toward the taking of wolves," and on the tenth of Eleventh Month, 1694, it is noted that a committee was appointed "to get a stable made adjoining to this meeting-house," showing that some kind of a building for meeting purposes existed at Haverford at that early day.

The name of Rees Thomas first appears on the tenth of Third Month, 1694. He was from Caernarvonshire, and came to America in 1691 in the same ship with his affianced, Martha Awbrey. He is described in his certificate as having been of a meek and quiet disposition, and well beloved of all sorts, descended of a good family, and "had been very serviceable upon the account of truth in all honest designs," and "one that walked according to the order of truth from his first conviction." It is further naively remarked "as far as we do understand he is not clear from Martha Awbrey, one of the passengers, wherein we have nothing to say against them in the least, the which we thought fit to acquaint you as our incumbent duty."

Martha Awbrey was a sister of William Awbrey, who married William Penn's daughter "Tische." She was descended from an ancient and honorable Welsh family, seated for many generations at Llanelw in Brecknockshire. Her character has been given in a few terse words—"Her life was exemplary, and her memory precious to all acquainted with her. It was a monitor, whether she was considered as a wife, a mother, an elder in the church, a mistress, a neighbor or a friend. As her life was righteous, so her death was sweet."

Rees Thomas and Martha Awbrey were married at Haverford in 1692, soon after their arrival in Pennsylvania. They settled on a tract of land on part of which Bryn Mawr College stands. Their dwelling house was close to the present Rosemont Station. The writer well remembers this ancient dwelling, which only disappeared within the last twenty-five years. It is said to have been one of the first, if not the very first building constructed of stone to the west of the river Schuylkill. The sash, which were imported from England, were of lead, and the floor boards were fastened to the joist with wooden pegs instead of nails. Straw was used in the plaster for want of hair. It contained a huge fire-place, on either side of which were benches capable of seating several persons.

The marriage certificate of this couple is a curiosity. Rees promised Martha "to be true, loving and faithful to her, and to behave himself as would be a man to behave himself to his wife," while Martha promised Rees that she would "love him and make much of him." But perhaps there was more in these quaint promises than is often the case with the formal words used in the present day.

On the eleventh of Eighth Month, 1694, we find that a committee was appointed "to draw a testimony in the behalf of the meeting concerning the godly, grave, and orderly life and conversation and comfortable end of our dear friend, Thomas Lloyd, lately deceased."

Thomas Lloyd was one of the most prominent and influential men connected with the early history of Pennsylvania. He was born at Dolobran, Montgomerieshire, Wales, about 1640. Descended from royal stock, possessing superior natural parts, highly educated and of considerable estate, his favor was sought and preferments offered by many who were of account in the world. He, however, refused worldly advancement, and joining the Society of Friends, became an able minister of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, suffering imprisonments and much loss of outward substance in the maintenance of his principles. He came to Pennsylvania with his family the year after William Penn, and for some years was Deputy Governor. He died in 1694 at the early age of forty-five, from an illness supposed to have been occasioned by the griefs and sorrows brought upon him by the apostasy of George Keith and the abuse which he suffered from his followers. His life was innocent, and he left behind a meek spirit which lived with his friends who survived.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Banks of the Pensaukin.

On the nineteenth of Eighth Month, in company with two or three young friends, I set out to examine a part of the banks of the Pensaukin, along which I had never before travelled. We left the cars at Maple Shade Station. As we traversed an open field near by, one of our company found a young garter snake, about a foot in length. This harmless snake may be readily recognized by the stripes down its back and sides. The scales are not smooth like those of the Blacksnake, but have a little prominence or keel, which renders them rough to the touch.

The peculiar gliding motion of these animals is effected by the combined action of the ribs and the broad scales on the under side of the body. The hinder edges of these scales rest on the ground, and resting on these the body is pushed or drawn forwards. Most of our snakes are oviparous—the eggs being laid where the heat of the sun will mature them. They feed on insects and small animals, and the teeth are small, sharp and pointed backward, so as to prevent their prey from slipping out. The bones of the jaws are more or less movable, so that the throat can be distended so as to swallow comparatively large animals.

In poisonous snakes there are in the upper jaw two teeth or fangs, which are curved and hollow, connected with a poison-bag, so that when the animal strikes with them the poison is forced into the wound. There are over one hundred and thirty species of snakes in North America, north of Mexico, but of these there are very few poisonous ones. In the State of New Jersey only two venomous kinds are known—the Rattlesnake and the Copperhead. Comparatively few persons are familiar enough with the appearance of different snakes to be certain that one they meet with is harmless, and as the consequences of a bite from a venomous snake are so dangerous, they think it safest to avoid contact with any.

We met during the course of the day with a much larger snake than the little garter—a well grown blacksnake, which when touched with a stick darted into the creek.

An interesting object was a large and beautiful Garden Spider, which had constructed a net among the bushes, with radiating lines or spokes, and a spirally concentric line crossing and supported by these. If this spiral line touched by the finger it will adhere to it, and will stretch when the finger is withdrawn to several times its original length. The spiral line bears numerous bead-like drops of sticky material. Near the end of the abdomen of the spider are situated the spinning organs which are two or three pairs of appendages each ending in numerous small tubes from which the silk issues in a liquid state, but immediately hardens on coming into the air. Ordinarily the tips of these spinnerets are brought together, so that all the fibres of the silk are joined into one thread, but sometimes the spider will spread its spinnerets apart, so as to spin a broad, ribbon-like band. Our spider had spun such a ribbon, perhaps three inches long and one-fourth of an inch wide, near the centre of its web, probably to stiffen and strengthen it. It resembled a narrow ribbon with the threads traversing it in a zig zag fashion, and was quite a pretty object.

Among the insects which attracted our notice was the common White Cabbage Butterfly. This seemed to be quite attracted to the bunches of Purple Boneset, (Eupatorium purpureum) fluttering about it in groups of a dozen or so. The larvæ of this insect is a pale green worm which feeds on cabbage and similar plants, and is sometimes quite destructive. In some part of the creek, the water for large spaces was closely covered with a very small floating plant with rootlets hanging down in the water. I was the Duckweat (Lemna polyrrhiza), of Linneus. This plant is common in ponds and pools throughout North America, but is very rarely seen either in fruit or flower. It propagates itself by forming new plants, from a cleft in the edge of the frond, and also by minute fronds or bulblets which sink to the bottom, but rise and vegetate in the spring.

Running over the bushes and trees on the steep bank of the creek were several vines of the Fox Grape (Vitis labrusca), and my young companions seemed to appreciate the opportunity of feasting on the large, purple grape which it produces. It reminded me of the day of early boyhood, when I too enjoyed this with other wild fruits. It has a musky flavor, and is believed to have been the parent from which have originated the Isabella, Catawba, Concord and other grapes.

Creeping in the mud were patches of a low herb, with round or kidney shaped leaves—the Mud Plantain (Heteranthera reniformis). The flowers had disappeared.

Near the edge of the water we espied some plants with a spike of beautiful intensely red flowers, a foot or more in length, and at once recognized the Cardinal Flower (Loelia cardinalis), one of the most showy of our native flowers.

We saw several clusters of much branched herbs, with bright orange-colored flowers, thickly spotted with reddish-brown dots, hanging gracefully down on slender stalks. As the seed-pod ripen the valves which compose them coil elastic ically, until the tension bursts them loose from each other, and the seed are scattered by a sort of explosion. This habit gives the plant its common name of 'Touch-me-not (Impatiens fulva). There is another species with rather larger flowers of a pale yellow color called Impatiens pallida, which is not so common as the I. fulva, but I think more abundant on the other side of the Delaware than in New Jersey.

There is a genus of plants in which the calyx is a helmet-shaped appendage on the upper lip, from which is derived its common name Scutellaria, and its common appellation of Skull-cap. There are several species of this genus, and one of them we met with in our walk. It is a much branched, with small violet-purple flowers. Some years ago it was spoken of as a sovereign remedy for hydrophobia, and from his got its distinctive name of Mad-dog Skull-cap, but it has fallen into deserved obscurity as a specific for that disease.

Growing in the water were plants of the Arrow Head (Sagittaria sagittifolia), so called from the shape of its leaves, which however vary very much in width and outline. Some leaves are as broad as long; others are reduced to a simple leaf-stem, without any expansion of leaf-tissue. I have found such in our pine barren districts. Gray, in his botany, adopts the specific name of Variabilis, given to this species by Dr. Engelmann.

One of our company found a caterpillar of an inch or more in length, whose body was closely studded with little white oblong bodies, which were the cocoons of a species of ichneumon fly. The ichneumon flies appear to be designed to keep in check the increase of insects which may be hurtful to the farmer. The parent fly pierces the body of the caterpillar and deposits its eggs within the body, where they hatch and feed on the blood and substance of their unwilling host, which finally perishes from the loss of its substance. Just before this takes place the young ichneumons emerge and spin their cocoons on the outside of the body. The adult parasite cuts a neat little lid at the upper end of its case, from which it thus makes its escape. J. W.

LINCOLN AND THE CHILDREN.—The very children knew him [Lincoln], for there was not one of them for whom he had not done some kind deed. "My first strong impression of Mr. Lincoln," says a lady at Springfield, "was made by one of his kind deeds. I was going with a little friend for my first trip alone on the railroad cars. It was an epoch of my life. I had planned for it and dreamed of it for weeks. The day I was to go came, but as the hour of the train approached, the hackman, through some neglect, failed to call for my trunk. As the minutes went on, I realized, in a panic of grief, that I should miss the train. I was standing by the gate, my hat and gloves on, sobbing as if my heart would break, when Mr. Lincoln came by.

"Why, what's the matter?" he asked, and I poured out all my story.

"How big's the trunk? There's still time, if it isn't too big." And he pushed through the gate and up to the door. My mother and I took him up to my room, where my little old-fashioned trunk stood, locked and tied. "Oh, ho," he cried; "wipe your eyes, and come on quick." And before I knew what he was going to do, he had shouldered the trunk, was downstairs, and striding out of the yard. Down the street he went, fast as his long legs could carry him, I trotting behind, drying my tears as I went. We reached the station in time. Mr. Lincoln put me on the train, kissed me good-bye, and told me to have a good time. It was just like him."—Ira M. Turbell, in McClure's Magazine.

FROM THE "LEISURE HOUR."

The Persian Poet's Farewell.

The following poem is taken from a prose translation of the original, given in "Palgrave's Travels in Western Arabia." The sentiments are rather those of a Christian sage than of one unacquainted with the light of revelation, and it is difficult to understand how the writer could have attained such views of the character of God, and the immortality of the soul of man, without the aid of Christian teaching. All that we are told of Ahmed el Ghazalib is that he was the most famous sage and poet of his day, and that he lived at Toos, in Persia, during the eleventh century. His farewell to his disciples is prefaced by an introduction to the following effect.

Ahmed el Ghazalib, the greatest of the sages of Persia, said to his disciples, "Fetch me white garments, for I must appear to-night in the presence of my king." His disciples hastened to fulfill his command, but great was their dismay when on returning with white garments they found their master dead. Lying on the ground beside him, they discovered a scroll, on which was written his farewell message.

"Tell thou to my friends, when weeping,

They my words desery,
Here you find my body sleeping,
But it is not I;
Now in life immortal hovering,
Far away I roam,
This was but my house, my covering,
'Tis no more my home.

"This was as the cage that bound me;
I the bird, have flown;
This was but the shell around me;
I the pearl, am gone!
Over me as o'er a treasure,
Had a spell been cast,
God has spoken at his pleasure,
I am free at last!

"Thanks and praise to Him he given
Who hath set me free,
Now forevermore in heaven
Shall my dwelling be,
There I stand his face beholding,
With the saints in light,
Present, future, past unfolding
In this mirror bright.

"Tolling through the plain I leave you,
I have journeyed on,
From your tents why should it grieve you,
Friends, to find me gone?
Let the house forsaken perish!
Let the shell decay!
Break the cage, destroy the garment,
I am far away!

"Call not this my death, I pray you,
'Tis my life of life;
God of all my weary longings,
End of all my strife,
Think of God with love forever;
Know his name is love!
Come to Him, distrust Him never;
He rewards above.

"I beheld each dauntless spirit,
All your ways I view;
Lo, the portion I inherit
Is reserved for you."

BEAR IN MIND that you should seek first (not last) the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
A LESSON FROM THE WEEDS.
JOHN MARSH FITZ.

What constitutes a weed? 'Tis surely not
Its commonness or its growth alone,
Its being seen by the matron, growing wild,
Or sprung, unseeded far and unvisited,
(Except by insects, such as know its worth),
These qualities, though paradoxical,
Are those which prove its great pre-eminence
And warrant its survival, these avow
That 'tis a child of God, much more indeed
Than all the frail domesticities of man,
No human arrogance: a weed's a flower
Unfitted to its sphere; perchance a gem
Considered in itself, but in the way
Or out of harmony with other flowers:
Indeed, what beauty can exist apart
From fitness, system and utility?
Throughout all Nature nothing can be found
Which could be designated beautiful
Unless with purpose linked; no organ, part,
Or particle, which either is not now,
Or never was of service to the race.
No plume is but for show, though many parts
Are useful, spite of ugliness.— This is Because that beauty has not least to admire
The commonplace and ordinary thing.
True Beauty lurks in everything around,
But lacks the kind, appreciative eye,
'Tis artificial man who breaks the spell,
Who sets up standards false to judge things by:
In dress and language and in countless arts
He wishes that he were not least to admire
He helps not on the chariot of God,
His organs function not; he is a weed—
Yea rubbish "matter out of place,"
A hindrance to the progress of the world.
Despise not then the insignificant,
The humble creature, or the person hid—
True beauty quite lies where least perceived—
If they perform their little part aright
They shine, deserving of our greatest praise.

Viceroy Li and Christian Missions in China.

BY ISAAC PEARSON.

The central figure in China is Viceroy Li Hung Chang. He has by far excelled all others now upon the stage of action in great services to the State, and he has won for himself the enviable reputation of continuous success in war, and far-reaching statesmanship in peace. He sought to avoid war with Japan, and for so doing was partially deposed from office and honors during its continuance; and so the very defeat of the Chinese armies turned out to his credit. When the war had run its course no other statesman was equal to the task of making peace with the conquerors, and so he was restored to all his former dignities and emoluments. His name has been associated with all the modern enterprises that have advanced China in material well being. The Imperial Telegraph, the China Merchants' Steamship Company, and the railroads that are creeping into the country, and arsenals and forts by land, and gunboats by sea, and Anglo-Chinese schools in several places, all owe much to his skillful leading and his patriotic determination.

Among these varied interests and activities there is one which our people know but little about, and that is his relation to missionary enterprise.

Li is a Confucian and thoroughly imbued with all the teachings of the Chinese sages; but he has come into peculiar contact with Christianity, and by that contact he has come to know and acknowledge the power of Christianity for good to his people. Prior to 1879 the Viceroy had looked upon Christianity as something outside of himself and having no relation to any private interests of his.

In the fall of 1878, or in the early spring of 1879, a missionary physician, named J. Kenneth Mackenzie, came from Hankow on the Yangtzu River, to reside at Tientsin. There was no established medical work awaiting him, but there was a great field in which to inaugurate such a work. He was a member of the London Mission, and, according to the established custom of that society, any medical work which he might undertake must be at the expense of other parties than the mission. Dr. Mackenzie desired to establish a free dispensary, hoping in time to develop it into a hospital with the full swing of an earnest and useful medical work.

To make a beginning a subscription paper was drawn up, and on the 15th Vice Consul, Wm. E. Pethick, entering heartily into the plan, undertook to secure from the Viceroy the first contribution. A letter was written on elegant red paper with proper care for titles and compliments, and W. Pethick, being in intimate relations with the Viceroy, presented it in person. The Viceroy received it with courtesy, and, having no knowledge of "Western medical science," or the good it promised to his people, quietly pigeon-holed it.

Many weeks went by and no reply came from the Viceroy, and the hope of recognition or help from him began to be at an end. But at midsummer a crisis came. Lady Li was taken seriously sick, and, despite the best medical aid of all the native doctors in Tientsin, she grew daily worse. One day it happened that a Secretary of the British Legation called upon Li at his yamen, and, having completed his business with him, he asked the meaning of the many sedan chairs in and about the reception court. He was informed that Lady Li was lying very low and likely to die, and that many of his friends (all high officials), were calling that day to express to him their sympathy in his expected bereavement. The secretary joined in sympathy, but, in Christian fashion, asked carefully if all had been done to relieve and save her. The Viceroy replied that she had been treated by all the noted physicians of Tientsin and taken a dose of his most efficient medicine at the hand of each, but with no avail; and that now a long list of medicines was being repeated, and she only grew worse. "And is there no hope?" the secretary asked. "None at all," replied the Viceroy; "all has been done that can be done. She must die." The secretary answered: "And have you tried the foreign doctors? If the native doctors can give no hope, and she is sure to die, you can lose nothing by trying them, and who knows but they may bring her help." The argument was sound, and the long delayed petition came to mind. Dr. Mackenzie's office was two or three miles distant, and a quick rider was dispatched with message and extra horses. Dr. Mackenzie being out of his office at the time the messenger brought Dr. Irwin, the popular physician of the foreign community; but ere he reached the yamen Dr. Mackenzie overtook him.

The two doctors quickly discovered the nature of the disease, and applied remedies to abate the immediate trouble; and at their suggestion a fleet courier was soon despatched for Peking, eighty miles northward. He bore request from the Viceroy to Miss Howard, M. D. (now Mrs. King), of the American Methodist Mission. His steam yacht met her half way between Peking and Tientsin, and in two days she was at the bedside of Lady Li and able to give her the needed treatment. The result was, her life was spared for many years, and a strong and lasting attachment was established between Lady Li and her deliverer.

Those days were memorable days at the great yamen. Each day, by invitation, the two doctors visited it and consulted with Dr. Howard, who had taken up her residence with Lady Li and dispensed medical and surgical treatment to the many sufferers who were admitted to the yamen and treated in the presence of the Viceroy. One day a chair carrier was brought in who had a heavy tumor upon his neck, larger than his head. Under anesthetics the man slept and the tumor was removed. This capped the climax. The yamen was full of guests, great and small, and the ladies and their attendants and their guests occupied a portion of the court. All gazed in astonishment at the wonderful sight, and the Viceroy with unbounded enthusiasm acted as chief attendant with sponges and water.

Next day commissions were issued and presented to the two gentlemen, and I think also to the lady physician, to become physicians to the Viceroy's family and attendants.

Dr. Mackenzie accepted the responsibility but declined the financial reward, while he renewed his request for help in establishing his dispensary and hospital. Thus the long-sought door was flung wide open. The Viceroy entered heartily into the project. He set apart a yard and many rooms in the chief Temple of Tientsin. He appointed attendants and an officer of rank to assist the doctor. He bade the latter buy whatever medicines and instruments he needed, and with his own hand wrote a great proclamation, as large as a door, to be posted at the gate of the temple, informing the multitude that they might come to be healed of every disease and infirmity.

The work thus begun settled down into a great hospital plant and efficient service for men and a second hospital for women, with the Viceroy as the chief patron of the one, and Lady Li as that of the other.

The influence of this work, continued now for seventeen years, and the known sympathy of the great Viceroy have been far-reaching throughout North China, and have been a very important factor in bringing all the work of Protestant missions into repute with the highest officials of the Empire.

THE FRIEND.

NINTH MONTH 12, 1896.

In the columns of THE FRIEND more than twenty years ago, our late valued friend, Dr. Charles Evans, published an article on the condition of things in the Society of Friends, which it may be profitable to reproduce at this time.

After speaking of some of the evidences of declension which had taken place among our people, he says:

"Most of the views alluded to as recently inculcated in the Society, are similar to those held by many of the religious denominations, when Friends first came forth. Friends then declared that they, and the religion to which they belong, were outward and unscriptural; that they stopped short of the requirements of the Gospel, which is not the mere record of the blessed truths in the New Testament, but the power of God unto salvation itself, and that not in-living on 'the washing of regeneration' by the baptism of the 'Holy Ghost and fire,' they left the man of sin in possession of his goods in the heart.

"Can their dissemination and adoption have any other effect than to lead our own members back to many of the same things Friends were raised up to witness against, to the outer court of the temple, whence they were commanded to depart? Look at the effects already developed. In many places our meeting-houses are thrown open for ministers of other religious societies to promulgate the opinions they hold. Silent meetings are declared to be unsuited for mixed assemblies, and reading the Scriptures is introduced into meetings for worship, and music into 'Sabbath schools.' Missionaries are sent out under the authority of associations of our members, and who stand in distant lands as representatives of Friends, some of whom have no scruples against participating with others in bread and wine as the Lord's supper, or in giving out hymns to be sung by a mixed assembly. Some resort to the rite of water baptism, and are held up as examples of Christian attainment, while others approve the use of other outward elements, as giving spiritual benefit. Members occupy the position of ministers and travel abroad, accredited by meetings, who give no evidence of being Friends by their language, dress or manners, and who occasionally join with ministers of other denominations in religious exercises. In England the testimony against tithes—for which the early Friends suffered so much, some of them even unto death—is very much given up. With the language and manners of the world, its changeable fashions and dissipating amusements are largely introduced among our members, even among those who occupy conspicuous stations; and in many places the assimilation with other professors has left but few distinctive characteristics of Friends.

"We are not impugning the sincerity or the desire to do good, of those within the Society who are teaching and acting as we have indicated. They may be teaching, so far as they know, and acting in accordance with the religious understanding to which they have attained, and to their own master they must stand or fall. But there are many of their fellow-members who, esteeming the doctrines and testimonies of the Gospel as set forth by the founders of the Society, to be unchangeable and beyond all price; believe that those who have introduced, and those who sanction these changes, are not Friends in the long-known sense of that appellation; that they and their influence are subverting the faith of Friends and the cause Friends are bound to support. They, therefore, cannot acknowledge their labors nor give them, while thus doing, the right hand of fellowship.

"The reiterated assertion that those members who speak disparagingly of the 'peculiarities' of Friends, have got deeper than that state which requires their observance, and are too busy spreading the Gospel net to pay attention to such small matters; the glowing accounts given of the extraordinary evidence of 'the demonstration of the Spirit and of power, at tending the preaching of that class of ministers suggestively described by one of their admirers in a laudatory published letter, as 'emancipated from the dominion of red tape; the narrative of the large numbers who, under the contagious excitement produced in protracted meetings and the urgent solicitation of speakers, make public confession of 'having found Jesus, and who are then considered 'converted,' all force the consideration on those who love and adhere to old-fashioned Quakerism and are longing to in proof, of what is the prevailing type of the evil said to be going on in the Society? They are fully aware that love of the world and unwillingness to wear the yoke of Christ, have for years produced coldness, indifference and deadness among very many of its members; and they are waiting and hoping to see some blessed, all-powerful means—attention and obedience to the Light of Christ in the soul—which convinced the early Friends and gathered them into a Society, bringing forth the same blessed fruits. They look to see whether the promulgators of, and the converts to, this modern Quakerism, are led in the same way as were those who have heretofore been brought under 'convincement' and 'conversion.' Do he converts now, as formerly, under the galling arrow accompanying repentance and condemnation for past sins, put their mouths in the dust? If so be, there may be hope. Do they sit alone and keep silence because they are learning to bear the yoke upon them? Is there manifested a humble, self renouncing, teachable frame, an operative faith in Christ, not only as He wrought for man's redemption, when in the flesh, but as He appears the second time to the soul, to purge it from the power of sin and perfect the work of salvation? And are they thus made willing to become fools for his sake, and to show to all around them by their garb, their language, their renunciation of the world, that they are true Friends, not ashamed of their religion and its requisitions? They think answers are given in the increase of departures from the primitive faith and practice of which we have spoken; and the rapid approach to the standard of other professors saddens their hearts with fear that the Society may be swept altogether from its nothings.

"We need not shut our eyes, then, to the contrary in belief and its results, existing in the Society; the consequent lack of unity and harmony among the members, and the failure, more or less apparent or felt, in the objects for which they were originally, and ought still to be associated together as a body of Christian believers—building each other up on the most holy faith, and advancing the spiritual government of the crucified Redeemer, by lives consistent with the straight and narrow way He opened and trod for his disciples. It is vain to suppose that these deplorable evils can be eradicated or smoothed over by the Society sanctioning the system of comprehensiveness advocated by some. However such a compact may suit a national or "broad" church," which embraces every shade of belief, from "high church ritualism" to bald unitarianism, or however successfully it may exist in civil or political communities, where the heterogeneous elements are kept together and in their respective places by force of law, it is opposed to, and would be subversive of, the constitutional principles of the Society of Friends, and would hardly be broached, except in times of defection and by those who are willing to say, 'We will eat our own bread and wear our own apparel, only let us be called by thy name to take away our reproach.'

"Truth is not a mere matter of opinion, nor are the doctrines of the Gospel uncertain or undefined. To prevent the Society from entirely deserting the advanced position assigned it by the Head of the Church, there must be a limit to its members' right to promulgate whatever opinions they may choose and to make whatever changes in practice may suit their modified Quakerism. Unless this is insisted on, diversity of religious opinion and disunity in feeling will go on increasing; for we believe there still are, and will continue to be, very many who will not allow these novelties in the Society to supplant their belief in and love for its ancient faith and usages. These cannot but continue their testimony against the religion of sentiment and excitement which, in their view, is undermining that, which ought to be maintained by the Society and experienced by its members individually. They cannot harmonize with others, however bold or popular, who seem bent on reasoning away any requisitions of duty in what they deem "small things," on disesteeming the belief that obedience in these is essential to greater attainments, and on leading our members to suppose they are true believers in Christ, justified by his blood and saved by his imputed righteousness, because they confess acceptance of the truths recorded in the Holy Scriptures, though they may give no evidence of having been washed, sanctified and justified in the name (or power) of the Lord Jesus and by the spirit of our God. This testimony must be maintained, not by public affidavits, but by patient continuance in well-doing, by prayer and supplication to Him who watcheth over his Church by night and by day, and by advocating truth and pointing out error in the meekness of wisdom. Notwithstanding the changed and degenerate condition of the Society, we believe the Lord is waiting to do it good; that He remembers the kindness of her youth, the love of her espousals, when she went after him in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown; when she was holiness unto the Lord and the first fruits of his increase; and that He will, in his own time, 'Turn to the people a pure language, that they may call upon the name of the Lord, to serve Him with one consent.' May He hasten the day!"

Slavery in Zanzibar.—In the account published in the London Friend of London Meeting for Sufferings, it is stated that the British Government seem thoroughly in earnest in the intention of liberating the slaves in Zanzibar and Pemba on the east coast of Africa. There are eighty-seven thousand slaves on the island of Pemba, and it was felt that there was an urgent need for some large-hearted, capable persons to go there and help the people when set free. After some discussion the Anti-Slavery Committee was encouraged to bring to a future meeting, suggestions of a more definite character as to the practical steps to be taken.

—From observations made by Hugh D. Vail, of Santa Barbara, California, it appears that the mean temperature of that place during the Sixth Month was 64.3°. The highest temperature during the month was 89°, and the lowest 47°. There was no regular rainfall, but the precipitation from two or three heavy fogs or mists amounted about 0.05 in. The average rainfall in the Sixth Month, in twenty-eight years is 0.10 inches, and the extremes 1.64 inches in 1884, and none in nineteen different years. During the month there were twenty-three clear days, two fair and five cloudy. The prevailing wind was east and the total movement during the month 8,192 miles, or about 4.4 miles an hour.

HAVING met with the following observations on Meetings for Discipline, I felt a desire that they might have a place in the columns of THE FRIEND if thought proper.

Isaac Penington, in speaking in reference to giving his sentiment in meetings of this kind, makes the following remarks: "When I have given my sentiment on a subject before the meeting, I must remember that other Friends have a sense of Truth upon their spirits as well as myself, and if their sentiment does not accord with mine, it is then for me to retire and fear before the Lord lest I have made a mistake."

"The meek will He guide in judgment, and the meek will He teach his way."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Dr. Theodore BARTH, leader of the Liberal Party in the German Reichstag, arrived in New York on the 3rd inst. He has come to study the political conditions in this country. He says, "I regard the attempt at bimetalism by any single nation as absolutely impracticable, and I doubt if all the great commercial nations together could succeed."

Viceroy LI HUNG CHANG, the Special Ambassador of the Emperor of China, spent six hours in Philadelphia on the 3rd inst. He was met at Germantown Junction by the Mayor and a reception committee. LI HUNG CHANG said, before leaving New York, "I have no complaint to make of my reception in this country. I don't think I could say anything very bad of you, unless it were that you have too many political parties."

Departure from the Vermont election, held on the 1st inst., indicate a Republican plurality of 38,000 for the State ticket.

The election in Arkansas on the 7th inst. resulted in a majority for the Democratic ticket of about 55,000.

The Samuel Money Democratic Convention at Indianapolis on the 3rd inst. nominated Senator JOHN M. PALMER, of Illinois, for President, and General SIMON B. BUCKNER, of Kentucky, for Vice President. Senator PALMER was nominated on the first ballot and General BUCKNER was nominated by acclamation. The platform adopted denounces the free exchange of silver and the maintenance of the gold standard.

It is reported that a white whale was seen recently in Long Island Sound. This animal is rarely found outside the Arctic regions.

Eastern Texas has within a year set up an important trade in timber with South Africa. This long-range trade is the outcome of the improvement of the Sabine Pass water way that the United States engineers have been dredging for years. When the timber agents of Mobile, Pensacola and other Gulf ports discovered the possibilities of the timber trade through Sabine Pass they began to make contracts for timber in southeastern Texas and to ship the product to South Africa, where the activities of a rapidly growing population in a region almost bare of trees created a demand for timber. The timber belt of Texas is a region of about 20,000 square miles. The timber is transported partly by water, being floated down the streams, and partly by rail.

There is conclusive evidence within the past half century that volcanic action of great violence in the western part of the country, formed as they were by the piling up of volcanic matter, cannot be numbered yet among the wholly extinct volcanoes. North of Mount Hood, in the State of Washington, are the great peaks of Baker, Rainier and St. Helena, all of them very mildly active. Several eruptions of Mount Baker, which is situated in the State of Washington, were covered the western slopes. St. Helena has often clouded the skies of Washington with dry, volcanic ashes, but it is otherwise quiet and peaceable. This mountain, however, has in recent years given more signs of a little activity than any of the others. Mount Rainier it is thus called in the Government publications, is the most recent of the last of the great volcanoes that Tacoma is its proper name; sometimes emits steam and smoke from its great crater.

Superintendent Linden, of this city, said last Friday that speak-easies were springing up like daisies throughout the small street-up town, in the mill district, owing to the shutting down of the mills, and the consequent idleness of the men, and that his work, therefore, had been greatly increased. He was insisting on having the names of the brewers and bottlers which were found on the vessels captured in the police raids put on memoranda, for future reference when the License Court reconvened. He said he hoped that the Legislature would make an act a lawness of "sinking up" the speak-easies would be reached, but at present they cannot be.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 362, which is 6 more than the previous week and 7 more than the corresponding week of 1895. DIED, at her home in Barnesville, Ohio, on the twenty-seventh of Fourth Month, 1896, ABIGAIL SCOFFIELD, wife of Jonathan T. Scofield, in the 75th year of her age. She was a member of Stillwater Monthly and Barnesville Preparative Meeting. A faithful true wife for more than forty-seven years, an loving, careful mother. She is gone to her reward. She was of a generous and hospitable disposition, ever ready as she was able to relieve the needy and distressed. From the beginning of her decline, near the close of her life, she was a patient and patient, and sometimes spoke of earnestly interceding with her Saviour for ability and patience to endure whatever might come upon her. The calm, sweet composure and resignation with which she awaited the final summons was comforting evidence to those about her of a peaceful close, and we humbly trust and earnestly pray that her soul may be numbered with the ransomed and redeemed.

—, at her residence, near Springville, Linn Co., Iowa, on the twentieth of Seventh Month, 1896, HULDAH HOAG, in the seventy-eighth year of her age, a member and minister of West Branch Monthly and Particular Meeting of Conservative Friends, having been acknowledged a minister when about her thirty-second year. Her life was a life of prayer and patience, often expressing a desire that it might be shown her if anything remained to hinder a peaceful close. She was firmly attached to the principles of Friends, as upheld and promulgated by the founders of our Society, bearing a faithful testimony against those who, in the modern innovations, denied the testimony of the Bible, and the principles of the opposite extreme, set at naught the divinity of Christ, and the efficacy of his Atonement, saying, a few days before her death, that it would be awful to die in such a faith. Her friends and relatives have the comforting hope that, through releasing love and mercy, she has been gathered with the just of all generations.

—, in North Dartmouth, Mass., Eighth Month 9th, 1896, ELIZABETH H. GEIGER, widow of George L. Eldy and daughter of the late Sarah and Mary Deaton, in the seventy-seventh year of her age. A valued member and elder of Dartmouth Monthly Meeting of Friends. This dear Friend, through life, both by precept and example, endeavored to uphold and maintain the principles and testimonies of the Society in the midst of a world of opposition and persecutions, and which, in riper years, she embraced by conviction. She did not deem these principles of such trivial importance that they could be laid aside to find an easier way into the kingdom, but by an upright and consistent daily walk, she sought to hold them as a sacred trust. Faithful in the attendance of meetings, and in the discharge of her duties, with a mind of unusual force and clearness, and being concerned for the right ordering of the affairs of the Church, she was very serviceable in Meetings for Discipline, and acceptably served the Yearly Meeting as Clerk upon several occasions. A faithful and devoted wife and mother, she endured the sad bereavement of the death of her child seven times, and was permitted, but with patience and Christian composure, submitted to her Heavenly Father's will. The last years of her life she was, through ill health, unable to be much from home, and for a few months before her decease, on account of a stroke of paralysis, she was able to converse but little with her friends. Still her pleasant and animated conversation, when her visits were always welcome. Thus, having endeavored in a good degree to fulfill the various duties in her family and in the Society of which she was a member, and to keep a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men, her friends have the comforting assurance that she has found a place of peaceful rest in one of those heavenly mansions which Christ hath prepared for them that love Him.

—, on the eleventh of Eighth Month, 1896, at her home in Philadelphia, LYDIA A. GEIGER, widow of Kenzie Geiger, aged seventy-two years. A member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District. This dear Friend was a devoted wife and mother, and suffering illness with great patience and fortitude. Her husband's death brought me I give to out of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

—, Eighth Month 23rd, 1896, at the residence of his parents, Media, Pa., JAMES CONARD FORSTHEE, son of Isaac and Sarah G. Forsythe, aged seven years, seven months and ten days.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1854.—Fifth Month 14th.—Last Third-day was Quarterly Meeting. Dear A. Williams first expressed a desire which she felt that we might not be fed by any bread but what immediately proceeds from Jesus.

Soon another woman Friend spoke of our all sitting on the ground as the multitude did, waiting lowly before Him. Dear P. W. Roberts said that some of the young would experience Him to turn the water into wine, if there was an obeying of his voice. "Whosoever your Lord and Master bids you do, that do."

David Cope spoke so feelingly to the young, that it had been made manifest to us what He was requiring at our hands, but in prosperity we were apt to think, "Surely He does not require these hard things of us." He has shown me what is right, and I do not think Him a hard Master. Oh, no! So merciful to me, so gracious and long suffering. Be pleased to help me, thou to whom belongeth strength!

Y. Warner was recommended (as a minister). He spoke from the text, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me," etc.; also, "He that knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes," etc.

T. S. (who dined here) told me that he saw brother J. a short time since, and was pleased to meet with him. I am glad if dear, Dear brother would only make a nice Friend. He is so kind.

Fifth Month 21st.—Last Fifth-day dear A. Williams came over to our meeting, and went with Anne, or she would have felt her lonely walk. She spoke of the ark. We are commanded to build an ark, even to build on our Saviour. He would enable us to overcome all our spiritual enemies. Rising again shortly after, she said, "Have I not seen the bow of the covenant between me and thee."

Dear Jane Trimble was lying very ill. Oh, that I may walk in the path pointed out to me, so that the day's work may keep pace with the day, and that when death comes I may have nothing to do but to die. I do feel willing to do all that my Heavenly Father wants me to do, if He will only grant me strength. Make me a faithful child of thine, most merciful Saviour. Wash my sins away in thy blood. Oh, blot out all my transgressions. Thou hast said, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." I thought of it in meeting this morning and that "the Lord taketh pleasure in them that fear Him, in those that hope in His mercy." Be merciful yet longer, I beseech of thee, and cut me not down like the fruitless "fig tree."

Monthly Meeting day. Oh, I find I can do nothing only as I keep close to Him who is strength. "Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" was the language uttered by dear friend Gibbons this day. She said, "He was strength in weakness," encouraged us not to think there were "yet four months, and then cometh harvest." We know not that we shall live another day, much less that we shall live four months. There is great need of obeying his leadings. We have faith to believe that He will enable us to overcome.

Dear Aunt Mary (Kite) spoke of the deceased ones, and wanted us all to be doing our work, that there might be no idlers amongst us.

Sixth Month 4th.—Oh! Lord God Almighty be pleased to enable me to walk in the way of thy requiring. How I desire to be thankful unto thee for showing me thy cross again this day, and not leaving me to wander from thee. Dear Hannah Rhoads at our meeting to-day, but silent.

12th.—Oh, poor miserable me. Will not my Heavenly Father come, looking for fruit on the vine upon which He has bestowed so much cultivation, and, not finding any, cut it down? How I desire to thank thee for letting me see myself as I am, still a poor sinner, standing out against obeying thee. Oh, be pleased to forgive me and wipe my sins away, and I will try to retire inward and seek strength of thee often, for I see I cannot do anything myself.

Dear Friend G. said to-day, "Paul may plant and Apollus water, but God giveth the increase." Look inward, not outward. Many lose the good intended, by looking outward instead of inward. Bow low before Him, come unto Him as little children, be humble and lowly. He will strengthen. The Apostle Paul said, "The good I would do, I do not; and that which I would not, that I do. Look inward to the gift of grace. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance. I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot hear them now." He will strengthen against our soul's enemies. She supplicated for us to be preserved to have faith in his all-sustaining arm for those who have not obeyed, to come, like the prodigal, to be received; that we may all be prepared at last to receive the white robes.

25th.—Dear S. Hillman at our meeting. Called here last evening, with Martha Wister and Joel

* It was said of our late highly esteemed friend, Thomas Evans, that, upon his safe arrival at his destination after a journey, it was his practice to return thanks to his Heavenly Father for his preservation from accidents, etc.

Evans. I felt so glad to see her. Sweet and lovely she seems to be—so sanctified. And the comfort is that we can all become sanctified and pure if we seek and obey Him who is all strength. Oh, I am a poor sin-sick soul. I do want peace, and it may be I can take to myself what dear S. said to-day, viz: That there were some who might feel that their rest had been broken up, all their pleasant pictures spoiled, but they wanted peace. These must come unto the Saviour. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Then they will be able to say, "The Lord is my Shepherd, and I shall not want." They will experience peace and joy unspeakable. She supplicated for those to be helped who were standing inquiring the way; that our Heavenly Father would draw us to the dear Saviour, for no man cometh unto Him, except the Father draw him. She said He was a God of great mercies and long suffering. Have I not found Him so? Oh, Heavenly Father, increase my knowledge of my dear Saviour, I beseech thee, and make me obedient. "When the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, He came and said unto them, 'Peace be unto you.'"

Seventh Month 2nd.—The first part of Monthly Meeting was silent, but dear H. Gibbons said a little in the second so encouragingly, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, oh, God!" We must wait upon Him inwardly and frequently—wait solemnly upon Him in patience—patiently wait and quietly hope. As our concern is to walk as He would have us. He would direct our ways. Oh, that thou wouldst direct my ways and lead me in the path towards everlasting peace. Be pleased to be with me in this journey, and keep me in thy fear and in steady obedience to thy cross.

16th.—Here I am in Woodstown. Had a silent meeting here to-day. We all went, looking up the house. It was pleasant to be all together. I feel discouraged and sad on some accounts, but this passage has occurred frequently, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, and it shall be found after many days." Oh, if I could do any good, but I am so erring myself, I feel that I love my Saviour. "Because of the savor of the good ointment, therefore do the virgins love thee?" "Thy name is as ointment poured forth." Oh, preserve me. I feel as though I was walking on a sea of glass. Thou knowest, oh, Lord, that I am trying to obey thee! Oh, help me to walk through this trouble.

Eighth Month 20th.—How glad I am that I am enabled to get along more peacefully. This day dear Sarah Hillman was at our meeting. She spoke encouragingly, pressing the necessity of waiting, patiently waiting, for the appearance of our Lord inwardly. "Seek and ye shall find," etc.; "The poor ye have always with you, but me ye have not always."

To-morrow I start on a journey towards the East. I do hope to be preserved in this fear, to be enabled to keep little, low and meek. While I was riding home from West Chester in the car, I saw an old man standing with a sickle in his hand. Immediately thought of the reaper, Death. It made me feel solemnly for a while, knowing that my journey would lead me through cities where the cholera was raging to some extent. Shortly after I thought, as he was not using the sickle, I might not expect to be taken. Then, he was looking for high grass to cut, and if I kept lowly and humble I might be saved from the disease.

26th.—This has been a day of favor to me. When shall I ever overcome? Dear Samuel Cope at our meeting and spoke, "What lack I yet?" Oh, I must, and will, in his strength, try to walk silently and watchfully along in the cross. Dear H. G. said:

"Renounce all strength but strength Divine, And peace shall be forever thine."

What a comfort, I wish I could do it. Times and visitations are not at our command, and may be, if I do not walk in the cross, which I feel is right, I shall not be spared to do it again. "His mercies are new every morning." Every visitation is like a new morning to us. Surely his mercies have been very great to me, so many times told and so many times halting! Oh, be pleased to cut me not off, but bow my heart to thee in everything. Create in me a clean heart, oh, God, and renew a right spirit within me.

29th.—Dear Phebe Roberts at our Monthly Meeting. Said, the Lord had brought some one from a miry place and set their feet upon a rock. Ah, but this did not feel like my situation. I was like one not fully given up and resigned to do all the Lord's will. I wish I could feel meek and lowly all the time. She sined here. Dear H. Gibbons spoke to the young, desiring conflicting minds to give up entirely.

Ninth Month 17th.—Dear H. Gibbons spoke. "The heart of man is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." I did think that I was trying to serve God and waiting upon Him and giving myself wholly to Him, and these thoughts were passing through my mind when she arose and quoted the above text. Am I to be disappointed. Do I not walk in the cross somewhat? I do feel discouraged, but if I am deceiving myself how merciful is my Heavenly Father to show me my secret sins.

22nd.—Preparative Meeting. Dear H. Gibbons spoke, "When Samuel was sent to anoint one of the sons of Jesse to be King of Israel, he was commanded not to look upon his countenance, but when the right one passed before him, he was told, to 'arise and anoint him, for this is he.'" The text had arisen in her mind, "Why sayest thou, oh, Jacob, and speakest, oh, Israel. My way is hid from the Lord, and my judgment is passed over from my God." We ought to live to the glory of the Lord.

Tenth Month 1st.—Thos. Gould at our meeting, from the smaller body in New England. He said, "There is nothing saved by the multitude of an host, a mighty man is not delivered by much strength. A horse is a vain thing for safety, neither shall he deliver any by his great strength." "Behold the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear Him, upon them that hope in his mercy." But he felt much weakness. The Lord's strength is made perfect in weakness. If all were engaged to wait upon the true Minister of the Sanctuary, there would not be so much need of other ministry. "Hearken diligently, and not to offer the sacrifice of fools." Do not I need this? To hearken when I try to wait upon Him? Oh, if I were only to obey, I should feel his presence with me, I should know Him, should be able to receive Him into my heart. Would it not be true joy? Be merciful yet longer to me, and subdue all the stubbornness in me, I beseech of thee.

Eleventh Month 18th.—We have had silent meetings for many weeks past.

Out of Eden, and Back Again.

The late S. J. May, used to relate that, when he was quite young, an event occurred which served to throw a flood of light on the account in Genesis of at least one of the immediate consequences of the disobedience of our first parents,—the shame of sin.

S. J. May had been very carefully and religiously educated. From his earliest recollection he had been conscientious and truthful. But one day, when eight or nine years of age, he saw at a toy-shop a doll which he was sure would greatly please his younger sister Eliza, to whom he was greatly attached. Unfortunately, however, he did not possess money enough to purchase the coveted toy, and while pondering in his mind how he might gratify his dear sister and himself, he went with his mother to spend the afternoon, and to take tea, with an aunt. Going about the house in search of amusement, he chanced to find, in the chamber of the maid-servant, just the little sum of money needed. The temptation was so strong that he took it, and got away from the house without detection. Of course, he knew he had done wrong. His primary motive, to be sure, was good; but he was already old enough to know that it was never lawful to do evil that good might come.

The next day, after school, he ran to the toy-shop, purchased the doll, carried it home, and gave it, somewhat clandestinely, to his sister. Of course, it soon became known throughout the house that Eliza had a new doll, and that it was given her by her loving brother. But then, alas! the question arose, how did he obtain it? It was bought at Mrs. —'s shop. Yes, but where did he procure money enough to pay for it? He had not thought far enough to anticipate these difficulties. He had found it, or somebody had presented it to him. In some way he managed to extemporize answers that satisfied the first inquiries for the moment.

But he soon found himself involved in the necessity of inventing yet other falsehoods to conceal the first; so true is it that one false step leads on to another. The boy's predicament was a new one, and his perplexity was increasingly distressing. It is always so much easier to get into trouble than to get out. Meantime, as much as possible he avoided the members of the family, especially his parents. Their eyes seemed to penetrate and read his guilty secret. His soul seemed naked before them, and he began to be overwhelmed with shame. When alone he was scarcely more at ease. An all-seeing Eye seemed to pursue him. Nothing amused him, nothing beguiled him of himself.

"The midsummer sun shone but dim,
And the flowers strove in vain to be gay."

Even music, of which he was very fond, failed to quiet him. All about him was changed. The usually pleasant parlor was dreary, and the home itself a doleful place.

"Sweet birds, sweet prospects, and sweet flowers, Had lost all their sweetness for him."

Alas! he was out of Eden. He had sinned, and his expulsion from the garden of delights followed.

This misery, however, could not always be endured. Somehow a way out of it must be found. Any punishment was preferable to the torture of these wretched days and sleepless nights. He realized that the short and only direct way out of his trouble was through a hearty confession of his fault. After a few days, he summoned up the courage necessary to go to his parents and make a clean breast of the whole matter, confessing his sin and telling the whole truth. Sadly shocked and grieved at what they heard, the latter yet, while fully exposing the wickedness, and pointing out to him all the evils of a thievish disposition and of the habit of untruthfulness, made haste tenderly to commiserate their child in his sorrow and shame, and to express their great gratification that his was a conscience too tender and sensitive and too well instructed to admit of his long carrying such a burden of guilt, and that of his own accord he had come to them and confessed his wrong doing. Money was now furnished him at once with which to restore the maid-servant what he had so wrongfully taken from her. He also explicitly confessed to her his fault, and humbly implored forgiveness. Doubtless the boy also confessed his sin to his Maker, and obtained full pardon at his hand.

Meantime the reader needs not to be informed that, once all this had been done, our young friend experienced a mighty sense of relief, felt like a new creature. Never before had sung the birds so sweetly, or shone the sun so brightly. He was encompassed with a new heaven and a new earth. Conscience approved. The Lord had lifted upon him the light of his reconciled countenance. His lost Paradise was regained, and it was full of incense, melody and joy.—R. H. Howard in S. S. Times.

"THE PACE THAT KILLS;" "TOO LATE."
—The Ram's Horn of Fifth and Sixth Months has on the first page of the cover two of the strongest cartoons from the pencil of Frank Beard, illustrating the consequences and end of a life of dissipation and vice. The first represents a tally-ho, called Society, being driven at great speed. A cloud of dust behind it represents Scandal. The tally-ho is drawn by the fleet horses of Extravagance and Dissipation, and driven by a gayly dressed woman named Fashion, who stands, while her lover by her side looks on admiringly. Behind them sits a similar pair, the girl with her pet dog in her arms. Beneath the hind wheels lie the prostrate and bruised forms of Religion and Love, and beneath the hoofs of the horses are Innocence and Home Ties.

The second is even more striking. It represents a cemetery surrounded by a high fence, at the gate of which there is a pillar on which is inscribed the word "Eternity," and beneath it a hand pointing inward. Against this pillar leans a young woman, drawing away with a horrified countenance from Satan, dressed in the gay attire of a cavalier. The expression on the woman's face is appalling, but not unnatural under the circumstances. Beneath this picture are these words:

"TOO LATE."

"Thank you, sir; you have made my life journey very gay, but you must go no farther."
"You are quite mistaken, madam; we cannot part company now. I am your companion for Eternity."

BEAR in mind that your sin will surely find you out.

Rador Monthly Meeting.

The disorder at funerals claimed the attention of the meeting in 1695. They appear to have been marked by immoderate speaking and want of seriousness and gravity. Friends are advised that their remissness in the past might be redressed, and in the future a good example set to others.

Reference is again made to the meeting-house at Haverford, in the Eleventh Month, 1695, when a committee was appointed to inspect and consider what way will be most convenient to build or repair it, and what charges there will be to do it, but the minutes do not disclose any report from this committee. Two years after it is noted that five pounds had been received, part of a legacy bequeathed by Margaret Howell towards repairing or rebuilding this house. The following year there was much concern in consequence of a certain David Howell having posted on the meeting-house over certain accusations against other Friends before they were dealt with according to Gospel order, which seems to indicate that it was the practice at that time to place testimonies of denial in prominent positions at the meetings, as well as to read them at the close of meetings for worship.

In the Eleventh Month, 1696, "Wm. Lewis and some other Friends having proposed to the meeting to settle a meeting at Newtown, they were left to their freedom therein." This was to doubt the germ of Newtown meeting.

Nearly a year later the meeting decided to buy a book in which "to enter testimonies concerning the life and conversation of faithful Friends as a memorial of their service and faithfulness in their day and for the benefit of posterity."

In the year 1698 it appears that there were meeting-houses both at Merion and Rador as well as at Haverford, as mentioned heretofore, but the minutes do not seem to contain any information as to when they were built. Probably all that may have been mentioned in the issuing minutes.

On the twelfth of Sixth Month, 1697, "The certificate of Rowland Ellis and his wife was read in this meeting and ordered to be recorded." Rowland Ellis was born in Merionethshire, North Wales, in 1650. At twenty-two he was convinced of the Truth as held by Friends and suffered cruel persecution including several years imprisonment for constancy to his religious principles. The judge who sentenced him threatened that he and others should be hanged and quartered. He was an approved minister, though his appearances were not frequent. In 1686 he came to America to prepare a place of settlement for himself and family, returning to Wales soon after. His estate in Wales was called Brynmawr, upon which the mansion had been built by Rhys Lewis in 1617. An inscription to this effect is engraved in Welsh on one of the ceilings of the building. This house still remains substantially in the same condition as it was when occupied by Rowland Ellis. Before leaving Wales the last time he sold Brynmawr to Lewis and Humphrey Owen. In 1686 he again came to Pennsylvania with his family and settled upon the plantation now known as Harrison. Here in 1704 he built the mansion house (which is still standing), upon the same plan as that which he had occupied in his native country. He continued to reside upon this estate until 1719, when he sold it to Richard Harrison and removed to Plymouth (receiving a certificate of removal in the Sixth Month, 1721), where he died in the Seventh Month, 1729. A meeting was established at his house in the Ninth Month, 1713, and sometimes marriages were solemnized there. This meeting appears to have been held in the winter season only.

A minute made in the Sixth Month, 1698, refers to the fact that some Welsh Friends lived within the limits of Chester County, and that they notwithstanding continued their attachment to the meetings in Philadelphia (of which Merion was then a part). This gave dissatisfaction to the Quarterly Meeting in Chester County, but the Monthly Meeting decided to insist upon a previously made arrangement that such Friends should not be disturbed in their place of membership, and appointed a committee to inform that Quarterly Meeting of its decision. This judgment was not satisfactory to Chester County Friends, who appear to have appointed a committee to visit Rador Monthly Meeting on account of it. The subject was in consequence laid before Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting for its judgment, and in the Seventh Month, 1700, the representatives produced a copy of a minute of that meeting as follows: "The Friends from Haverford Meeting report that the Quarterly Meeting of Chester County have sent some of their members to their Monthly Meeting, signifying the mind of their meeting that the said Monthly Meeting being in the County of Chester ought to be joined to theirs, which this meeting having weighed and considered the same, came to this agreement—That whereas Haverford Meeting had belonged to this Quarterly Meeting from the first settlement and for several other reasons this meeting unanimously desires that the Monthly Meeting of Haverford may not be separated from this our Quarterly Meeting." The following month a paper addressed to the Quarterly Meeting in Chester County was adopted by the Monthly Meeting, commencing with the words, "In the truth of God our salutation is unto you, desiring we may be one in it forever," in which the judgment above named is embodied.

In the Eleventh Month 1698, the following minute appears. "Friends of the upper end of Merion having acquainted this meeting that they live remote from the settled weekly meetings, proposed to this meeting to have a weekly meeting settled among themselves, and this meeting approved of the same. That they keep it every Third-day of the week." Apparently this was the inception of the Valley Meeting. In the First Month, 1699, a committee was appointed to get subscriptions "to assist Haverford Friends to build their meeting-house," and the following month a different committee was appointed "to consider what charges the building of the meeting-house at Haverford in every respect shall come to and bring an account thereof in writing against the next meeting." This committee reported at the time designated that the cost would amount at least to the sum of one hundred and fifty-eight pounds, and another committee was appointed to bring the subscription of Merion and Rador Friends for that purpose to the next Monthly Meeting.

These Friends attended to their duties, and in the Fourth Month following reported contributions as follows:

Rador	£ 5 12 0
Newtown	8 0 0
Merion	32 10 0
Upper End Merion	9 10 0
Total	£55 12 0

The subscription from Merion was subsequently increased to thirty-three pounds sixteen shillings and twopence, as appears from a minute of eleventh of Seventh Month, 1701.

In addition to the report of subscriptions for building Haverford Meeting-house, the minutes of the Fourth Month, 1700, refer to two other subjects of interest. One of these is the report of a committee to visit families, in which it is stated that "they felt the Lord with them, strengthening, comforting and refreshing them in the service, and that they found tenderness and openness in many places and no opposition." The other is an account of the reception of a paper of acknowledgment from a certain Wm. Cerdens who had taken part in George Keith's separation. In this paper he acknowledged "the Lord's mercy unto him in visiting him and making him sensible of his goodness and drawing him again to his people."

In the Second Month, 1701, we are informed that "the days now growing long, Friends made known their intention to keep afternoon meetings," which was approved, the arrangement being as follows: Newtown Friends at Lewis Lewis' house; Haverford Friends at their meeting-house; and at Rees Thomas' and Ellis Pugh's; Merion Friends at their meeting-house, and at John Bevan's and Cadwalader Morgan's house; Gaynedd Friends at their meeting-house, and Hugh Griffith's house.

Ellis Pugh was born in Dolgelly, Wales, in 1656. He was convinced when about eighteen years old under the preaching of John ap John. Though a man of moderate abilities Ellis Pugh, possessed a large gift in the ministry, and is described as having been of a meek and quiet spirit and of good report among all people. He came to Pennsylvania in 1686, subsequently visited his native land on religious service, and died in 1718. His descendants are still found in Pennsylvania.

John ap John under whose ministry Ellis Pugh was convinced, was a yeoman residing on his ancestral estate at Plas Iff, near the vale of Llangollen in Wales, and had once been a preacher in Beaumaris. He and another person were sent by Morgan Floyd, the priest at Wuxlum to "trie the Quakers" in the North of England and bring back an account of them. But they brought back quite a different account from what the priest desired, for both ap John and his companion embraced Quakerism though the latter subsequently fell away. John ap John became an eminent minister and accompanied George Fox on a number of his journeys through Wales. An extended conviction throughout the country followed, largely among the oldest and best families.

John ap John did not emigrate to America. He died at the house of his son-in-law, John Miller, at Whiteguy, England, Ninth Month 16th, 1697, and was buried at Basford, a hamlet adjoining Whiteguy. Many years after, in 1712, London Yearly Meeting desired Friends in North Wales to collect information relative to the services of "our ancient and faithful friend John ap John," but so far as appears no memorial was prepared.

On the eleventh of Fourth Month, 1702, the meeting was informed that assistance was required toward finishing the meeting-house at Haverford, and it was decided to lend a legacy of ten pounds left by "John Humphrey towards the printing of the sons of Jacob in Welsh," for that purpose, to be returned when desired. This indicates that Haverford Meeting-house was approaching completion at that time.

In the First Month, 1699, we have the commencement of Gwynedd Meeting in the following minute: "There is a general meeting appointed at Gwynedd the second weekly Third-day of every month at the desire of Friends there, beginning the next month." North Wales Friends were authorized to keep a Preparative Meeting among themselves at the Monthly Meeting held in the Sixth Month, 1702, which was to be held after their week-day meeting; the Third-day next before the Monthly Meeting, and the following month it was decided to ask the Quarterly Meeting to establish a First-day morning and a Fifth-day meeting at Plymouth, to be kept alternately at several Friends' houses.

In the Sixth Month, 1714, Gwynedd Friends suggested a Monthly Meeting to be held at Plymouth, which subject was referred three months later to the favorable consideration of the Quarterly Meeting. The latter approved the plan, but the place of meeting seems to have been changed to Gwynedd where it was opened on the twenty-second of Twelfth Month, 1714-15. This Monthly Meeting afterwards became a part of Abington Quarterly Meeting.

A break occurs in the minutes covering the period from Ninth Month, 1704, to Eleventh Month, 1712, which has already been alluded to. We have, however, a few minutes of Merion Preparative Meeting from Twelfth Month, 1701, to Fifth Month, 1705, which in a slight degree fill a small part of the blank. They contain a number of interesting references, a synopsis of which is now given.

At this time the practice of having bound servants prevailed, and Friends were concerned on their account. It was advised by the meeting that when the term of service of such expired, their masters should furnish them with certificates signifying their behavior "according to their deserts." Also that all should be cautious not to encourage such servants to buy their time by lending them money or being bound for them without the consent of their masters. Also that "if masters deal hard with their servants that such be dealt with." It was also recommended that when servants received certificates they should be brought to the Preparative Meeting and read therein, and instances of this are recorded. In one case a certain Ellis Roberts had served twelve years.

Friends Contributions to Clara Barton's Relief Work in Turkey.

Having recently returned to my home after some months spent in dispensing relief amongst the needy in Turkey in Asia, it seems right to acknowledge the generous gifts of money and sympathy offered by Friends in America. In a word, it may be stated that all the funds sent to me and to my friend Asa S. Wing, and by him remitted to Clara Barton at Constantinople, were promptly forwarded to me while in the interior of Asia Minor. The funds in United States money amounted to two thousand eight hundred and twenty-three dollars and thirteen cents.

Of this, two hundred Turkish liras, equal to about nine hundred dollars, was used in co-operation with Corinna Shattuch, the American missionary, in her heroic efforts for the people at Orfa. During the twelve days spent at Orfa preliminary arrangements for the manufacture of a supply of household utensils, were made. These seemed to be sorely needed, and have been greatly appreciated by the families who have since received them, they having been entirely bereft of all such articles and without any means whatever of replacing those lost.

This operation commended itself as giving work to a considerable number of efficient workmen, who were found destitute of any mode of earning a livelihood, and because the product gave relief of a permanent character.

Since leaving Orfa reports of the success of this effort have come from time to time, and give satisfaction.

The balance of the fund (except a few dollars in hand), was forwarded to meet me upon my arrival, some weeks later, at Harpoot, and was dispensed in the desolate and thoroughly plundered Armenian villages of the district known as the Char Lajack.

Nearly a month of active work was devoted to this section, lying one or two days' journey to the north, and northeast of Harpoot amongst the mountains. Effort was made to get people at work and as far as possible to restore normal conditions. All the money, much of it in very small sums, was paid out by me in person. It reached its intended goal; in bread, clothing, raw cotton, agricultural implements, grain for food and for seed, work animals and a variety of tools and small sums to start handicrafts and in wages paid for the hand-made products which in turn were distributed to the needy for food, raiment and other equipment. Cattle and tools were branded.

A general condensed report, together with complete cash account, was handed to my valued friend Clara Barton before-departure from Turkey at Constantinople and is subject to her wishes.

In closing it may be properly recalled that the writer has been greatly aided in his undertaking by the warm sympathy of many Friends in America and in London. There have been many times during the past winter and the following months, when this sympathy has been keenly felt and appreciated in its helpfulness. The guidance and protection of the Unseen Hand never failed, and seem to have been most fully realized when most needed.

Chinese Ancestral Worship.

In a general and broad sense all their worship is ancestral, as their gods are the deified spirits of some of the distinguished dead. But the worship of their gods is not the real religion of the Chinese; the idol-shrine is not their most holy place. Their real religion is the worship of their ancestors, their real idol the ancestral tablet. The worship of ancestors is certainly of very ancient date, and was sanctioned by the Chinese sage Confucius. Their doctrine is that each man has three souls. At death one soul goes into the unseen world of spirits, the second goes down into the grave, and the third hovers about the old homestead. For the first the priest is responsible. The second and third claim the services of living relatives, the grave being tended for the one, while the other is invited to take up its abode in a tablet of wood; and from that hour the ancestral tablet becomes the most sacred thing in the possession of the family. It is simply a narrow piece of wood, about a foot long, two or three inches wide, and half an inch thick, set in a low pedestal, and on one side are inscribed ancestral names. The eldest son has charge of the tablet and its worship. It is placed in the main hall of the house, offerings are presented before it, and incense burned to it every day. The son regards that tablet as in very truth the abode of a personal being who is far more to him for weal or woe than all the gods of the empire. The gods are to be feared, and their favor is to be propitiated; but ancestors are loved and their needs in the spirit-world generously supplied. The heathen Chinese have no knowledge of the "Father's house of many mansions," where "they hung no more, neither thirst any more." To them the dead are dependent on their living relatives, and should they be neglected they would become beggar spirits, hungry, naked, penniless, with will and power to punish their undutiful offspring for their neglect. Food must therefore be offered before the tablet, to satisfy the hunger of the spirit; paper clothing must be burned to hide its nakedness, and paper money to give it independence in the world of shades. G. L. Mackay's Formosa.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The following extracts are taken from a lecture of Charles G. Finney, President of Oberlin College, Ohio, from 1852 to 1866. The lecture treats upon "Conformity to the World," in business, fashion and politics. A part of the same, in regard to fashion, I will copy for the columns of THE FRIEND:

"Objection 1st. 'Is it best for Christians to be singular?'"

"Certainly. Christians are bound to be singular. Christ says, 'I have chosen you out of the world' (John xv: 19). They are called to be a peculiar people—that is, a singular people, essentially different from the rest of mankind. To maintain that we are not to be singular, is the same as to maintain that we are to be conformed to the world.

"Be not singular," that is, be like the world. In other words, 'Be ye conformed to the world.' This is the direct opposite to the command in the text. But the question now regards fashion in dress, equipage and so on. And here I will confess that I was formerly, myself, in error. I believed and taught that the best way for Christians to pursue was to dress so as not to be noticed, to follow the fashions and changes as so not to appear singular, and that nobody would be led to think of their being different from others in these particulars. But I have seen my error, and now wonder greatly at my former blindness. It is your duty to dress as plain as to show to the world that you place no sort of reliance in the things of fashion and set no value at all on them, but despise and neglect them altogether. But unless you are singular, unless you separate yourselves from the fashions of the world, you show that you do value them. There is no way in which you can bear a proper testimony by your lives against the fashions of the world but by dressing plain. I do not mean that you should study singularity, but that you should consult God's word and your own convenience and economy, though it may be singular.

"Objection 2nd. 'But if we dress plain, the attention of people will be taken with it.'"

"The reason of it is this: So few do it that it is a novelty, and everybody stares when they see a professing Christian so strict as to disregard the fashions. Let them all do it, and the only thing you show by it is that you are a Christian, and do not wish to be confounded with the ungodly. Would it not tell on the vide of the world if all the Christians in it were united in bearing a practical testimony against its vain show? But dress to please God yourself, whether others do or not.

"Objection 3rd. 'But in this way you carry eligion too far away from the world.'

"The direct reverse of this is true. The nearer you bring the Church to the world, the more you annihilate the reason that ought to stand out in view of the world, for their changing sides and coming over to the Church. Unless you go right out from them, and show that you are not of them in any respect, and carry the Church so far as to have a broad interval between saints and sinners, how can you make he ungodly feel that so great a change is necessary? But this change which is necessary is a change of heart. True; but will not a change of heart produce a change of life?

"Objection 4th. 'You will throw obstacles in the way of persons becoming Christians. Many respectable people will become disgusted with religion, and if they cannot be allowed to dress well and be Christians, they will take to the world altogether.'

"This is just about as reasonable as it would be for a temperance man to think he must get drunk now and then, to avoid disgusting the intemperate and to retain his influence over them. The truth is, that persons ought to know, and ought to see in the lives of professing Christians, that if they embrace religion they must be weaned from the world, and must give up the love of the world and its pride and show and folly, and live a holy life, in watchfulness and self-denial and active benevolence.

"Objection 5th. 'Is it not better for us to disregard this altogether, and not pay any attention to such little things and let them take their course; let the milliner and mantua-maker do as they please, and follow the usages of the society in which we live and the circle in which we move?'

"Is this the way to show contempt for the fashions of the world? Do people ordinarily take this course of showing contempt for a thing, to practice it? Why, the way to show your abhorrence of the world is to follow along in the customs and the fashions of the world? Precious reasoning this!

"Objection 6th. 'No matter how we dress, if our hearts are right.'

"Your heart right! Then your heart may be right when your conduct is all wrong. Just as well might the profane swearer say, 'No matter what words I speak, if my heart is right.' No; your heart is not right, unless your conduct is right. What is outward conduct but the acting out of the heart? If your heart was right you would not wish to follow the fashions of the world.

"Objection 7th. 'What is the standard of dress? I do not see the use of all your preaching and laying down rules about the plain dress, unless you give us a standard?'

"This is a mighty stumbling-block with many, but to my mind the matter is extremely simple. The whole can be comprised in two simple rules. One is: Be sure, in all your equipage and dress and furniture, to show that you have no fellowship with the designs and principles of those who are aiming to set off themselves and to gain the applause of men. The other is: Let economy be first consulted, and then convenience. Follow Christian economy—that is, save all you can for Christ's service—and then let things be as convenient as Christian economy will admit.

"Objection 8th. 'Would you have us all turn Quakers or Methodists?'

"Who does not know that the plain dress of the Quakers has won for them the respect of all the thinking part of the ungodly in the community? And if all Christians would imitate them in their plain dress (I do not mean the precise cut and fashion of their dress, but in a plain dress, throwing contempt upon the fashions of the world), who can doubt that they would have a far greater influence over the world for their good? Who does not know that the Methodists, when they were noted for their plain dress and for renouncing the fashions and show of the world, used to have power with God in prayer, and that they had the universal respect of the world as sincere Christians? And who does not know that since they have laid aside this peculiarity and conformed to the world in dress and other things, and seemed to be trying to lift themselves up as a denomination and gain influence with the world, they are losing the power of prayer? Would to God they had never thrown down this wall! It was one of the leading excellencies of Wesley's system to have his followers distinguished from others by a plain dress.

"Objection 9th. 'But if we dress so we shall be called fanatics.'

"Whatever the ungodly may call you, fanatics, Methodists or anything, you will be known as Christians, and in the secret consciences of men will be acknowledged as such. It is not in the power of unbelievers to pour contempt on a holy Church, that is separated from the world. How was it with the early Christians? They lived separate from the world, and it made such an impression that even infidel writers say of them, 'These men win the hearts of the mass of the people, because they give themselves up to deeds of charity and pour contempt on the world.'

"Objection 10th. 'We may be proud of a plain dress, as well as of a fashionable one?'

"Possibly some may be, but it is neither natural nor common for man to be proud of that which brings contempt from the mass around him. If there is danger here, it is a danger that has not once been pointed out in the Scriptures. But it is always the policy of the devil to make men believe 'there is a lion in the way' that leads to life everlasting, so as to frighten men from it, if possible, and have them take the broad way. Men are not very likely to become proud in sincerely trying to escape pride. . . . Is it not time for something to be done? Is it not time that the Church struck out a path that should not be conformed to the world, but should be according to the example and Spirit of Christ? You profess that you want to have sinners converted. But what avails it if they sink right back again into conformity with the world by joining you? Brethren, I confess I am filled with pain, in view of the conduct of the Church!

Where shall I look, where shall the Lord look, for a Church like the first Church, that will come out from the world and be separate, and give themselves up to serve God? Oh, if this Church would do so! But it is of little use to make Christians, if they are not better. Do not understand me as saying that the converts made in our revivals are spurious. But they live so as to be a disgrace to religion. They are so stumbled by old professors that many of them do more hurt than good. The more there are of them, the more occasion infidelity seems to find for her jeers and scoffs.

"Now, do you believe that God commands you not to be conformed to the world? Do you believe it? And dare you obey it, let people say what they will about you? Dare you now separate yourself from the world, and never again be controlled by its maxims, and never again copy its practices, and never again be whiffled here and there by its fashions? I know a man that lives so. I could mention his name. He pays no attention to the customs of the world in this respect, and what is the result? Wherever that man goes he leaves the impression behind him that he is a Christian. Oh, if one church would do so, and would engage in it with all their energy that men of the world engage in their business, they would turn the world upside down.

"Will you do so? Will you break off from the world now, and enter into covenant with God, and declare that you will dare to be singular enough to be separate from the world, and from this time set your faces as a flint to obey God, let the world say what they will? Dare you do it? Will you do it?"

PASADENA, Eighth Month 10th, 1896.

COL. JOHN F. HOBBS, a native of Lexington County, S. C., later of Sydney, Australia, and now of Ilka, where he enjoys the distinction of being the "King of the Cannibal Islands," has just arrived in New York. His kingdom is one of the islands of the New Hebrides group, about twelve hundred miles east of Australia. He happened upon the throne in this way: In 1890 he was sent out by the Australian Government to see that the contract laborers from the neighboring islands who worked in the sugar fields were properly returned to their native land when their period of service had ended. On one of these returning expeditions he was shipwrecked about twenty miles off the Ilka Islands, and was saved by some native fishermen. If he had landed by himself, he said, he would surely have been eaten alive; but when the King, before whom he was brought, saw that he was a white man and had come "over a hill of water," he announced that Hobbs was a great spirit. Hobbs won for himself the regard of the King and the people. About nine months after his arrival on the islands the King died, leaving no heir. A convention was called. There were two candidates for ruler. If either were elected, however, civil strife would follow. So they hit upon the happy expedient of making Hobbs their Oumden, or ruler. J. Hobbs says his subjects are a "fine, honest, manly race, with many virtues," and selfishness they consider the most heinous sin. Furthermore, he expects to return to the island with a wife, whom he is in this country now to marry. He doubts not that the natives will worship her even more than himself; for bright red is a most sacred color to them, and the future Queen's hair is of that hue.—S. Letted.

THE late Dr. Howard Crosby, with his own hands arrested a thief whom he caught in his house, took him to the station, was present and testified against him, and when he was convicted, sentenced, and entered upon his term, called upon him and said, "My friend, I have no malice toward you. You were performing a desperate deed, you deserve your punishment; but now I say to you I am ready to help you to begin a new life." While in prison he visited him, encouraged, and led him to become a Christian. When his time expired he used his influence to secure him a way of earning an honest living. The man entirely reformed, married a respectable woman in the West, and maintained a grateful correspondence with Dr. Crosby until the latter's death. We consider the Christianity of the doctor in pursuing that course as far above that of the pusillanimous and weak person who would say of such a criminal, "Poor fellow, let him go," as manhood is above childishness. Such an act as the latter is but one grade higher than that of sending roses to condemned murderers.—Christian Advocate.

The Kroo Mark.

The people on the coast of Liberia have an ancient custom of putting a mark on the middle of the forehead. It is not for decoration, as similar marks are with many heathen peoples. Among uncivilized peoples who wear no clothes it is a very general custom to tattoo their bodies. Some of our African people, indeed—especially those who are not very black and on whom the mark shows well—have their bodies elaborately decorated, and some of our young men who have worked for Europeans, and received an English name, have this name tattooed upon their chests.

But the mark on the forehead is known by all the European traders as the "Kroo" mark, and when they find a man with this mark they know he is from the Kroo coast. This custom has grown out of slavery and is a sign that these people are not slaves, but free, and were born in a free country.

This indelible mark is made, in early childhood, by cutting several gashes with a knife in the skin until it bleeds well, and then rubbing into it a mixture of oil and pot soot. When it heals it is black and cannot be washed off. I think it a very good thing in that land, where slavery is so common, and where the people mix with all kinds of strangers, and it has been the means of saving some of them from being carried away into slavery.

Some time before I arrived at Yarroway, a number of these Kroo boys had gone down the coast to work. One of them, named Tubbah, had been sent in a surf-boat, with some other boys, to a distant place. While on their way, they got into a quarrel, and the others threatened the life of this young man. Having none to befriend him, he jumped into the sea and swam ashore, and the people on the beach seized him and sold him to a slave-holder in the far interior.

His wife and friends at Yarroway waited anxiously for some word from him, but heard nothing, until after several years they gave up all hopes of ever seeing him again, and mourned for him as dead. His wife was given to another man.

After six years had passed, word came home that Tubbah was still alive and would soon return. His master had kept him away from the coast all these years, fearing lest he should be recognized by his Kroo mark. But at this time he had to come down for some purpose, and thought it would be safe to bring Tubbah along.

While they were on the coast an English gentleman saw him, and asked him where he came from, who he was and how he came to be there, with that mark upon his face. Tubbah told his story. The Englishman then sent for his master, and told him that he could not take a free man home with him, that Tubbah was his own Kroo boy and he knew where his home was and was going to take him to his own people. The master could make no reply, for he knew that he had en-slaved a free man.

So the Englishman kept Tubbah and sent him home to Yarroway by the next steamer. I saw him as he walked up the little road that went past our house into the town, with the people crowding around to welcome him home again. He spent several days among them. Soon he learned that his wife had been given to another man, and was living in another town twenty miles distant.

After a short time he went to see her. It is not a custom in Africa to rap on the door before entering, but, without an invitation, the visitor walks in and sits down. She and her present husband were astonished to see one whom they had believed to be dead, but Tubbah was very pleasant, and thanked the man for being kind to his wife and taking care of her in his absence. Then he turned to his wife and said, "Dwady, I have come for you. Come on and let us go home."

She was quite cross with him at first, and acted as if very much vexed at her old husband for coming after her. But in a few days she said to her second husband, "Well, I have made up my mind to go back to Tubbah, and I shall have to say, good-bye to you." So she took her son and started off to her old husband.

Tubbah, of course, was very glad and the other man, very sorry, for he had but one wife. He urged her to stay, but she said she must go. "Is it possible," he said, "my good wife is going to leave me?" and sat down and cried when she departed. I have visited Tubbah and his wife since they commenced keeping house again. They are living very happily in one of our towns.—Agnes McAlister.

HEAT-STROKES are not infrequent accidents in our large cities during the heated season, and there is no emergency in which the employment of prompt treatment is of greater advantage or easier application. Due to the action of excessive heat upon a system usually debilitated by fatigue, disease or dissipation, the subject falls insensible, with face fiery red and heavy breathing, skin excessively dry and hot and the pupils of the eye contracted to a point. Sometimes he feels a dizzy sensation, sometimes a pain in his head, like the child of the Shunammite, but more frequently the first sign of the attack is the sudden insensibility. The important point in the treatment of these cases is to relieve the burning heat of the body, and this can be done most readily, as a rule, by drenching it with cold water—the colder the better. It is not sufficient to dab the unfortunate victim with a damp handkerchief—he must be drenched, and the water should not be applied gently, for benefit is to be expected from the shock of pouring the water from some distance. Remembering that delay is dangerous, do not attempt to carry the patient home, do not go for the doctor—send, if a messenger is available—but fly for the nearest cold water. If an ice-tank is at hand, carry a basin of its contents to the patient at once, and pour it upon his head from the height of four or five feet. Then, as soon as possible, loosen his clothing, and repeat the douche of cold water. Don't carry the water in a tea-cup. If no other sufficiently capacious receptacle is available, use a hat. After thoroughly drenching the head with the cold water, the process should be continued with the rest of the body. The cold applications should be persevered with in this manner until the patient becomes conscious, or until the responsibility of the case can be transferred by the arrival of a physician. Prompt action of this kind may often save a life that would otherwise be lost.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Reminiscences.

It is now near fifty years since we received word that at about ten o'clock that night there would be due at our station, five or seven (my memory doesn't serve me clearly which) fugitives.

We mustered up all the horses we could, but were one short, but concluded that in that number there would most likely be one or more small ones, so that two might be carried by one of the pack animals. But, to our surprise, they were all large men and women, and such a valuable lot that no delay must be allowed, for it was presumed that their pursuers were already across the Ohio River. My young friend that had come to assist was well used to driving a four-horse team, and had happened to bring a span that he was used to working in the lead.

In our extremity he made the proclamation that if a wagon and wheel-horses could be furnished, he would drive them to the next station. The outfit was soon in readiness, and he mounted on the near-side wheel horse, gave the signal to the well-trained leaders by a peculiar "Get up" that put all in motion. The writer was already seated in his saddle on a trust-worthy nag, provided with an old fashioned tin lantern and tallow candles, to show the driver, as best could be done, how to cross the deep and dangerous ford, but both he and I were well used to it, and so was our team, and it was not considered necessary that the gentry who were our passengers should be informed of what they were likely to meet with. By making all the speed possible we reached the home of a Friend whose obituary may be found in the Philadelphia FRIEND, volume 33, page 320, 1860.

It was a serious question for our friends to decide. Daylight was upon us, our rig would attract attention. We must necessarily be relieved, and they had children that were too young to be let into such important matters. But they concluded that the strangers could be taken in, ere the little ones awakened, and conducted to the upper rooms, and none of the children be allowed up there.

Prudence dictated that our return should be deferred until common business hours. The wagon was placed out of view, the team put in the stable, and the morning meal partaken of, and the adventurers returned without molestation or inquiry.

Not many years since, the writer visited a son of the worthy host and hostess that took us in. The circumstance was spoken of, but he informed me that it was several years after ere he was made acquainted with that happening, being at the time one of the juniors of their household. My partner, or he that acted so nobly the part of teamster, has been many years dead, and I only am left to tell the story of those sad and by-gone days.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

I believe in a meeting for Discipline rightly gathered and rightly preserved, the united exercise of living members is that Truth may prevail over all. To a meeting thus circumstanced, I believe at times, a very precious sensibility is vouchsafed, and Friends travel in on the simplicity of filial fear and reverence; and when a nomination is depending, Friends become, at times constrained, at other times feel a tender, brotherly, sensible, freedom to mention a name, without daring to stamp it high; but in resignation, leaving it to make its way or otherwise, as the Master pleases. . . . Thus Friends feel one for another, and the bond of tender Gospel affection is preserved; and the travail of the cause is maintained and its prosperity sought beyond all other considerations. Oh! one can seem to conceive what a precious thing it is, when Friends in their meetings for Discipline can rightly bow under the solemnizing influence; not stamping anything heavy do high; but fearing in the least degree, beyond the precious cause, or contribute to disperse the precious solemnity either by speaking or by withholding. I speak not, very, very far from it, as one that has attained, but as a believer in the validity of these things; and in the favored condition of rightly gathered and rightly preserved meetings for Discipline.

WILLIAM GROVER.

FROM "OUR DUMB ANIMALS," Humble Heroism.

Negroes frequently exhibit a wonderful heroism in times of danger. An incident of this I witnessed in the spring of 1886, when a freshet in the Alabama River caused the country on each side to be overflowed by water for many miles.

The negroes on the river plantations were the greatest sufferers. Their cabins would be under water almost before they knew that danger threatened them, and hundreds of them were sometimes found huddled together on some knoll sufficiently elevated to be above the water. Here they often remained two or three days and nights without food, and exposed to a soaking rain. Fortunately the weather was not cold.

Many relief expeditions were sent out from neighboring towns to rescue them. These consisted of one or more boats, manned by expert oarsmen and swimmers and filled with oiled provisions, blankets, etc. One day the news came that the negroes on a certain plantation had sought refuge upon a corn barn, around which the water was rapidly rising, and rendering their condition exceedingly precarious. Two boats started out at once to their assistance. In one of these I went, accompanied by another white man and a negro. Just before dark we sighted the corn barn, upon which a pack of black humanity clustered like a swarm of bees. A heavy rain was now falling, and daylight beginning to fade away. Their condition became almost distressing as they sat in perfect silence waiting our approach.

But we did not appreciate their extreme peril until the boat struck against the frail log building which was in the water to the edges of the roof, and visibly shook and tottered. The poor creatures commenced to clamber hurriedly down to the boat.

"Stop!" I cried. "The women and children first."

The men obediently resumed their seats. We took in first the children and then the women, and were about to push off, telling the men we would hurry back for them as quickly as possible or send the first boat we met, when a very old woman (I noticed she was the last to get in the boat and had done so reluctantly), seized the corner of the house, and looking anxiously into my face, said:

"Marster, ain't you gwine to take my old man?"

"No, auntie," I answered, "the boat is too full now. He must wait till we come back."

The words were hardly out of my mouth, when with a sudden spring she was up and on the roof again. It shook as she scrambled on it, and took her seat by a little, withered old black man whose hand she seized and held as if she was afraid we would tear her away from him.

"Come, auntie," I cried, "this won't do. We can't leave you here, and we can't wait any longer on you."

"Go on, marster," she answered, "I thank yer, en I pray de good Lawd to fetch you all safe home; but I am gwine to stay wid my ole man. Ef Simon got to git drowneded, Lighty gwine git drowneded too. We dun bin together too long to part now." And we had to leave her, after throwing some blankets and a lot of provisions to them.

As we rowed off in the rain and night a high falsetto voice, tremulous with age, came across the waters from the crib, where we left the almost certainly doomed group in the blackness of darkness. They dared not have a light for fear of setting fire to their frail support. We stopped our oars to listen to the song. It came clear and distinct. First Lyddy's trembling voice and then a chorus of a dozen or more of the deep bass voices of the men:

"We're a cingin' to de ark,
Take us in, take us in,
Fur de watah's deep en dark,
Take us in, take us in;
De de flesh is pe'ten seek,
Take us in, take us in,
'Tis de Lawd we gwinter seek,
Take us in, take us in;
Den Lawd, hole out dy han',
Take us in, take us in,
Draw de sinnahts to de lan',
Take us in, take us in."

We could wait and listen no longer to the weird sounds, but struck our oars in the water and hurried away.

Most fortunately we came across a boat bent upon the same errand as ourselves, which went immediately to the barn and saved all of its living freight. The building had been apparently held down by their weight, for as the last one left it turned over and floated away to the gulf.

The rescuers told us afterwards that as they neared it the first sound they heard was an old woman's voice singing:

"De Lawd is gwyah'd our cry,"

Answered by the men:

"Take us in, take us in,
En He'll save us by en by,
Take us in, take us in."

A BLOODLESS ENGLISH CONQUEST.—The rate at which the English language is making conquest is a constant source of astonishment. It is not a great many years since the French language was dominant, and was exalted and entrenched in the traditions of nations by being employed exclusively as the "court" language. But French has had its day, and has gone down before the world-conquering English. These significant facts are furnished by "The Educational News."

"Three centuries ago it was employed by less than 3,000,000 people; to-day it is spoken by over 115,000,000 people in all parts of the globe, and is constantly increasing, both as to population and territory. At present it is distributed as follows: United States, 65,000,000; British Islands, 38,000,000; Canada, exclusive of the French Canadians, 4,000,000; West Indies, British Guiana, etc., 1,500,000; Australasia, 4,000,000; South Africa, India, and other colonies, 2,500,000. This includes only those whose mother tongue is English, no account being taken of the vast number who speak English, but who have another tongue. The increase of English speakers is calculated to be fully 2,000,000 annually. No other language of modern times has made such rapid progress. Three hundred years ago the 3,000,000 people who spoke English resided principally on the British Isles. Now it is spoken more or less in nearly every country on the face of the earth. It is a remarkable fact that while the English in their colonies and offshoots have absorbed millions of aliens, there is no record of any great body of English speakers having become absorbed by any other race. In the United States there are millions of Germans and other foreigners who have become merged with the English in a single generation, they losing even their family names; and the children in many cases do not understand their parent's language."

THE STANDARD CURS.—There is only one way that furnishes any prospect of overcoming consumption when once started in the system: life in the open air, with a proper amount of exercise and special lung exercise, whether by climbing mountains, deep inhalations without the assistance of an instrument to make them easy, or by the aid of such instrument. Alleviating medicines and, in certain stages, tonics may be helpful; but an economy of vital force, together with a return to primitive simplicity in living, is the essential.

While we have seen scores wasting their time with specifics, neglecting the simple principles herein stated, and dying after a succession of experiments, we have met but few men who, beginning to fight for life before they were obviously doomed to die speedily, have taken up an out-door life and systematic deep breathing, who have not entirely shaken off the incubus or indefinitely prolonged their lives. Conventionalities of society and domestic cares make it far more difficult for women to avail themselves of nature's help, except in climates where the inclemency of the weather is not a factor in human deterioration. But many of them, even where their ancestors or husbands had succumbed to the disease, have fought it off by hygienic methods.—Christian Advocate.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 19, 1896.

The principal object of THE FRIEND is the religious and literary improvement of its readers. It has generally avoided what is commonly understood by "political" discussions, although its editors have not been ignorant that sound politics and religious interests are often closely connected. Hence it has not hesitated to bear an open testimony against military measures and the oppressions of slavery, as being out of harmony with the spirit of Christianity.

At the present time an unusual degree of interest is felt in the approaching Presidential election, mainly on account of conflicting views entertained on financial questions by the two leading parties; and earnest efforts are being made to influence the public mind in favor of one or the other. It does not seem to be our place to take a public part in this contest, but we have felt a strong conviction of the pernicious character of the speeches and arguments of some engaged in this dispute, which tend to stir up feelings of animosity between different classes in society, and to teach the people that the rich and the poor are enemies to each other—that the one class are oppressors and the other oppressed—instead of their being, as is really the case, co-workers in carrying on the business of the nation.

When a poor man takes up government land, or buys at a low price unimproved lands in a thinly settled section of the country, if he has no surplus capital, he must needs borrow of one that has the means that will enable him to cultivate the soil and to maintain his family until he can raise a crop. He who in such a condition comes to his relief is not an oppressor, but a helper and a benefactor, who is justly entitled to a fair interest on the money advanced. A similar remark applies in thousands of cases to those engaged in mercantile and manufacturing concerns, where the success is dependent on the labor and intelligence of the operator and on the means of the capitalist. He is an enemy to his country who seeks to disturb the harmonious relation between these classes and to teach them to look with ill-will on each other.

We have received a communication from a friend, whose interest appears to be awakened in the neglected children in the southern part of our city who are deprived of many of the comforts and advantages which fall to the lot of those more favorably circumstanced. He mentions that the Board of Education have opened twelve of the school yards in the thickly populated districts for the use of the little children residing near them, and furnishes a trained kindergarten for each yard from nine o'clock to one, who teaches the children games and preserves order. A janitor is also employed, who is on duty all day from nine to six, and has entire control in the afternoons. The yards are each supplied with a heap of sand and buckets and shovels, and with toys, etc.

Our correspondent raises the question whether the yard attached to Friends' Meeting-house at Seventh and Orange Streets might not profitably be similarly opened for the use of those living in its vicinity?

That there are practical difficulties in the way of carrying out this scheme is evident enough, and in addition, there is the doubt which many feel as to the propriety of using our meeting-house premises for objects not included in their original purchase.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The election in Maine on the 14th instant resulted in a sweeping Republican victory. Llewellyn Powers, its candidate for Governor receiving about 50,000 pluralities. Thomas B. Reed and N. Dingley received 11,000 and 14,000 plurality respectively.

The N. Y. correspondent of the Public Ledger under date of the 14th instant, writes: "Because of the free silver agitation 13,000 children were unable to attend the public schools to-day. This may seem far-fetched, and yet the connection is real. The free silver agitation in the business depression of the country, and the business depression prevented the city from selling its bonds. This caused a lack of funds to pay the contractors who are building new schools and repairing old ones. As a consequence twelve schools were made to open to-day, most of them for the reason given, and 13,000 children were prevented from obtaining instruction. Just when the schools can be opened is problematical. When the school year, which began to-day, gets in full operation, there will be 156 school buildings, divided into 256 departments, with 4,500 teachers and about 150,000 children."

The Treasury gold reserve at the close of business on the 14th instant, stood at $12,375,289.

FOREIGN.—P. J. Tynan, the notorious "No. 1" of the Irish Invincibles, who was so frequently mentioned during the trial of the persons charged with the Phoenix Park murders, was arrested in Belgium, France, on the 13th inst. The warrant was issued in 1882. Tynan is also charged with being concerned in the manufacture of dynamite bombs for use in England.

A London dispatch to the Ledger of the 14, says, "Tonight a story is made public which lays bare one of the darkest conspiracies ever entered into by civilized beings. The actual arrests of Tynan in Boulogne, Bell in Glasgow and Haines and Kearney in Antwerp, merely raises the curtain on the first act of the startling drama of attempted wholesale murder. It can be stated positively that the police are already in possession of information showing that the plans of the conspirators included the murder of Queen Victoria and the Czar at Balmoral, and the destruction of the public buildings at London, Paris and Liverpool."

"A new branch of jurisprudence," says the London Telegraph, "is arising out of the bicycle boom, dealing with collisions of velocipedists between themselves and animals or other creatures." It is reported that the Czar at Balmoral, and the destruction of the public buildings at London, Paris and Liverpool."

An Athens dispatch says that, in consequence of the receipt of a pre-emptory British note, the Sultan of Turkey has issued an irade ordering that the expulsion of Armenians from Constantinople be stopped.

According to a Constantinople dispatch of the 11th inst., a Russian factory was discovered by the police the previous day located underneath the Armenian Church, near the Kassin Pasha Cemetery. From the factory a long tunnel had been excavated in the direction of the Government powder magazine the intention obviously having been to undermine the magazine and blow it up.

Argentina means to get ahead of the European Powers in taking possession of the South Shetland Islands, on the edge of the Antarctic Continent. An expedition will be sent out for the purpose in Twelfth Month next. The islands may possibly be of some use as a sealing and whaling station.

1854.—Eleventh Mo. 18th.—Last Third-day as Quarterly Meeting at Concord. John W. Atum first spoke: "Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death." We must come unto our Saviour by faith and be willing to say, "Here am I, do unto me as seemest thee good; form and fashion according to thy will." Dear H. Warner said, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him," addressing a mind that felt the weight of sins and transgressions, as I think could, resting upon them, saying, "My sins are more than I can number," but leading him to look to the Saviour: "Though your sins are as scarlet they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be white as wool." Then dear Abigail Williams said, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." Let none do anything to hinder his great work, which is begun in the hearts of these little ones. The language in my ear was, "go and sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee," and how, oh, my soul, hast thou kept thyself since, unspotted? No, surely I have sinned, but I mean to try.

Eleventh Month 26th.—Thou, oh, Heavenly Father, hast begun the work in my heart, and so carry it on. Be pleased to do it, through the merits of thy dear Son; be pleased to enable me sometimes to sing on the banks of deliverance from all my sins; enable me to take up my daily cross. Oh! be pleased to hear dear H. Gibbons' prayer offered to-day and answer it. Be pleased to grant strength and lead me to the Saviour, I beseech of thee, most merciful Heavenly Father.

Twelfth Month 3rd.—Last Fourth-day was Monthly Meeting at Birmingham. Walked part of the way. First meeting silent; in the last dear Hannah Gibbons quoted the text: "Then they that feared the Lord spoke often one to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard it, and a book of remembrance was written before him for those that feared the Lord and thought upon his name," desiring her young friends might be of those who loved to think upon his name. Then dear Mary Kite spoke of the death of M. Parke, quoting the passage, "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh."

17th.—Was at our meeting and spoke, "If in this world only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." We must be obedient to the intouching voice in order to become fit for a better state of existence. Be born again, regenerated. I felt I was indeed yet a child of wrath instead of a child of God. Oh! most merciful Saviour, how long shall I offend against my God. Oh! strengthen me to give up. I almost despair of ever doing it. Be-pleased to forgive my past disobedience, and strengthen me this week to live more in the cross.

31st.—This is the last day of the old year, and sad indeed it feels to think I have made so little progress in the Christian's highway. Oh, that the following year may be marked with greater dedication to the best and most merciful of Masters. He is worthy; He is so merciful and forgiving to poor sinful me. Have I lived any better this past week. I think a little more giving up; for this little I thank thee, Heavenly Father, and wilt thou be pleased, for the sake of thy dear Son, to grant me strength to resist temptation the coming week. We had a silent meeting to-day, but on Fourth-day was our Monthly Meeting; Samuel Cope and Elizabeth and Hannah Warner were there. H. W. spoke first, encouraging to trust and rely upon our Saviour; then S. C. quoted "Have said to yourselves, and be at peace one with another. Have his grace to rule in us. It was so good; all things are possible with God. In the second meeting, H. Warner again spoke to the young, desiring that some in an especial manner might be willing to appear as fools in the eyes of the world.

1855.—First Month 14th.—The fruits of the spirit are love, joy, peace, long suffering, meekness, gentleness, temperance; now in which of these am I perfect? None. I must try more to submit to the cross of Christ, which will make me humble; then I can feel joy and peace; then my heart will not have cross feelings to contend with but love and kindness to all. Am I as patient and long suffering as I should be, in school. Oh that I could be faithful there. I try, but I know I cannot do as much good as if I did more entirely live under the cross, under the quickening influence of the Good Spirit. One week ago last Fifth-day, Samuel Bettle, Jr., was at our meeting and spoke, commencing with "Come and see a man who told me all things that ever I did," recommending us to wait solemnly before the Lord, particularly when humbled under a sense of our manifold transgressions; it was through his continual mercy that we were enabled to see our sins. He, by his spirit, sets them in the light before us, and knows when we have only strength to say, "God be merciful to me, a sinner."

To-day — commenced with "I trembled with him to revive the salutary caution, "A croe with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way with him, lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison," tating it first in a worldly view, seeing how many estates were wasted or want of a little acknowledgment on the part of one, a little owning of a fault; then in a spiritual sense, saying that though our Saviour might not be called an adversary, yet as long as we remained in a state of sin, He was more so to us. We should lamade ourselves and rebuked by our sins to Him, first He might be satisfied in our Heavenly Father, and we might have peace and union with Him. For God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself. The day of visitation had long been extended to some of us, but we must not presume upon his mercy, we know not how long our time here might be. Be humble enough to confess our sins to Him, and ask for forgiveness and give diligence to make our calling and election sure. That when called to render up our accounts we may do it "with joy and not with grief."

Second Month 4th.—Two weeks ago last Fifth-day, dear friend Gibbons spoke to the comforting of some conflicting minds. "He never said to the wrestling seed of Jacob, seek my face in vain." Last Fourth-day was our Monthly Meeting at Birmingham. A. Williams and W. Scattergood were there. First William spoke very excellently, I thought. His mind was often bowed in mourning for the trials and besetments of our poor Society, and he doubted not, there were many present who were often bowed down in mourning over their own and the Church's deficiencies. These he would encourage, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." Some were tried with a sense of desertion of the Holy Spirit, others were disappointed in their pursuits in life, but it was all for our good to bring us low, that we might tell of his merciful dealings to others. Closing with, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." This last is so sweet to think of. Abby commenced with, "Arise and eat, because the journey is too great for thee." Though we might have much trouble, even floods of affliction, yet we must be encouraged.

18th.—Last First-day dear aunt Mary Kite came up here to see Anne with N. K's wife, also A. and S. Sharpless. In a little quiet sitting she spoke so kindly to Anne, and then a few words to poor undervalving me, to follow in the way east up before me, looking unto Jesus the Author and Finisher of the soul's salvation. Oh! if I only could deny myself.

Last Third-day was our Quarterly Meeting; so good to me. First Wm. Kite spoke, more lengthy than usual, speaking of the prodigal son; next William Scattergood, much in the same way very feelingly. Some were enabled to see the beauty of holiness, and earnestly desired peace and happiness, but the hard conflicts ahead almost caused them to dread to commence in the narrow way. Jesus will strengthen and help if we come unto Him. In the last meeting dear A. Williams said, "Except your younger brother be with you, ye shall not see my face," referring it to the young people, they were keeping back something. "Bring all the tithes into the store-house, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it." Oh, that I could have the Lord's blessing; a covering of his Spirit.

To-day — spoke so kindly. Oh! if I were only one of the sincere, seeking ones, that I could take encouragement, and believe that I shall ever be safe from my sins. "We must believe and be baptized," he baptized with fire. "Whose fan is in hand," etc. He would change our sinful hearts, not sprinkling with water, but cleansing the act-ions. "Not the putting away the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God." If ye then being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your Heavenly Father give his Holy Spirit to them that ask Him. By submitting to this baptism, we may be cleansed, we can be enabled to feel joy and peace; we can sing on the banks of deliverance. Be pleased, Heavenly Father, for the sake of Jesus, thy precious Son, to strengthen me to resist temptation. "Looking unto Jesus, the Author and Finisher of the saint's faith."

25th. — spoke. It is expressly said in Holy Writ, "The soul that sins shall be cut off, the wages of sin is death," cut off from spiritual communion with God. Our first parents sinned and were driven out of the garden, and cherubims and a flaming sword kept the way, so that they could not enter, and through them we all have a propensity to sin; but God loved the world so much that He sent his Son, and if we follow his teachings, this bar or hindrance to spiritual communion, the flaming sword, and the cherubims will be removed, and we can enjoy eating of the tree of life, for it is said, "Him that overcometh shall have a right to the tree of life." If we do not follow the prescription of the Great Physician we must not expect to be cured of our spiritual maladies. I will try to follow Him with a dedicated heart.

Third Month 18th. — Last Fifth-day dear H. G. supplicated so kindly for us, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth our souls after thee, oh God." Then for the young, that He would enable them, with Holy magnanimity to say, "Be thou the potter and we the clay; form and fashion us according to thy will, that so there may be testimony bearers raised up in this place."

To-day, dear — said, "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but cannot tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth." So is every one that is born of the Spirit. The Christian has seasons of spiritual desertion. Our Saviour cried out on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" The messenger whom ye seek shall suddenly come into his Holy temple, even the messenger of the covenant of peace whom your souls delight in. "I was afraid this was not for me, but if I can only walk free from sin how glad I shall be."

A REMARKABLE SEA-WEED.—One of the most remarkable sea-weeds is the Nereocystis, the stem of which occasionally attains a length of three hundred feet, though extremely slender, even at the top, where it is surmounted by a large floating bladder, six or seven feet in length, that affords a favorite resting-place to the sea-otter. This plant is found on the north-west coast of America and the opposite shores of Asia. The filiform stem, which is about as thick as pack-thread, suddenly swells above, when two or three feet long, into a globe bladder, from the top of which springs a tuft of germinate leaves, mostly rising on five petioles. As the plant grows older, the stem increases enormously in length, but only slightly in thickness. The globe bladder swells into a turnip-shaped or retort-like cylinder six feet long and four feet six inches or more in diameter in the widest part, the lower extremity gradually passing into the stem. The leaves, which at first were marked with a few faint nerves, split in the direction of the latter, cover a wide space by their entangled mass, and attain a length of thirty feet or more. When the plant grows in any quantity it forms large floating islands, and the surface of the sea becomes impassable to boats. The stem, when dry, is employed by the Aleutians for fishing-lines, some of which have a length of forty or more fathoms. The large bladders are used by the same people as syphons for jumping water out of their boats.—Fishing Gazette.

Radnor Monthly Meeting.

In a number of cases mention is made of different members of the meeting bringing to it for record, accounts of their birth-places and conviction and other remarkable passages of their lives. This also extended to their children, servants and families, and was done in accordance with the advice of the Preparative Meeting.

Frequent references are made to repairing the meeting-house at Merion. In the Twelfth Month, 1763, mention is made of a subscription "towards building the addition to the meeting-house," and there are a number of minutes referring to the digging of stone "to build a meeting-house."

In connection with Merion meeting-house, it seems suitable here to refer to the existence of a document preserved in the Record Room of Friends' Library, which has an important bearing upon the date at which the present building was erected, or at least when a very extensive addition was made to it, if it was not all erected at one time. This is a paper which appears to be the original accounts kept by John Roberts of subscriptions toward the building and sums paid for workman-hip and materials. The earliest date is 1742-43, and the latest Fourth Month 10th, 1747. The document is in a dilapidated condition, having four large holes burnt in it and some of the edges torn. This makes it impossible to obtain from it all the information it originally contained, but the most important points can be clearly made out.

On Sixth Month 6th, 1743, the contributions toward the construction of the building amounted to £179 15s. of which £36 19s. 7d. was unpaid. The different contributions are given in detail. Thus Haverford Meeting gave £16 2s.; Robert Evan, 49 10s.; Robert David, £4 4s.; John Roberts, £5. There is one subscription of £9 18s. and another of £17 8s., but the names of the donors are burnt out, and there are many subscriptions of smaller sums. The payments for construction include £47 10s. 7d. to John Knowles for carpenter work, £27 8s. 10d. to Richard Jones for sawing, £11 16s. 2d. for nails, £25 10s. 2d. to Edward Rees for sundries, 14s.

8d. for hinges, and many other items of various amounts.

We now return to the minutes of the Month Meeting. In the Eighth Month, 1743, the following minute appears: "Merion Friends having proposed to have some money that was formerly lent to Rees Howell, which is £5, of currency. Four pounds thereof belonged to Merion Friends, Also £10 that was lent to Joseph Evans, which is now at interest. This meeting agrees that Merion Friends shall have money lent to Rees Howell and Joseph Evan towards finishing their meeting-house."

The age of the ancient meeting-house at Merion has been the subject of much inquiry. It is in one end a stone placed there in 1828, o which is the date 1695. It is possible a part of the building may have been erected as early as that, but the probabilities are that it was built in two sections, one of them in 1703 and the other about 1713.

In 1717 a curious case came before the Month Meeting in relation to proposal of marriage b Hugh Eran and Lowrey Loyd, which was objected to by some Friends, on the ground of being "of too near affinity." The relationship given was "a deceased wife's mother's sister daughter." In other words, a deceased wife's first cousin. The objection was certainly far fetched. It is perhaps needless to add that although the case went to the Quarterly Meeting, the marriage was allowed.

A movement toward building a new meeting house at Radnor is interestingly referred to in the following minute of the Monthly Meeting held tenth of Eighth Month, 1717: "A letter from our friend Benjamin Holme to this meeting, recommending to their consideration the stirring up of Friends in the building of their meeting-house at Radnor, and with desire that we should be concerned for the prosperity of Truth, was read in this meeting and approved. Likewise, this meeting, pursuant to Radnor Friends' desires, acquiesce with them in building a new meeting-house, and this meeting appoints David Morris [and others] to assist in the contrivance of the building thereof."

The month following the subject is further referred to. "Some of the friends of those appointed to assist Radnor Friends in the contrivance of a new meeting-house there, give account that they have accordingly met and given them their thoughts as to the bigness and form thereof, to which Radnor Friends there present seemed generally to agree with. This meeting-house was partially constructed in the Ninth Month, 1718, but the work appeared to have lagged, for it was not entirely finished as late as the Fourth Month, 1721, or at least not paid for, as a committee was then appointed to obtain contributions for the work. Some indeliberate still remained as late as the Fifth Month, 1723.

At the Month Meeting in the Ninth Month 1717, a minute was adopted indicating that the solemnization of marriages at private houses was a common occurrence, and that it was necessary to have some regulations relative thereto. It says, "Pursuant to a certain advice of the Yearly Meeting, it is by this meeting reminded and advised that no marriages be accomplished in any other place than at the meeting-house without first letting the Monthly Meeting where in the parties have their liberty of proceeding, know thereof, and such to do according to their order, and not otherwise. That all inconvenience at any time arising from such marriage performed in private houses may be avoided.

The following interesting minute occurs under date of fourteenth of Fifth Month, 1720. Whereas, it having been heretofore signified to the respective Monthly Meetings of Averford and Gwynedd that our deceased friend, Ellis Pugh, in the time of his long sickness, had composed divers religious poems contained in a few sheets accommodated to the understanding of illiterate, mean people, which we earnestly desired might be published in the Irish tongue and sent to his native country, Friends might see service. And twelve friends of each meeting having been appointed peruse and consider the contents of the said sheets, did report their unity and satisfaction therewith. Therefore, they are recommended your consideration, earnestly requesting that the same may be printed, with what explication you may think fit."

An evidence of the struggle with the difficulties in marriage arrangements which has marked many periods of the Society's history is found in a minute of the Fifth Month, 1722, when the representatives to the Quarterly Meeting were instructed to report that the meeting was "under a concern that our discipline may be kept," and that they propose to the said meeting whether it is necessary to disown such persons as go to the priest to marry, or only advise them, and that their going out to marry is sufficient to declare them out of unity."

It would appear that it was the practice in its Monthly Meeting to send pecuniary aid to their meetings for building meeting-houses, but we have references about this time, to contributions being given toward such buildings at Shrewsbury and Horsham.

Some difficulties appear to have existed in the Monthly Meeting in 1726, as the representatives to the Quarterly Meeting were instructed to report "That things amongst us is not as well as we could desire, but a remnant hopes to obtain the victory." The character of these difficulties is not mentioned, but they probably were due to some dispute which had occurred between two of its members, in which the Monthly Meeting interfered. It ultimately reached the Quarterly Meeting, which decided that it was of a case in which the former meeting had any right to meddle.

In the Eleventh Month, 1729, we have the following minute, "Richard Harrison's certificate from the Monthly Meeting of Friends on the Cliffs in Maryland, indorsed by the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia, the twenty-eighth of Ninth Month last" [was received]. As has heretofore been stated, Richard Harrison had, in 1719, purchased Rowland Ellis' plantation in Merion, and he must have been a long time resident there when his certificate was received. He married Hannah Norris, a daughter of Isaac Norris, and grand-daughter of Governor Lloyd. Born in Maryland, in the midst of an tobacco-raising country, he had been an extensive planter there, owning many slaves. Upon his removal to Pennsylvania, he brought his slaves with him, and resumed the cultivation of tobacco, which was sent to the Philadelphia market in hogsheads. Through the connection of an axle was placed, and to the projecting ends shafts were attached, and thus the hogsheads themselves took the place of wheels. This primitive method of transportation is said still to be in use in some parts of Maryland.

Richard Harrison's wife was a minister. She brought her certificate to Radnor Monthly Meeting in the Eleventh Month, 1733. Richard died in 1747. One of his daughters married Charles Thomson, Secretary of the Continental Congress.

Richard Harrison, soon after his removal to Merion, established a family burying-ground on his plantation, and erected a school-house adjoining. The burial-ground known as Harrison Family Cemetery still exists. It is enclosed with a stone wall. The school-house disappeared many years since, though its foundation can still be traced. This interesting spot, surrounded by aged forest trees, is about half a mile from Bryn Mawr Station, on the Pennsylvania Railroad.

The following minute appears under date of Eleventh Month 14th, 1730. "It is proposed, on behalf of Richard Harrison and some other Friends, that they have liberty to keep a meeting on the First days, for this winter season, at the said Richard's School-house, which this meeting allows them until the next spring Yearly Meeting." Further permission for this meeting was subsequently given, and in the First Month, 1732, the meeting took additional action, which is thus recorded, "Richard Harrison and some other Friends signified to this meeting in writing that the meeting appointed last Seventh Month to be kept at the said Richard Harrison's school-house, was duly and religiously kept, and further requesting to be admitted to keep an afternoon meeting in the said place, from the spring meeting in this month until the Yearly Meeting in the Seventh Month next, which is allowed of and to begin at four o'clock."

As late as 1759, a committee was appointed to make inquiry into the circumstances of the meeting at Harrison's. This committee reported that some Friends dissent, and that the widow Harrison seemed desirous to have it continued. This was granted, and the meeting was thereafter held at four o'clock in the afternoon. The Harrison family, however, removed from the neighborhood soon afterwards, and the meeting was finally discontinued.

In the Eleventh and Twelfth Month, 1730, committees were appointed to meet with the Valley Friends, "in order to pitch upon a convenient place to build a meeting-house," and in the First Month following it was decided "to build a meeting-house for religious worship at the graveyard near Lewis Walker, deceased, which was left by the said Lewis, by his last will, for that purpose."

I have embraced in this paper the most interesting circumstances disclosed in the early minutes of the meetings within the limits of Radnor Monthly Meeting, adding some facts from other sources. After about 1730, the minutes become more common place, and do not furnish incidents of much historical interest.

A SEVERE BUT JUST SENTENCE.—There seems to be a disposition on the part of the officials in charge to tone up the morality of the marine service of the government. Some time ago, the captain of one of the revenue cutters was charged with drunkenness by his brother officers and placed on trial. The report of the Trial Board, which has just been made known, recommends that the offending officer, who has been in the service thirty years, "be dropped to the foot of the list of captains of the revenue cutter service, and that he retain that place hereafter, he be suspended from rank and reprimanded by the reading of this order on board all vessels of the revenue cutter service by the commanding officer of each at a muster of the commissioned officers, and admonished that, if again found guilty of the excessive use of intoxicants during the term of his sentence or thereafter, whether afloat or ashore, he will be summarily dismissed from the service.

FROM "THE ASSAULTS UPON FAITH."

Our religious principles are not based on George Fox, though he expounded them, nor on Robert Barclay, though he systematized them, and defended them, but on Jesus Christ our Lord, and on his inspired Apostles, whose teaching and testimony are left for our instruction and guidance in the New Testament. We find ourselves separatists, not because we wish to dissociate or to be singular, but because we find the great bulk of professing Christians have built up a religious system by gradual accretions in the third, fourth and fifth centuries of our era and later on, which is a strange mixture of the old dispensation and the new dispensation, of Christianity and Judaism. While nominally the foundation is Christ, the expounders of his teaching are "the early fathers," rather than the Apostles. And in this way and by this means, we are presented with a profession of Christianity which is not the Christianity of the New Testament which we read and accept, in its purity and simplicity, but a sacerdotal system, the origin and defence of which must be looked for in the writings of the so-called "fathers." We have, therefore, in the Christian Church the contradiction of white-robed priests, professing to dispense spiritual gifts, acting as mediators between God and man, and in these capacities receiving confessions and pronouncing absolutions. We have outward ordinances and dead formalisms. And though the more enlightened of our fellow-Christians reject much of this mixture of Judaism and Christianity, they are mostly entangled with ordinances and with the dictum of Church councils, or prelates, that war and oaths are lawful for the Christian, though contrary to the spirit and the teaching of Christ and his Apostles. Making "the word of God of none effect through their traditions."

"We as a religious people, are only nicknamed Quakers. We might correctly be called 'New Covenanters.' Aiming to live under, and in genuine accordance with, the spirit of that new dispensation, to supersede the old, which our Saviour called the kingdom of God, the kingdom of righteousness and peace, which He promised should come, and which did come, at the day of Pentecost, by the endowment of power from on high. As Friends, there is no mystery about our religious profession. George Fox brought in nothing new, he pretended to nothing new, but under the enlightening power of the Holy Spirit, his mind swept away the accumulated rubbish that had gathered and been heaped on spiritual religion, and he went straight back to the bed-rock of a living Christianity divested of priestly pretensions, of typical rites and of ceremonies, of man-made inventions and man-made doctrines. He and the early Friends would have none of them. They knew where they came from, and by whom they were conceived and promulgated. And they knew for what end—to bring the so-called "holy" into spiritual bondage.

"The fundamental principle of all true religion is that 'God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth'—in reality. The spirit of a man needs as the all-essential thing, union with, and communion with, the Spirit of his God and Father, through Christ, the way. Types-symbolic performances and outward ordinances are beside the mark. They are out of court. A man may attend to, or perform all such things and gain nothing. The Holy Spirit of God, through Christ, the one only Mediator, operates on the spirit of man, and he is changed, saved, restored to his Father's house, to the enjoyment of his Father's love. This is spiritual religion, this is genuine Christianity. And herein is all the mystery there is in the religion of the Friends."

Lights and Shadows of Port Royal.

A few miles westward from the city of Paris "on the road to Chevrense," as the chronicles say, lies a certain valley, in which two centuries ago occurred some of the most interesting events in the annals of the Church. It is a spot celebrated in religious history as having been the earthly "zion" of a people whose faith is compared to "a fountain of sweet waters in the midst of a brackish sea," whose memory is declared to be "in benediction," and whose work is "everlasting remembrance." This place was once known as Port Royal; and its monastic community of both men and women obtained, during the seventeenth century, a fame throughout France, not only for purity of life and devotion to religion, but for a fearless and steadfast adherence to the rights of conscience when those rights were invaded by the unscrupulous tyranny of the Jesuits and of the Romish See. So conspicuous was this perseverance among the Port Royal women, that it obtained for them from Péréfixe, the persecuting Archbishop of Paris, the ejaculation—"Pure as angels, and proud as devils!"

As a preliminary to the further study of Port Royal, its history may be briefly outlined as follows: The monastery was founded early in the thirteenth century by Mathilde de Garlande (wife of a crusader of the house of Montmorency), aided by her kinsman, the Bishop of Paris. The community of women soon established there, belonged to the Cistercian order, and followed the "rule" of St. Bernard. The name of Port Royal was probably derived from Porrois, which means a low, marshy, brambly ground; and such appears to have been the place chosen for the location of this monastery.

There seems to be little in its history to claim our time and interest before the early part of the seventeenth century, when the justly famed and honorable abbess, Angélique Arnauld, began her vigorous and effective reform there. We say "reform" because by that time Port Royal, in common with other monasteries in France, had not only relaxed its primitive simplicity and austerity, but had become positively worldly though in a less reprehensible manner and degree than some others. Under the wise and conscientious government of Angélique Arnauld Port Royal became the home of a pious and devoted band, diligently occupied with works of benevolence and usefulness, and with the practice of their religious ceremonies. A company of men, similarly engaged, occupied (during part of the time) a farm-house and some other buildings near by; but the two companies had little communication with each other, except by letters, some of which are amongst the most beautiful specimens of religious literature.

About the middle of the seventeenth century Port Royal became the object of persecution on a count of its sympathy with Cornelius Jansen, whose works had been pronounced heretical. This persecution continued at intervals throughout that century and until the year 1709, when the community was finally dispersed. A few years later the buildings were torn down and the very graveyard desecrated, to satisfy the fury of Jesuitic hatred and revenge.

Having this hasty sketch before us, it now remains to look more into the details of the history, and to glance somewhat at the remarkable characters known as the Port Royalists. It need be said by some one that he who knew not Port Royal, knew not humanity; but in these latter days, when the world is over-full of literature, and when books of every description are constantly before our eyes, it is small wonder that the attention of young students and readers is not directed to this part of human history in particular, and that Port Royal is somewhat out of fashion. It formed a part of the culture of an earlier generation; yet even young readers can hardly have failed to become acquainted with the names of Pascal, the mathematician and scientist; Racine, the poet, dramatist and courtier; the Duchesse de Longueville perhaps, and others of the time of Louis XIII and Louis XIV, who figure more or less frequently in the annals of Port Royal. Of equal fame at that time was the family of Arnauld, of whom no less than eighteen were connected with the Port Royal houses, and whose gifts of heart and mind were among the chief ornaments of that illustrious community. Those eighteen were composed of Angélique and five of her sisters (one of whom was M<sup>me</sup>. Le Maitre, a widow), her two brothers D'Andilly and Antoine, and her mother also after she became a widow; six daughters of D'Andilly, and the three sons of M<sup>me</sup>. Le Maitre. These last were known as "Le Maitre the orator, De Sericourt the soldier, and De Sacy the priest." De Sacy was for years the confessor and director of Port Royal, and was known for his translation of the Scriptures. There were also one or two other persons connected with the family and of a later generation, who joined the Port Royalists.

In those days two avenues were open to women of some social rank in France—marriage and the convent. If a man had more daughters than he could comfortably endow with a marriage portion, some way of disposal other than marriage must be found for part of the number, and this way—as in the case of Angélique and her sister Agnes—was found in the monastic life. To Agnes, who had a contemplative and rather mystically disposed mind, this imposition brought less hardship; but Angélique, with her strong, decisive, rational character, would have fled in early life from her honors and her obligations, had not integrity and high moral sense prevailed over the choice of nature.

Some of her ancestors and near relatives were noted advocates and orators of that period, and of good rank also as citizens, though not above intrigues, as appears by the facts that "forged certificates" concerning the age of Angélique were sent to Rome by her maternal grandfather (and probably with the knowledge and assistance of her father in order to secure for her the government of Port Royal, while Agnes was placed in charge of St. Cyr. At this so-called "pious fraud," we are told, "the court of France was much amused, and the court of Rome not greatly shocked." When Angélique had grown to womanhood, the duplicity of this dealing (albeit she had had no part in it) troubled her sensitive mind, and she realized that under the constitution of the Cistercian order she was not entitled to the honors thus thrust upon her. At length, to the relief of her conscience she succeeded (though not until near 1630) in making the office of abbess subject to triennial elections. By the choice of the sisterhood Angélique was at different times placed in that position, and whether nominally holding it or not, she was (with a single painful exception yet to be explained) always the guiding spirit, the recognized leader and head of the house. Hers was a nature that ruled from the simple fact of superiority in intellect, tact and judgment; to which were added integrity, humility, generosity, tenderness, and unbounded religious faith. Her biographers and all the historians of Port Royal recognize her breadth and depth of character, and her "largeness of heart," as Guizot says; so that there has come down to us one noted and notable saying of Angélique Arnauld—"I am of the order of all the saints and all the saints are of my order." What generosity of spirit, what understanding of fellowship, are set forth in these, "I am of the order of all the saints, and all the saints are of my order!" And what experience of Christian love in the words that follow: "All good men and good women are my brother and sisters, and it is my highest pleasure to love and serve them." How far this sentiment would have carried her beyond the pale of the Romish church, or whether at all, one cannot say; for we know the teaching of Rome on that subject is to the last degree uncharitable. But we may believe with Frances Martin that Angélique Arnauld "was of the order of all the saints," whether or not she might have acknowledged in Barclay and Penington what they perhaps would have felt and owned in her.

The monastic system was probably never more favorably represented than at Port Royal and yet one cannot read its history, nor pursue the life of the instrument of its reform, without a sense of the fruitfulness of that system. The impulses of the heart must be stayed; the natural gifts and affections mortified; all earthly pleasures despised; yet we have the satisfaction of beholding many times in the lives of the Port Royalists a practical contradiction of their theory, for their treatment of one another was marked by strong and noticeable affection. Whoever reads those records—even the friend and lover of Port Royal—will find his admiration and sympathy having high and low tides. When we read their encouraging and spiritual counsels to one another, and their vigorous appeals in defense of their consciences; when we contemplate their industry and self-sacrifice their perseverance and uprightness, then it is high tide. But when we read of their petty rules and humiliations; when we find that they saluted the image of the "Blessed Virgin" that the mother of the Arnaulds must reverence her daughters as abbesses; that M<sup>me</sup>. Le Maitre went to confession to her own son that there were solemn ceremonies and a procession in honor of the "Holy Thorn," and ever a miracle imputed to its virtue—then indeed it is low tide. But their vision, it seems to me, though the figure may not be an original one, was as when one looks through the fogs or mist of the morning. Some things are wholly obscured; some are feebly discerned, but here and there shining a rift in the clouds, is the whole shining beauty of the landscape.

In those days, it need scarcely be remarked the general influences were unfavorable to religious growth. Extravagance and profligacy abounded in royal circles; pride, presumptuous and worldly ambition among ecclesiastics; if religion in disguise throughout the church: so hat near the close of her eventful, earnest life, the mother Angelique exclaimed, "I can scarcely bear myself or others. There is none that seeketh after God." In this, however, Juliet saw she was unjust to her age and to her friends.

We have seen that Angelique entered upon her life-work unwillingly. She had come to her office while yet a child, and there were many longings after the liberty of the outside world, up to the period of her conversion, which began when she was about seventeen years of age. Her awakening came in part by the preaching of Father Basil, a Capuchin friar, who not long afterwards became a Protestant, but not until after he had stimulated and intensified Angelique's desire for monastic reform, and hence increased those tendencies to austerity of life, in which she for a time indulged. When her judgment became more mature, however, she not only relinquished some of those asceticities herself, but discouraged them in others; agreeing with St. Cyrán that to attempt great things in that line is no mark of humility. Concerning retirement from the world she says: "It is a pity to force the fruits of the Spirit by those unnatural, painful processes. But it is a greater pity still not to cultivate the fruits of the Spirit at all, and in our liberty to forget the very object of that liberty."

Extract from Yearly Meeting Minutes of 1805.
"The Yearly Meeting in 1701, under a weighty concern respecting the ministry, agreed that there be a meeting of ministering Friends, men and women, to be held in Philadelphia weekly on Seventh-day about noon, and Quarterly in the respective counties, at such time and place as Friends immediately concerned may conclude on."

"In 1714, on a proposal from two of the Quarters concerning the appointment of Elders, they further agreed 'that the Quarterly Meetings do recommend to each Monthly Meeting within their respective limits, that they choose two or more Friends out of each Monthly Meeting, where meetings of ministers are or shall be held, to sit with the ministers in their meetings; taking care that the Friends chosen for that service be prudent, solid Friends,' etc.

From the year 1721, it appears that the Select Meetings are styled Meetings of Ministers and Elders, and it is remarked on the minutes that "Friends found it expedient and necessary to add a competent number of judicious and faithful elders, men and women, to sit as assistants with ministers in their Select Meetings, who might better advise, caution and admonish ministers than each other."

And in 1740, the Yearly Meeting, in order to remove any doubt respecting the intention of the minute of 1714, about the appointment of elders to sit with ministers in their meetings, declares it in their opinion that it ought to be considered to extend to the appointment of prudent, solid women Friends to that service, as well as of men.

[Taken from a report to the Yearly Meeting on the continuance of the Second-day morning Meeting of Ministers and Elders].

In 1806, it was concluded to discontinue the Second-day morning meeting.

In 1693, in Ireland, it was desired that the elders and such as were thought fit by the Province or other meetings to be concerned, may examine among themselves how far they are qualified for that service, and whether they are clear and exemplary in themselves, and have a right concern on their spirits for the service and propagation of the blessed Truth.

North Carolina Yearly Meeting, 1896.

"Stand in awe and sin not, commune with your own heart and be still."

North Carolina Representative Meeting was held at High Point, on Thursday, the fourth of Eighth Month, at eleven A. M. After a time of quiet, the Clerk, F. S. Blair, opened the meeting and read the minutes since last Year. A plan for a new house to be built convenient to the meeting-house was submitted, to consist of three rooms for the use of committees during the Yearly Meeting, the cost to be less than two hundred dollars. One of the committee offered to furnish one room. It was suggested afterwards that the money might be had from the Charleston Fund.

At three P. M. the meeting of ministry and oversight assembled, and after several addresses and prayers the name of L. L. Hobbs was proposed to act as Clerk, the proper one being absent, which being united with, the business proceeded, and Friends who had minutes handed them in, amongst them there was one for A. Hussey, Ohio, to which objection being made because he had gone back to the ordinances, three Friends were appointed to confer with him, and they reported that he withdrew his minute, after which he stood up and read from the Bible some texts on persecution, evidently not bearing on the subject matter at all of which he was told in open meeting. He also continued to read the Bible and speak in meetings as if in unity with us. At an adjourned sitting of this meeting the names of two women Friends were proposed as Clerk and united with. The condition of Rich Square Monthly Meeting was irregularly entered on, and the name and doings of a prominent minister there spoken about, and a proposal made for a Committee to be appointed to visit the meeting, but a Friend from Tennessee brought up the result of such a proceeding in that Quarter years ago, resulting in the loss of a Quarterly Meeting and five hundred to six hundred members. Several other Friends objected, so the complaint fell through, and Friends concluded to issue a minute of advice, which can be seen in the printed minutes.

Eighth Month 5th at ten A. M., the Yearly Meeting commenced in joint session, credentials were read from visiting ministers and elders present, and one for an overseer from south of England. The Clerk proposed that it be left to the Representatives to appoint one man and one woman Friend from each Quarter to act as a standing committee to submit the names of Friends for appointments as required by the Yearly Meeting, which being united with, was carried out, and proved satisfactory, it gives time to consider names which is not afforded in the open meeting. The London General Epistle was read, and a few others, addressed to men and women jointly. At three P. M. Meeting for Worship, and it may be remarked of this and the other meetings held during the Yearly Meeting, for worship and devotion, that the general character did not come up to the long established and proved practice of gathering in silence to wait on the Lord. The singing of hymns by many in the body of the meeting, joined in by and sometimes called for by some in the minister's gallery, the reading and preaching from the open Bible with notes, the calling on the audience to hold up hands if they desired to be saved, and pressing on those present to stand up in response to queries about their condition, and to come towards the gallery called altar or minister's bench, there to kneel, repeat words as bidden, or be prayed for by others who leave their seats and put their hands on them, in different parts of the house, causes quite a commotion. It looks as if ministers who do so are not willing to leave the results of their labor to God, but want and are eager for apparent returns. Few have courage to keep seated when told by man to rise, and fewer still the intrepidity and true Christian principle to stand up and speak at the call for service, if it be to swim against the current. Conscience is a jewel.

The Discipline of Indiana Yearly Meeting, published in 1856, to which admission was made in one of our meetings, reads thus: "Our ministers, even those who have an acknowledged gift, cannot engage beforehand to preach on any particular subject, nor to present at all unless they feel the power and help of the Holy Spirit moving them thereto at the time, and then they should speak as if by the Spirit, giving them utterance. Whatsoever good thing is given forth of the good word of life is a free gift of the Spirit, should be freely dispensed to the people, hence our ministers can receive no payment or salary for their ministerial services. Friends were reminded of the Apostle's charge to provide things honest in the sight of all men, and that those who did not had defiled the faith, etc. Also, that when we departed from a waiting worship and a waiting ministry, we ought look for the handwriting on the wall. How can we reconcile the high and holy principles of direct Divine inspirations and teaching which we profess, with the practice of substituting hymns and tunes learned beforehand, to be reproduced whenever called for by man, endeavoring to control our assemblies, to be construed as worship. Our President is the Lord Jesus, to whom every knee must bow whether in mercy or in judgment."

On the sixth, the Yearly Meeting again assembled at ten A. M. in joint session. One of the Representatives reported the names agreed on, viz: L. L. Hobbs for Presiding Clerk, with C. Tomlinson for Writing Clerk, and G. W. White for Reading Clerk, which being united with they proceeded to read the Queries and Answers received from the Quarterly Meetings, by which it appears we had not improved much since last year, and had gone back, in tobacco, over fifteen hundred members reported as delinquents, and about sixty in the use of intoxicants, which sad state of things elicited some good counsel.

At two P. M. R. P. King gave a short account of his visit to Great Britain and Ireland, South of France, and part of Italy, to the Vaudois, and his return minute in French was read in English. He particularly alluded to Irish Friends in an encouraging manner, especially to the young. The report of the evangelistic work, so called, was read, no account being furnished of the expenditure of money, over one thousand dollars having passed through their hands during the year. They asked for an appropriation of two hundred dollars for the coming year, which against some protest was granted.

Eighth Mo. 7th, ten A. M.—Joint session.—A minute was read from New Garden Quarter on the better development of the ministry, few of the young are coming forward, and it looks like a famine of the Word; the harvest truly is plentiful, but the laborers are few. It was quoted what Jesus told his disciples to pray to the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth laborers, we cannot command the influences of the Holy Spirit, when reverently waited for and obeyed if faithful in the little we shall be made rulers over more. A letter was read from Timothy Nicholson, requesting to have an appointment made of Friends to attend a conference in 1897. It was objected to; some Friends were willing to have four names; it was pointed out that our members were not sufficiently qualified to enter the intellectual arena to contend for novelties, and the query, What good our Yearly Meeting had derived from the attendance of a favored few, and three hundred and fifty dollars expenditure for their costs and books; for which a debt had to be contracted. However, a committee was appointed, and they brought in eleven names with a strong proviso that the meeting was not to furnish any money. Out of meeting the appointment met little favor. At two P. M. a letter was read from the Secretary of the Board of State charities as to criminals in jail, etc., offering an opportunity for concerned Friends to labor, which met full response.

The ninth annual report of the Blue Ridge Mission reported favorably of it, and asked for two hundred dollars to help for next year. Remarks were made as to the large amount of labor and expenditure made in the locality; in other parts of the State, presumably as needy, with members, many of whom were as badly off, no share of the liberality or nursing care was extended. Time was spent urgently soliciting money in the face of the meeting, several collections from time to time disturb the solemnity and dignity of our meetings, and one aged Friend remarked one day that she thought she had had enough. At a subsequent sitting the springing applications for money and other things on the Yearly Meeting was objected to, and it was recommended in future that all such should be well considered in Quarterly Meetings, and approved of before being introduced to the Yearly Meeting, also that if a better way could not be found, to have one sitting for collections to which Friends could bring their spare money.

Dr. Weeks, the author of "Southern Quakers and Slavery," made an interesting and instructive address on the subject, and though not a member, he hit off pretty closely our present condition, when he said that the fast element might add to our numbers, but the tired and burdened souls required substantial solid food like old-fashioned Quakerism offered, and commended Rich Square Friends. He spoke of Governor Archdale as the equal if not the superior in some things to William Penn and that our members did not know what their predecessors had been.

Eighth Month 8th.—Met at usual hour in joint session, when the Fourth Annual report of the orphanage was considered, and a very lively address given by Charles Jessup, with feeling remarks by the matron, followed by a considerable collection and a grant of one hundred and fifty dollars from the meeting.

At two P. M. the reports of Guilford College, with full particulars as to the state of the funds from the Trustee, and of Income and Expenditure at the College were read, followed by words of approval, the net gain for the year was four hundred dollars. About sixty of the scholars were Friends and one hundred not. It was recommended to the faculty to instruct the pupils in Friend's Literature, Sewall's and Gough's History, Jaiffries' Diary, Barclay's Apology, History of Friends in America, and other writings, so that they might know what Friends were, and of their faithfulness under cruel sufferings by which liberty had been won for themselves and others.

The financial report submitted by the Representatives showed that some Quarters were further in arrear, that the outstanding debt had been reduced two hundred dollars, and agreed that one thousand dollars should be assessed for the ensuing year to meet current expenses, and two hundred dollars to reduce our debt.

On First-day there was a large attendance in the meeting-house, with a tent and other meetings on the grounds in the grove, held simultaneously, four meetings at each place during the day.

Eighth Month 10th, Second-day at ten A. M., an Epistle to all the Yearly Meetings with which we correspond was read and approved and directed to be type-written, signed and forwarded; Indian affairs also heard of, and in the afternoon all unfinished business was transacted, having been favored to get thro' one day sooner than usual, and though a difference in sentiment was apparent in several matters, yet love, the evidence of true discipleship, prevailed. Let love through all your actions run, let all your words be kind, "be pitiful, be courteous."

During Yearly Meeting week we had two lectures kindly given us by J. Walter Malone of Cleveland, Ohio, free, on the "Ages of the World," for which he had prepared a large map appended to the wall, his remarks were interesting and instructive, and he appears to have given much attention to the subject, though we may not be willing to follow him in all that he said, yet of one thing we may be certain, if we would flee from the wrath to come, viz: to embrace now the offers of redeeming love and mercy, to turn unto the Lord Most High with full purpose of heart to serve and obey Him, to believe in and follow the Lord Jesus Christ, and while we have light to believe in the light that we may be the children of the Light, which is Christ the true Light that enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, and to which J. Walter Malone testified.

MEGESSA, N. C., Ninth Month 3th, 1896.

A REMARKABLE ENCOUNTER.—HOBLY JONES, of Black Duck, is dying of injuries sustained in a fight between himself and his dog on one side, and a large rookery of blue cranes that congregated in large numbers every summer in a spruce grove in a swamp in the southwestern part of Beltrami County. James' dog was killed, and he himself was just able to crawl away from the birds, only to fall exhausted in a well-beaten trail, where he was found by the rest of the party. James says he was attracted by the yelping of his dog, some distance in advance, and at the same time the air seemed to be alive with cranes. The dog ran toward James, pursued by scores of the birds, which, when James came in view, attacked him, too. His gun was of little use, for the birds were too numerous, and flanked him on every side. He was struck in the back of the neck by the beak of the cranes and knocked down. The blood spurted from a wound like that made by a sharp knife. The blow was probably all that saved James from instant death. The cranes could fight to advantage only from the air, and, as James recovered his wits, he intuitively reached for his gun and opened fire on the birds, keeping it up as long as the supply of cartridges lasted. In the meantime the dog, on reaching his master, had turned and shown fight, and had been killed. James took the first chance of crawling away in the dense brush. The next morning William Hines and two others went to the rookery, and, being forewarned, were enabled to shoot four of the birds. One of them stood seven feet eight inches high and measured eight feet four inches across the wings.—Minneapolis Journal.

CONVALESCENCE

MARY B. DODGE.

I said: "I cannot wait.
I seek to do Thy will, but waiting, Lord,
Is wearier far than working; let Thy word Remove from me this fate."

I said: "My heart has faded
Remembering all the burdens I have borne,
And how at last I watched, thinking the dawn
Was near to make me glad.

"I wait to do Thy will.
I seek no selfish end. I want Thy strength
To follow and uphold, until at length
The power to do is still.

"But wait I cannot, Lord;
For thought and soul and will all burn to do,
And folded hands seem mockery. Even through My pain let me be heard."

And then the answer fell,
Faintly, yet clear: "O troubled heart, be still,
And know thy work is but to wait My will Till thou art sure 'tis well."

"Poor eager heart and brain,
Put by all longings, and let patience still
And faith and quietness thy spirit fill,
Taking away thy pain."

And so I wait to-day,
And every day, praying that love divine
To dwell within and overcome be mine,
My comfort and sure stay.

And as I wait 'tis here!
Saviour and Lord, on weary heart and brain Falls soft the touch of healing, (ill all pain Ends because Thou art near.

Thy love is mine; and now
Abide with me, my Lord, and I will wait
Patient and standing still without the gate.
To Thy sweet will I bow.

FALTER NOT.

Brother, why art thou despairing,
Why to phantoms bend the knee,
Know'st thou not 'tis death to falter
On the verge of victory?

Then wilt seek in vain for succor
If thine own arms gather rust;
'Tis the brave alone who conquer—
Towards grove in the dust.

Think not Wisdom's golden showers
Fall by chance, now here, now there;
Few there be who win her favors,
Free from toil and studios care;

But with firm and strong endeavor
All may hope to call her "Friend,"
Courage thou, she yet may greet thee,
Ere the march of life shall end.

What if obstacles unnumbered
Vulture-like, dispute the way?
Struggle on! above their talons
Thou canst rise and win the day.

Be thy motto "Forward ever!"
Till thy standard crowns the height.
Then, when death bids thee "surrender,"
God will find thine armor bright.

Chinese Festival.

I once attended an immense gathering in honor of the God of Medicine, when an offering of two hundred hogs was made. It was on the birthday of the god, and in a grass hut on a mild plateau five miles north of Tamsui the idol was seated. In front of the god, pork, fowl, rice, fish, eggs, tea and spirituous liquors were set. A Taoist priest performed incantations, bowing, chanting and beseeching the god to be favorable, and to partake of the feast provided. Fragrant incense-sticks were burned, and at intervals mock money was offered. Outside the hut men were busy preparing the great feast for the god. Two hundred dressed hogs, on frames prepared for the purpose, were ranged all around in rows, an orange in the mouth of each, and a large knife stuck in the back of the neck. These hogs varied in weight from fifty to four hundred and eighty pounds. Fully four thousand men, women and children were present, each family displaying its own articles to the best advantage. In the evening torches, music and theatrical performances added to the honor of the poor camphor-wood god in the grass hut.

The most elaborate and hideous scene I ever witnessed was the "Seventh Moon Feast." The Seventh Month was the time for making offerings to all departed spirits. It was a time of great festivity and excitement. The custom prevailed in all the cities and towns in North Formosa of erecting in an open space of several acres, great cone-like structures of bamboo poles, from five to ten feet in diameter at the base, and sometimes fifty or sixty feet high. Around these cones, from bottom to top, innumerable quantities of food, offered to the spirits, were laid in rows. There were ducks and small-pow, dead and alive, pork, fish, cakes, fruit, bananas, pineapples, and all manner of delicacies in season; and fastened everywhere in the mass were hundreds of huge fire-crackers. On one occasion I saw fifty such cones at a feast at Cank-kah. It was a gruesome sight. When night came on and the time for summoning the spirits approached, the cones were illuminated by dozens of lighted candles. Then the priests took up their position on a raised platform, and by clapping their hands and sounding a large brass gong they called the spirits of all the departed to come and feast on the food provided.

"Out of the night and the other world," the lead were given time to come and to gorge themselves on the "spiritual" part of the feast, he essence, that was suited to their ethereal requirements. Meanwhile a very unspiritual mob, thousands and thousands of hungry beggars, rags, blackless, desperadoes of all sorts, from the country towns, the city slums, or venturing under cover of the night from their hiding-places among the hills—surged and swelled in every part of the open space, impatiently waiting their turn at the feast. When the spirits had consumed the "spiritual" part, the "carnal" was the property of the mob, and the mob quite approved of this division. But the time seemed long. At length the spirits were satisfied, and the gong was sounded once more. That was the signal for the mob; and scarcely had the first stroke fallen when that whole scene was one mass of arms and legs and tongues. Screaming, cursing, howling like demons of the pit, they all joined in the onset. A rush was made for the cones, and those nearest seized the little ones, who came to us in their hour of trouble and fear, and how tenderly we gather them in our arms and comfort them with our words of love and cheer.

to the ground. Then it was every man for himself. In one wild scurrying, groaning, and yelling all the while, trampling on those who had lost their footing or were smothered by the falling cones, fighting and tearing one another like mad dogs, they all made for the coveted food. It was a very hellum, and the wildness of the scene was enhanced by the irregular explosion of the fire-crackers, and the death groan of some one worsted in the fray. As each sensed what he could carry, he tried to extricate himself from the mob, hoisting fast the treasures for which he had fought, and of which the less successful in the outskirts of the crowd would vainly plunder him. Escaping the mob, he hurried to his home, expecting every moment to be attacked by those who thought it easier to waylay and rob the solitary sportsman than to join in the general scramble on the plain.

One cannot estimate the demoralizing effects of such feasts; and it is to the credit of that progressive reformer, Liu Ming Chuan, that the barbarities of the "Seventh Moon Feast," have been entirely abolished in Formosa. Such a sight as has been described will never again be witnessed there.

"As One Whom His Mother Comforteth."

At a summer resort, not long since, a clergyman and a lady sat on the piazza of the hotel. The lady's heart was heavily burdened, and she talked of her sorrows to the aged minister, who tried to lead her in her hour of need to the Great Comforter.

His efforts seemed to be in vain. The lady had heard all her life of the promise that if a tired soul casts its burdens on the Lord it will be sustained, no matter how heavy that burden may be, but she seemed to lack the faith to cast herself upon the Lord.

A half-hour later a severe thunder-storm came up in the western sky. With the first flash of lightning, the mother jumped out of her chair and ran up and down the piazza, exclaiming, "Where is Freddie? Where is Freddie? He is so terribly frightened in a thunder-storm I don't know what he will do without me."

In a few moments afterward her boy came running up the walk, almost breathless and his face plainly showing the great fear that was in his heart. "Oh, mother," he exclaimed, "I was so frightened, I ran just as fast as ever I could to get to you!" The mother sat down and took the frightened child into her arms. She allayed his fear and quieted him until his head rested calmly on her loving heart.

The good minister stepped up gently, and putting his hand on the mother's shoulder, he whispered, "As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you" (Isaiah, lxxvi: 13).

"I understand it now," she replied, as she looked up with tearful face. "I did not trust Him as my boy trusts me, but now I will throw myself into his arms as a little child, and remember his promise, 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you.' I never felt the depth of Divine love as shown in that promise before."

May we not all, as mothers, learn the meaning of this precious promise? We know how full our hearts are of love and sympathy for the little ones, who come to us in their hour of trouble and fear, and how tenderly we gather them in our arms and comfort them with our words of love and cheer.

Is it not strange that, with this sweet, practical demonstration of truth in our daily lives with our children, we so often forget the precious promise, and try to struggle on alone with our burdens of sorrow and fear?

"As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you; and ye shall be comforted in Jerusalem."—Isaiah lxxvi: 13.—School.

Edward Baileys, in replying to one who had brought slanderous accusations against Friends, thus describes their views as to the value of learning and the expounding of Scriptures:

"Learning in itself is a gift of God, and is not profane, though, as to the knowledge of God and the things of his Kingdom, learning in tongues and languages is little available; for it is the Spirit of God that teaches the things of God and reveals all the things of his Kingdom, and none can know God but as the Spirit of God discover Him; for the disciples, who were some of them unlearned men, and books and letters, had the knowledge of the matters of God's Kingdom taught them by the Holy Spirit. And such as have the gift of the Spirit of God, he they poor or rich, are fitted to expound and understand the Scriptures; for none can understand the Scriptures nor the things therein declared, out by the Spirit of God that gave forth the Scriptures, and it is not Latin, Greek nor Hebrew that teacheth to understand the Scriptures; out it is the Spirit of God, and to whomsoever that spirit is given, and God gives it to whom He pleaseth, they only are fit to declare the things of God unto others, and to expound Scriptures, and none else; but them who have experience of the operation of the Spirit in their own hearts. And this we hold and believe."

"THE LORD IS CAST INTO THE LAMP: BUT THE WHOLE DISPOSING THEREOF IS OF THE LORD."—We know here the true reason for the almost universal appeal to the learning Eastern peoples. They wish to have decisions free from all the suspicious influences to which the delicacies of men, on a liberal education and past, in bias and prejudice, have given so much food. To this day the A. B. degree is a certificate of learning, not clear which way a right to make, with happy confidence, with its staff and scepter, and follows the direction in which the Lord will, as the power by the finger of God.—Sunday School Times.

THE FRIEND

NINTH MONTH 26, 1896

The action of our paper seems to be pressing through a process of stripping, as one after another is removed from our those who by submission to Divine truth had become useful instruments in upbuilding sound doctrines, in spreading a knowledge of the principles of the Gospel, and in contending against those things which prey on the spiritual life of the community. It is natural for the concerned members to lament over this removal of veteran warriors, and to adopt the plaintive language, "By whom shall Justice arise?"

But it is well to remember that it was by the operation of the grace of God that these were prepared for usefulness in the Church and in the world; and that the same Divine power is able to qualify others and make of them instruments equally valuable, if they will yield themselves thoroughly to the disposal of their Father in heaven.

Many of those whom we can recall as dignified instruments of good, were trained up in families where self-denial was inculcated, and the welfare of the Church was a prominent consideration. By their fruits shall ye know them. It speaks well for Friends of a past generation, that those brought up under their influence became such noble and dignified servants of the Lord as were many whom we have known. In many families of Friends of the present day indulgences and liberties are allowed which would not have been permitted among their worthy predecessors; and there is a danger that the children will come to think of pleasures and amusements as the chief end of life. It would be marvellous indeed, if such a training should produce a generation of unworthy men and women, devoted to the cause of Christ, and to the welfare of their fellow-beings.

The Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting have just issued a new edition of the Memoirs of "Stephen Grellet." These Memoirs are principally from his own hand, and relate the remarkable circumstances attending his early conversion and conversion, and his subsequent history, which was a very unusual one. In the exercise of his gift as a minister of the Gospel, he labored extensively in Canada, the United States and the West Indies; and also in Great Britain and the continent of Europe. He was preserved among many dangers by remarkable manifestations of the superintending care and guidance of the Divine Power which sent him forth; and was enabled to proclaim the Divine messages with acceptance in many of the courts of Europe, to princes and kings, as well as to many of their subjects. The book is a very instructive one, illustrating as it does with much clearness the fundamental principles of Christianity, as ever held by the Society of Friends. We regard it as a work well calculated for circulation outside of our membership as well as among our own people, conveying clear doctrinal instruction, and many practical illustrations of the manner in which the Head of the Church leads and preserves his servants.

This edition differs from the original one edited by Benjamin Seeborn, principally in the omission of much of the correspondence appended by him to the Journal, in the insertion of parts of the Memorial of S. Grellet prepared by Burlington Monthly Meeting, and in the addition of an Index.

The book forms one volume of nine hundred and thirty-eight pages octavo, and is sold in cloth binding at one dollar and a half per copy; bound in half-morocco at two dollars. It can be obtained of Joseph Hall at Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. If sent by mail, the postage will be twenty-three cents additional.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Baldwin Locomotive Works in this city has received an order for eight locomotives for the Imperial Railway of China, the only railroad in the Chinese Empire.

The Board of General Council has enacted a law declaring all discoveries of coal, minerals and other things of value made by citizens of the Christian Nation to be the property of the discoverers, and their heirs or assigns, if they are citizens of the Nation.

South County, Kansas, has an unparalleled crop, some fields yielding an average of seventy-five bushels to the acre, and a heavy one falling below that figure.

The buckwheat crop in the blue mountains of Oregon is enormous this year. Every bush is loaded, and the berries are said to be so thick on Black Mountain that the cattle that range are all stained purple from walking through and lying down in the patches.

The grape-growers of Northern Ohio are afflicted with a big crop. The vines are black with the fruit, which is selling at five cents a basket of ten pounds in the vineyards. There is no profit in such a price. Many of the vines are so much rotted and the picking as much more. It is said that no more grapes will be sent to market, but that the remainder of the crop would be sold to winemakers. This year's crop is the heaviest ever known in that section of the country.

The only gold-bearing mines of importance in this country are located in Southern California.

FOREIGN.—A dispatch dated the 21st instant, from London, says: "A meeting held to-night in Shore-ditch to protest against the massacre of Christians by Turks, a most important announcement was made, which, it is believed, puts an end to all conjecture regarding the action that might be taken by the British Government in the direction of putting an end to the massacres by force or depositing the Sultan. The statement was made by Mr. John Lewis, member of the House of Commons for the Haggerston district of Shore-ditch. He said that if England had a free hand in the matter, very few days would elapse before there would be a change in Turkey. He then added that he was authorized by the Foreign Office to say that Great Britain was confirmed in an agreement between the British Powers, that if she attacked Turkey on any excuse or pretext she would have to face that combination. If she fired a single shot, or took action alone, it would mean that at that moment there would be a European war."

"The whole English nation," observes the London edition of the New York Tribune, "is united in a deep feeling of abhorrence to the crime and the outrage of Turkey. Neither leaders nor mass meetings are needed to express this righteous feeling. It is the strongest in the north of England, Wales and Scotland, but is a weak or uncertain anywhere. The 'unspeakable Turk' has no friend in England, except, possibly, the few who are absorbed in the English people's unanimous in desiring the deposition of the Sultan and the abolition of massacre and outrage, and the Government of the day is not arrayed against this policy. It is Russia this time that condones assassination, arbitrary or arbitrary execution, and the Continental Powers are unwilling to be convinced that England is sincere and disinterested."

The Porte has received an official report stating that six hundred persons were killed by Kurds in the recent disturbances at Egoin. It is feared that massacres will soon take place in other districts of Asia Minor.

A dispatch from Constantinople of the 18th instant states that a number of Sofias (theological students) and members of the Young Turkey party had a desperate fight in Galata on Fourth-day. Fifteen of the combatants were killed. The dispatch adds that many of the archives of the British Embassy have been destroyed, and the safety of the British garrison in the Bosphorus.

A telegram from London says: "It begins to appear as though Tynan had purchased his freedom by divulging the details of the conspiracy. It is now thought that he will not be extradited, chiefly because the English authorities do not want to push the case against him."

According to the official reports of the Japanese Government, the Island Empire contains 62,520 teachers.

Owing to the orders of the Spanish Government in relation to the issue of paper money, business in Havana is said to be paralyzed. The civil government requested the Spanish Government to enforce acceptance of said money, but the refusal to make any transaction.

It is stated that, among other measures which General Weyler thinks of adopting as a prelude to the campaign in Cuba, is a revocation of the edict of pardon, and the obliging of families having connections in the ranks of the rebels to move into other provinces, and making also the concentration in villages obligatory, considering all persons found in the country enemies or supporters of the enemy.

The new law requiring the use of the metric system of weights and measures is now being enacted in Mexico.

Prayer and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1855.—Fourth Month 1st.—First-day. Silent meeting. Last Fourth-day was Monthly Meeting at Birmingham. Oh! it was a favored time. Dear friend H. Gibbons quoted the passage where the disciples queried, while Jesus was in the hinder part of the vessel asleep, "Lord, arrest thou not that we perish?" Said much that was encouraging, closing with, "He hears the secret supplication of the contrite soul." He shortly afterwards rose again, addressing the young encouragingly. Next, P. W. Roberts rose, saying, "The Lord is good," etc. Then dear ——— said he believed there were some who would have to acknowledge that the Lord had not dealt with them according to their deserts, but according to his great mercy, they have been watered and dug about from time to time; still the husbandman would listen to the request to let them stand, and would chastise or lig about them still longer. He quoted the passage, "I heard Ephraim bemoaning himself, 'Thou hast chastened me, and I was chastised, as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke,' recommending the prayer, 'Turn thou me, and I shall be turned.' Oh! I need it and did try in meeting to-day to use it; and to say, behold he clay, be thou the potter. It did seem to me, that I did feel the good presence, poor and unworthy, but I have done one thing wrong since meeting. I wish I could cease from reasoning. Shortly after, P. W. R. appeared in supplication for us, again quoting the language, 'Turn us, and we shall be turned.' In the last meeting friend Gibbons spoke again to the young, saying, "She felt there had been a fresh renewal of heavenly visitation, and encouraged us to treasure these feelings.

8th.—Dear ——— spoke, saying "That many of us feel that the Almighty is very powerful, that He is clothed with honor and majesty, that He covereth himself with light as with a garment; who stretcheth out the heavens like a curtain; who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters, who maketh the clouds his chariots, who walketh upon the wings of the wind, who maketh his angels spirits and his ministers a flame of fire," and that feeling so, we might be ready to query, "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, or bow myself before the high God?" "Shall I come before Him with burnt offerings," etc. These are not wanted, but a contrite heart will be heard. To this man will I look, even to him that is of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word. "Cease from man whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of?" Oh, I was trying to petition my God to save me and cast me off, for the sake of his dear Son, whose Spirit strived with me, while I resist so long. I am glad that I can have a quiet mind with the approaching Yearly Meeting. Some say that there will be a separation, and oh, if I can only be of the little lowly, meek and humble company who walk in the daily cross, in the Spirit and power of Christ, this is all I ask, for if we follow Him as He leads, He will surely receive us when we die.

16th.—Yesterday I was at the North Meeting. It was so good to me.

In the morning Morris Cope spoke first, "When the poor and needy seek water and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the Lord of Israel will not forsake them," that He who was with Daniel in the lion's den, and with the three children in the fiery furnace, would be with those who were his. Then Enos Lee asked why we did not turn our minds inward and there seek for that which would be a comfort to us now, and would go with us to our homes. Seek, seek earnestly. Soon dear E. Pittfield knelt, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

In the afternoon meeting I did try to turn inward and repent, and it was brought before me, that I ought to take up the cross in some points, and I was fearing for my strength to do it when dear Abigail Williams rose, saying, "She felt it right to say to a deeply exercised, tried and discouraged mind present, that the good things promised them would be received."

Next Enos Lee so encouragingly said, "it was such a great favor that we could have the spirit within to teach us what we ought to do, and that we did not have to go to an outward teacher, and more that was so good to me, about our dear Saviour who is willing to save, and his strength for us all.

Then dear Phebe W. Roberts said, "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." "Put on strength and journey forward; thou hast encompassed this mountain long enough." I felt this last and could take it, for I know that I have felt that there was a mountain in the way, that I ought to go over, taking up my cross, it is full time.

Second-day morning, we had a quiet, comfortable meeting, but the men had difficulty about reading the Ohio and Baltimore epistles, and did not get out until about half-past three o'clock. On Third-day morning we had a good meeting. Dear Sarah Hillman spoke, urging us to inwardly search ourselves, using the language, "Wash me, cleanse me," Oh! I needed to use it. Then Hannah Haines spoke of the woman that was healed by touching the hem of the Saviour's garment, if we only come unto Him, He would heal us from sin. Dear P. W. Roberts said addressing the young, "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." Dear Lydia Kite spoke about superfluities, and having daguerotypes taken, after E. Evans had said something of the kind so excellently. On Fifth-day I attended the North Meeting. I feel myself to be so unworthy and so mercifully dealt with.

This was my birth-day, twenty-five years old. How little we have I been of to my Heavenly Father during all my life. Oh, I do desire to take up the cross. I am afraid I shall be lost at last.

First, Morris Cope spoke encouragingly, next ——— desiring us to pray for the peace of our spiritual Zion and say, "Here am I, send me," recommending the same language to the young, "Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised, turn thou me, and I shall be turned, for thou art the Lord my God."

Enos Lee spoke of the prophet Isaiah refusing to go as the Lord commanded, hoping that none of us might be plucked into the like distress by disobeying my Heavenly Father. H. Warrington spoke of our being purified as silver, all the dross and reprobate silver to be consumed.

Dear H. Gibbons spoke encouragingly to the young, and on the last day of the meeting dear Phebe Roberts supplicated for us, that those whom He had laid his hand upon might be strengthened.

22nd.—Dear ——— spoke in our meeting of the "leaven which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened," carrying the similitude farther than I ever heard before—that after being put into the meal it has to be kneaded and watched; so our Heavenly Father watches over and corrects us, watches when we are in a proper state to be put into the oven. Be willing to go into the oven, even if it seemed to be heated seven times hotter than usual, for that which is continually worked without baking becomes sour. He addressed the young, desiring us to give up, "No chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous," "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth and scourgeth, every one whom He receiveth." Some will have to acknowledge they have not been dealt with after their deserts. We have had line upon line, and precept upon precept.

29th.—One year ago dear friend Jelfers was very ill and on First-day she quietly departed. It is a sad anniversary, particularly to Anne. We had such a favored meeting to-day. Dear Hannah Gibbons said, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon, encouraging to greater dedication, giving the whole heart. God is very powerful. He will strengthen. Apply to Him daily for strength, to enable us to keep covenant with Him. Walk in the narrow way, the way of the cross. Pray unto Him for strength, for He has said, "To this man will I look, even to him that is poor and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word." Soon after dear — appeared in fervent supplication, "Paul may plant and Apollus water, but God alone giveth the increase." He petitioned for us to be strengthened, shielded from the fiery dart of the enemy, and for the church to be restored. Answer his petition, Most Holy Father, and grant strength unto me, if I resist after so great mercies, how shall I escape. Look prayerfully unto God and my Saviour every day. Turn my back upon the world.

Fifth Month 7th.—Silent meeting to-day. I did try to walk in the fear of the Lord, the first part of the week; the fear of being singular, thus shunning the cross, brought darkening trouble and anguish upon me. I tried to wait upon my Heavenly Father in the first part of the meeting, but He seemed a great way off from me. In great mercy He humbled me to resolve to follow his leadings and then drew nearer to me. Oh, that I may not sin again in any way.

15th.—We sat in silence a long time, and then a Friend spoke to some not in membership with us, addressing them particularly. Said it was a plain way; our Heavenly Father was nearer to us than many of us could think; the Holy Spirit would show us how sinful we were, and when we hungered and thirsted we would be given the righteousness of faith. There was more very applicable, but this part I felt that I wanted to help me along to greater dedication.

This afternoon in reading the prayer of Jabez it seemed to be one that I could adopt, "Oh that thou wouldst bless me indeed and enlarge my coast, and that thy hand might be with me and that thou wouldst keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me." And God granted him that which he requested. John said, "The word is nigh thee in thy heart and in thy mouth, this word of faith which we preach." The Light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not." George Fox said, That light brought sight, and sight brought a knowledge of sin. Oh, that I may feel God near me.

20th.—Silent meeting. I tried to beg of my Heavenly Father to make me what He would have me to be. I am so prone to sin. On Third-day was our Quarterly Meeting. It was so good to me. Wm. and Elizabeth Evans were there. Elizabeth Evans spoke first, "If ye then being evil, know how to give good things to your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give his Holy Spirit to them that ask Him." She spoke so encouragingly to the young. Believe in Him and obey Him; He is very near to such, though their language may be, "Carest thou not that we perish?" We could feel his presence, but our sins separate us from our God as a thick cloud.

William Evans said, "The salvation of our souls was as dear to our Heavenly Father as ever it was. We must obey the Light within or else it will be withdrawn from us, and we will be left to go from sin to sin; if we obey it, it will increase. For what we give up in this world, He will give us himself, and we shall feel joy in his presence." I beseech of thee, Heavenly Father, make me what thou wouldst have me to be, and give me an obedient heart. Oh, grant me thy good spirit.

In the last meeting dear Phebe W. Roberts spoke of a vine, which had been planted and watered by our Heavenly Father, but when He came to look for fruit it yielded none, then it was laid open to the attacks of its enemies, and cared for no more. She hoped this would not be the case with any of her young friends. If we will obey and bring all the tithes into his store house, "He will open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing that there shall not be room enough to receive it. There was another class to whom she wished to say "That though their beloved seemed absent from them, yet if they will abide in the patience, He will come unto them in his own good time.

Sixth Month 3rd.—Silent Meeting. Anne Sheppard went away on a journey last Fifth-day. Now we are alone, I do want to resist temptation and walk with a dedicated heart before thee, Oh, Lord.

Warned in a Dream.

Both Scripture and experience teach us that though "a dream cometh through the multitude of business," and is often but the broken minglings of fantastic fancies, yet there are times when men are warned of God in dreams, as in the case of Joseph, and to disregard such warnings is dangerous in the extreme. The eminent English evangelist, William Haslam, relates the following instance, which occurred within his own circle of acquaintance:

"A careless, worldly man in my parish dreamt one night that he was in the market-hall of a certain town. He was surprised to see in a wall a doorway which he had never noticed before, so much so that he went forward to examine it, and found that it really was a door, and that it opened to his touch. He went inside, and there he saw an impressive and strange scene. There were a number of men and women walking about, who appeared to be very woful and in great agony of pain. They were too distressed to speak, but he recognized most of them as persons who had been dead some time. They looked mournfully at him, as if sorry he had come there, but did not speak. He was much alarmed, and made his way back to the door to escape, but he was stopped by a stern, sullen-looking porter, who said, in a sepulchral voice, 'You cannot pass.' He said, 'I came in this way, and I want to go out.' 'You cannot,' said, the solemn voice. 'Look, the door only opens one way; you may come in by it, but you cannot go out.' It was so, and his heart sank within him as he looked at that mysterious portal. At last the porter relented, and as a special favor let him go forth for eight days. He was so glad at his release that he awoke.

"When he told me the dream I warned him and begged him to give his heart to God. 'You may die,' I said, 'before the eighth day.' He laughed at the idea, and said he was 'not going to be frightened by a dream.' 'When I am converted,' he continued, 'I hope I shall be able to say that I was drawn by love, not driven by fear.' 'But what,' I said, 'if you have been neglecting and slighting God's love for a long time, and he is now moving you with fear to return to Him?' 'Nothing would do, he turned a deaf ear to every entreaty. When the eighth day arrived, being market-day, he went to the hall as usual, and looked at the wall of which he had dreamed, with particular interest, but seeing no door there, he exclaimed, 'It's all right; now I will go and have a good dinner over it, with a bottle of wine!'

"Whether he stopped at one bottle or not I cannot tell, but late on Saturday night, as he was going home, he was thrown from his horse and killed. This was the end of the eighth day."—The Christian.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Atlantic Mail Service.

Couriers for conveyance of letters for kings and princes are as old as kingdoms themselves, for it became necessary to carry the decrees of rulers to the distant province with the utmost speed. The Romans were the first among the ancients to establish a post-office system, and hence the "royal ways" were established, all leading to Rome, from the most distant provinces, on which letters could be transferred at a rate of one hundred and sixty miles per day. As the Roman power declined, the roads became deserted, and the Dark Ages finally removed the last vestiges of Roman civilization. The universities which sprung up had at an early date rudimentary postal establishments.

England at an early day established postal stations for the transportation of mail to the Continent and the infant colonies beyond the sea. As early as 1639 it was "ordered that at Richard Fairbank's, in Boston, is the place appointed for all letters which are brought from beyond the sea or are to be sent thither, to be left with him. He is allowed for each letter a penny, and must answer all miscarriages through his own neglect." The colonial law of Virginia, in 1657, required every planter to provide a messenger to convey dispatches, as they arrived, to the next planter, on pain of forfeiting a hog-head of tobacco in default.

Benjamin Franklin did more for the postal service in this country than any other man, having been connected with the postal work for forty years, and it was due to his untiring energy, in a great measure, that the Atlantic mail service was established; however, only with small beginnings. The person who now crosses in one of the Atlantic mail liners will be surprised at the amount of mail carried, and the perfection with which the complicated system works.

When one receives a letter from across the waters, he will be puzzled many times at various markings there are on a letter—every black mark having some hidden meaning. "London and Holyhead, T. P. O., U. S. Mail," is often seen stamped on a letter. "London and Holyhead" simply means that the letter was sent by rail from Euston Station, London, to Holyhead, in Wales, while "T. P. O." is a short way of expressing "Travelling Post Office;" while another, expressing "Posted Without Late Fee," means that the sender of the letter was too late to catch the last American mail at the post office and came to the station to post the letter, and forgot to place a two-penny stamp upon the envelope, to pay the extra government fee. In this country, posting a letter on trains does not cost anything extra. "Tax" simply means that the sender did not put enough postage on, and the receiver in America must pay the extra amount on account of his friends' forgetfulness on the other side.

It is well known that a great deal of rivalry exists between English and American steamship companies about the carrying of mail, for the company which has the contract gets a handsome subsidy from the government. Nearly all the mail from America to England is at present carried by the American Line, while the English mail for America is mostly carried by the Cunard and White Star Lines. On account of this rivalry, we have this constant racing across the Atlantic, in order to see which line can carry the mail to its destination in the shortest possible time.

The regular mail from Great Britain for America leaves London on Fourth and Seventh-ays, by special train for Holyhead, via St. George's Channel for Dublin, and from there, by train, for Queenstown, to board a Cunard or White Star steamer stopping for mail on their way to New York. Mails are also forwarded from Southampton, by the American and North German Lloyd Lines, on the same days, but letters intended for these lines must be marked by the sender, "via Southampton," or else they will be carried by the English liners. If a letter is marked "By S. S. St. Paul," "St. Louis," &c., the letter must be carried by that boat, although it may lay in dock for a week, and not be able to sail on schedule time. The scene at New York, Southampton, Queenstown or London, on the day of departing and arriving of the transatlantic mail, is one of intense activity, and long to be remembered by one unaccustomed to such excitement. In New York harbor, on the morning of the sailing, the excitement is intense while it lasts, and in a few minutes four or five hundred large bags are loaded without much ceremony or noise. In London it is different in the afternoons on the days named. About four o'clock in the afternoon, red vans without number roll noisily into the Euston Square Station from various parts of the vast city, with American mail, just in time to reach the fast mail for Holyhead. As the mail is unloaded, persons from various strata of society come running along, with letters in their hands, and line up in front of an office for a pay an extra two-pence into the so-called "Late-fee Box," before the letters will be accepted. At just four o'clock Greenwich time, he "Late-fee Office" closes, regardless of the number of delinquents ready to avail themselves of the opportunity of even paying for being late. However, the late-comer is given yet another opportunity, for he now can approach the train where a bag is hung direct to the train, where the letters are dropped till the very last minute of the departure of the train. Officers of various descriptions parade the walks and give commands. Just at the very last minute, an officer high in rank makes his appearance, and officers and workmen give him room, on entering the train, without any questioning. He is the messenger from the Colonial Office, with the latest decrees, instructions, etc., from the Home Office to the Colonial Secretaries in the various parts of the British possessions in the Western world. A receipt is given for these documents, and when he is done the train pulls out of the station and on to Holyhead, some two hundred and sixty miles distant, without delay. The mail clerks begin their work on leaving London, and are hardly through with it on reaching Holyhead. They must stamp, weigh, sort several thousand letters and packages, and must be as familiar with every city in the United States and Canada as the average politician with the wards of his town. After sorting, the wrapping up begins, and when they are marked the work of the postal clerks for that trip is ended. All letters to Chicago, St. Louis or Montreal are marked for those places, and will go direct. Others again are marked "Chicago, forward," which means that the mail in that package shall be opened in Chicago and sent to the various places within a radius of a hundred miles or more of that city. It would be an impossibility to sort all the mail for all the cities in the country. Thus, a letter addressed to Ohio or Indiana will be carried to Chicago and then back again to the place of destination. At Holyhead the mail has been placed in leather bags, and in a few minutes put on board a packet steamer. Officers have numbers of all letters, numbers of bags, the delays along the way and reasons for same. The packet speeds across the Channel for Dublin, and the mail is placed on a train, which carries the load of mail at a fast rate to Queenstown. As the train whistles for the station, the large Cunarder lies waiting in the beautiful harbor, whistling now and then, to urge the fast-moving train to still greater speed. A tender lies ready to receive the precious cargo, and a score or more of Erin's sons are hard at work running with the mail-bags from the train for the tender, and when the last bag is on board, the little steamer glides swiftly towards the larger liner, a gangway is thrown out, and the chief postal mail officer is the first one on board, who brings the latest dispatches from the British Government, and for which the captain must give a personal receipt that he has received the same, and promising that he will carry the same safely to their destination. In a few minutes the mail is on board, the great steamer gives a final whistle, its huge engines are set in motion, and across the Atlantic speeds the vessel, with tons of mail for the American people. The scene on arrival in Southampton is equally interesting. As soon as Lizard's Head is sighted, a telegram is sent by the light-house officials to London. The London banker and merchant are busy figuring and planning what news will be brought of their investments in the Far West, while the London rag-picker, unknown to the world, wonders when that son will write of his successes and disasters in the mining camps of the West. And perhaps that very ship carries a kindly letter and a check from the son and pre-paid tickets, that the family shall come on the next steamer, for he has struck it rich, and will support them all. Before the Needles are reached, the sailors have gotten all the mail on deck, ready for delivery, and on landing at the pier at Southampton the mail is carried into the train standing in waiting. In fifteen minutes five or six hundred bags have been placed on the train, and it speeds away to London, without stop, with all the mail for Great Britain, Scandinavia, Russia, Finland and Iceland, and from those points it is sent to the various countries.

With the increase of amount of mail, the cost of transportation has become correspondingly cheaper. From one to two dollars was paid for the carrying of a letter from America to the European countries. In 1865 the postage was fixed at twenty-four cents from America to England, which was thought very cheap, while if the letter should be carried to the Continent, twice that amount was charged. Even at that rate six million letters were sent in 1865. In 1874, the International Postal Union was formed, making the rate five cents per half ounce to any part of the world included in the Union, and in that year twenty million letters were transported across the seas, and the trans-Atlantic mail has gradually increased since then. By the report of 1890, the United States alone sent to foreign countries, 41,273,312 pieces, letters, parcels, etc., weighing 3,950,791 pounds, while the amount of postage paid was $1,819,143.24, and it is estimated in England that twenty-three per cent. of the letters received from abroad come from the United States, while twenty per cent. of all mail sent from Old England is addressed to this country. Hence the amount and the importance of our Atlantic mail.

Time was when a letter would not reach England in less than three weeks. Now the distance between New York and Southampton can be made in six days, while a letter can be sent from New York via London and the Continent, and will return by way of San Francisco in forty-four days.

Out of this mass of mail very little is lost. Thousands upon thousands of dollars in money-orders and checks are sent to and from these two worlds every few months. Addresses are often defective, and although the letters are written in all hand writings and the addresses are spelled in all languages under the sun, still the tried and trusted mail clerks on both sides of the Atlantic have, by long experience, been able to cipher out the meaning and direct the welcome letter, containing both money and good cheer, to the old folks across the sea, who, perhaps, have waited and waited for glad tidings from their children out here in the West.

The Cultivation of Tobacco and Morals.

Connecticut has long been noted for raising marketable tobacco. The business is now spreading in Massachusetts, and The Boston Journal describes the great tobacco plain as extending through Hatfield, North Hatfield, Whately, South Deerfield, and Deerfield, and says that there are a thousand acres of tobacco to be harvested in that valley this summer. Most of the farmers in that region invest in this as practically the only crop. Men, boys, and in some instances women are hurrying the harvest.

A number of years ago it came in our way to inquire carefully as to the moral effect of cultivating tobacco in the Connecticut regions, and we found it to be what it generally is everywhere, and what the carrying on of any such business, as the cultivation of hops entirely devoted to the manufacture of beer, is not contributing directly to immorality, but lowering the moral tone of the community, and diminishing its responsiveness to appeals upon the higher questions of morality and religion. The root of this effect, particularly in the matter of tobacco, is that the Christian man who engages in it cannot feel that his business is a benefit to mankind. The highest opinion he can form of it, and that would not bear very close inspection from an enlightened and sensitive conscience, is that it is not as harmful as many forms of business which would be demanded if that did not exist. On the whole the family and the individual deteriorate when engaged in a business where the article cultivated, manufactured, or sold is not a positive beneficent quality. And the more nearly a man comes to giving up his entire farm to tobacco or hops, the more obvious becomes the decline of Christian sensitiveness.

This principle cannot be applied arbitrarily to all individuals. Conscience does not report upon the quantity of an article, except in perfectly conspicuous cases, until the judgment is convinced. And in the sphere of judgment particular individuals have become convinced that certain things are right which others think wrong; but on the principle of induction the number of particular cases that illustrate the tendency to which attention is herein directed would be sufficient, in any scientific investigation, to demonstrate a general law of deterioration of moral and religious tone.—Christian Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Reminiscences.

The article "Friendly Conversations," in No. 51 of THE FRIEND, 1896, attracted the attention of the writer, partly because it was so completely in keeping with his own feelings about that time. Realizing that a group of fellow-professors, at least one thousand miles away, were like-minded, ministered encouragement; and partly because the names of these worthies, the Copes and Bettles, were familiar from having been accustomed to hear them spoken of as worthy of double honor, by my revered parents and their associates.

After 1816, my mother never visited her native place, Chester County, Pa., but once, which might have been in 1835. But my father canvassed that part several times. The last was in 1839, as companion to the late Joseph Edgerton. I cannot omit the following incident, showing the high esteem in which my mother held her friend, Samuel Cope. In my early manhood a report was circulated derogatory to the character of that worthy man, the which, when we heard it in our family, was very afflictive, and my mother, to give us children an idea of her disapproval of it, said to us, "I can no more believe the like of Samuel Cope than you could believe it of Joseph Edgerton or William Kennard," they being Friends in high esteem in our family. Many years ago, my mother and Samuel Cope met each other at Ohio Yearly Meeting, each so nearly blind that they could not tell each other by sight. But I have been told by those who had the privilege of being with them, that it was very interesting and instructive to see and hear the dear old Christians in conversation, they being near one age, I think, at that time, about eighty years old.

That the Cope brothers were a remarkable trio there is no doubt. But I confess that my feelings were not so closely in touch with the young man who expressed it "a pity that such an one could not live to the age of two or three hundred years," as they would have been if he had said, "Is it not a pity that all men do not submit to the influence of Divine grace upon the heart, that they, too, might be as lights in the world, and useful in their day and generation?" for this is, in the opinion of the writer, what made them what they were, and not the number of days and years they lived. Three score years and ten being allotted to man, it is no pity that he lives not longer.

The story of the boy that sold the buttons also attracted attention, being, in its nature, so near of kin to the following incident, in which the writer was, many years since, a participant. While engaged in farming, we went to the harvest field one morning to cut grain awhile before meeting, as in our country the hour for that was eleven o'clock. Myself and son were managing the machinery. The elder of the employes stood in the relation of father, brother or uncle to all the crowd who, with his wife, had been reared up in the Society of Friends, and well used to going to all their meetings. But for reasons best known to themselves, had sacrificed their birth-rights, and were living what they evidently regarded as good, moral lives, making the attendance of meeting a secondary thing. It had evidently been pre-arranged by the hands that they would not go to meeting, for when the proprietor announced that all were at liberty to attend meeting, the ready answer was, "We are not going to-day." My own little boys imperturbed for the privilege of staying in the field, advising that it looked not well for us all to go and leave uncles and cousins in the field at work. They were admonished that there was no reason why we should not go to meeting with the Eternal One. "Come, boys," and to meeting we went. On our return, dinner was made ready as soon as convenient. When all were seated at the table, the elder of those that had remained at work broke the silence by remarking that he felt bound to endeavor to make us, his employers, realize the fact that, on our leaving the field, his mind at once was so overcome with the consideration of the responsibility that he had assumed in setting the example to the junior members of the family, that he had had no peace, and felt that he could do no other than ask our forgiveness, and promise too that, as long as memory held her throne, the like should never happen. Some of us mingled our tears with our meal. It was very interesting to the writer and his wife to meet that brother and his family the next meeting-day at our place of worship, and it was not many months till request was made for their reception into membership, which was hailed by the church with a proportionate degree of approbation, and it is presumed that those parents have not missed a meeting-day since, without good and sufficient cause.

This has always been a pleasant subject to dwell upon in meditation, but never more so than the past summer. The aged sire, being no longer able, by reason of age, to lead the van in the harvest field, has recently taken much comfort in sitting in the shade of the trees in the doorway, and seeing his sons, that were the little boys that imperturbed for the privilege of staying in the field, the third of a century ago, now, having their own sons as assistants, working over the identical territory, and stopping the machinery promptly at the hour, and repairing to the place of worship.

Scripture Illustration.

BY WILLIAM EWING.

"THE HEART OF THE WISE INSTRUCTETH HIS MOUTH."—This form of speech is quite common among the Arabs. That which a man knows by nature, his heart gets credit for teaching him. It takes the place, pretty well, assigned by us to instinct. A man from the wilderness, in presence of his superiors, judge or governor, will often comport himself with a respectful dignity which contrasted most favorably with the bearing of the more educated townsman. In this regard it is said of him, Kalbo yu'llimo ("his heart instructs him"). Many of these children of the wilds have a perfect genius for direction and locality. Give one of them an idea of the "lie" of a certain place. He may never have been there before, and may know nothing of the intervening country, but he will set out thither with cheery confidence. The windings and contortions of the valleys, the multitudinous labyrinthine pathways, which are the despair of the Western traveller, do not cause him a moment's anxiety. With wonderful precision he chooses his way, and duly reaches his destination. In this his brethren say of him "Kalbo yudillo" ("His heart guides him").

"PLEASANT WORDS ARE AN HONEY-COME."—The frequent mention of honey in the Scriptures is evidence of how plentiful it was, and how popular as an article of diet. "A land flowing with milk and honey" was the description of the country which so powerfully attracted the emancipated slaves from Egypt. It must have more than realized their expectations. To this day honey gathered by the wild bees and treasured in crevices of the rocks, is found in great quantities by the experienced Arab. In the tents of the Bed'wy there is no more common dish than honey. With bread and milk, or with fresh butter in season, it is one of the most highly prized articles of diet. Even now, when sugar is neither dear nor difficult to obtain, the Syrians often use honey, especially to sweeten their pastry—an article of diet much too sickly sweet for the Western palate. Honey is often eaten in strange combinations.

Power of a Little Thing.

Not long ago the engineers in charge of the mechanical department of one of the leading railways of Germany had a peculiar problem presented to them. For a long time this problem baffled their efforts at solution. At one particular point on the line a series of disasters had taken place. For these there seemed to be no apparent cause. In spite of the most careful investigation the engineers were unable to determine why these wrecks should take place further than that the rails appeared to be affected in some way so that they were easily broken.

At length the matter became so serious that the government, which in Germany controls all railways, appointed a commission made up of expert engineers to inquire into the difficulty and find out, if possible, the secret of these repeated disasters. This commission made the most thorough examination it could, and even then seemed on the point of failure, when, after nearly six months of careful investigation, it was discovered all at once that the outside of the rails seemed to be rotting. Breaking one of them, the astonishing fact was brought to light that the inside had been eaten as if by an acid, so that its strength was almost entirely destroyed. Following up this clue, the engineers found that the cause of this destruction was a tiny worm of a gray color, almost like a thread in appearance. The head of this peculiar insect was furnished with two minute glands which had the power of secreting a liquid of a wonderfully acid nature. This the worm threw out every few minutes in a tiny spray. So destructive was this acid that after a time it made the hard iron soft and like a sponge, so that it could be easily eaten by the worm. Thus weakened, the rail could not resist the shock brought upon it by the heavy trains passing over it, and soon crumbled under the weight, sending the engine and its load down to destruction.

Those who have worked in stone quarries or who have made a study of the rocks have often found some which have been destroyed by minute creatures boring through them until they were soft and honeycombed, the formation being so weakened that the stone was wholly useless. Such stones are never put into buildings when strength is required.

By the putting on of layer after layer the greatest rock formations are produced. Thus was the rock of Gibraltar made. Grain by grain the sands were deposited one upon another year after year the heat and cold cemented these particles; century after century the water has worn their sides away, and even yet the work of change goes on. So great is the power of these tiny forces. Little by little they do their work, and at last the great result appears.—Edgar L. Vincent in Christian Advocate.

Lights and Shadows of Port Royal.

Little by little the magnetic influence of abbesse Angélique spread throughout the convent, until the old rules of the order were re-established; and though the elder nuns did not always give more than outward acquiescence, the novices responded with earnestness and sympathy, and Port Royal became in a few years a model house. Self-denial was not only inculcated in the teachings of Angélique Arnauld; it was strikingly exemplified in her practice. The restrictions in diet were not imposed upon the nuns until she had first tested their effects upon herself. She reserved nothing for herself or better for herself than others received, and a careful consideration for others was manifested in every particular. Coupled with this was a certain gravity of manner which helped to offset the hard things that her government required or circumstances necessitated. An incident comes to mind which may be in place here: A nun was suffering greatly from a sore hand, so much that she screamed with the pain. Angélique was afraid that her complaints would disturb the other sisters' rest; so she took her to her own room, and then said to her, "Cry out, daughter, cry out! Do not try to restrain yourself. I brought you here to cry out."

Her confidence in the provisions of the Divine Providence is brought to notice in the following anecdote. A wealthy gentleman was looking about for a suitable investment of some of his means, and Port Royal was in need of money. The gentleman inquired of the Mère Angélique what security she could give for the payment of the loan. She replied that she could give the lands of the abbey, which were small, and the Providence of God, which was great. The gentleman accepted the security, and we may believe, had no cause to regret his confidence.

About 1625, the health of the nuns suffered greatly from the unsanitary condition of the house and grounds. Deaths were frequent and "the infirmary was always full." The nuns were disposed to look upon these things as signal evidences of Divine regard; but some of their friends, taking a more rational view of the matter, insisted upon a change. Accordingly a house in Paris was purchased and endowed, and thither the community removed.

When the fame of Angélique's reformation of Port Royal began to spread, she was called upon to do the like good office for the convent of Maubuisson. But here her way was much harder than at Port Royal, and her right was disputed at every step. The older nuns could never be won over entirely; but a band of novices then at Maubuisson, felt the influence of her upright spirit, and became her friends and supporters. Finally, when Angélique was released from Maubuisson, these novices accompanied her to Port Royal. But an unpleasant page of the history comes in shortly after this. Through the high-handed proceeding and impertinent counsels of the Bishop of Langres (then a confessor at Port Royal), another abbesse was elected, and a wholly unworthy and unsuitable woman. "Madame de Pontcarré," gained great influence and liberty in the community, while some of Angélique's best friends were stationed in another convent. Then followed years of persecution and shameful humiliations for Angélique, out of which her strong, pure nature rose unharmed and unchained. This dispensation passed away, and there was "a restoration," not only of the former inhabitants, but of the former spirit and practices of Port Royal. Harmony, fellowship and devotion were again its attributes; industry, quietness and obedience once more prevailed.

Meanwhile there was growing up in Paris, in the lodge built in the court of the Abbot of St. Cyran's house, the nucleus of another illustrious company, afterwards known as the recluses of Port Royal. These were at first composed of the Abbé Singlin (afterwards a confessor at Port Royal), Lancelot, and the two brothers, De Sericourt and De Saci. In the year 1637, they, with a few others, removed to the deserted building of Port Royal des Champs, where they were presently joined by the elder Le Maître, Antoine Arnauld and others. They improved the buildings, and drained and beautified the grounds; they cultivated fine fruits, made wine, and carried on other occupations. But particularly famous were the Port Royal schools, far outstripping in educational value the schools of the Jesuits, while the Port Royal text-books were long in vogue in France and in England. Pascal, who was often in the Port Royal community, so far anticipated the educational reform of recent times, as to adopt or invent a plan for teaching children to read without the previous learning of the alphabet, and we find his sister Jacqueline writing to him for information as to his methods in that particular.

Some allusion has already been made to St. Cyran, as he is called, but whose real name was Jean Duvergier de Hauranne. He was for some years a great spiritual force among the Port Royalists, and his influence probably never disappeared from the lives of most of those members of the community who had partaken of his counsel and sat under his teaching. This influence must have been due chiefly to his superior integrity and discernment; for the style of his address seems to have been severe, and his doctrines not very easy to the natural man. But he was remarkable for his fearless uprightness and his apparent disinterestedness. It is admitted that the best features (if there are any good ones) of the confessional prerogatives were shown by St. Cyran. "You must examine yourself before God," said he, "whether you have really been that which you have made yourself appear. Sometimes extravagance hurries the mind to say what it does not believe, and to pursue what it does not approve." "Beware of exaggeration; there is most humility in a simple confession. One need not examine one's self to remember important sins; their impression is not effaced, for it belongs to the very immortality of the soul."

A controversy existed between St. Cyran and Cardinal Richelieu on doctrinal matters; and as the cardinal found that the abbot could neither be ruled out of his beliefs nor flattered out of his rectitude, he finally had him imprisoned in Vincennes, where he remained until after the cardinal's death in 1642. Closely coupled with the name of St. Cyran was that of Cornelius Jansen—or Jansenius—a member of a Dutch family of very humble rank. These two were students together at the university of Louvain; and afterwards pursued their studies together with extreme diligence and zeal at the home of Hauranne near Bayonne. Still later they began a careful investigation of the traditions and doctrines of the Romish Church, coming unitedly to the conviction that much of what was taught and believed was but the fanciful and deceitful work of the schoolmen, and had not the authority of the early fathers. St. Cyran indeed afterward boldly avowed that there was at that time no church, and had been none for centuries. They went backward therefore in the history of the church for something more trustworthy to rest their faith upon, but unfortunately they stopped at Augustin. His expositions of doctrines seem to have been accepted in their entirety, and Jansenius set about the collating and reviewing of his works. After years of assiduous labor he put forth the fruits of it in a cumbersome Latin work known as the Augustinus. This was the source of a controversy which lasted the remainder of that century, and set in motion a wave of feeling which shook the church to its centre. We may believe the ecclesiastical powers to have been then in something of a quandary. They wished to suppress this work and also to preserve the traditions which had so much hold on the people's minds; but to condemn Jansen's book might be to condemn Augustine himself, which would lead to great embarrassment indeed. But Rome, never long at a loss for some device to bring about her own ends, finally succeeded in so constraining some things in Jansen's book, as to constitute a set of objectionable and heretical propositions, which were asserted to be in the book. It should have been stated that Jansen's great work was not published until after his death, which occurred in 1638. In his will he stated that though it would be difficult to alter anything as concerning his writings, still if the church wished any alteration he was her obedient son. His friends, however, suppressed the will and published the book. When it fell under the papal condemnation, Antoine Arnauld took up the defense, and the other Port Royalists espoused the cause. But such a community at such a time was not likely to remain long un-molested. The recluses were brought under ecclesiastical criticism, and it soon became necessary for Le Maître to issue a defense, from which the following is an extract:

"If for five or six to pray privately to God as they may chance to meet, and using none but the ordinary prayers of the church, be to form such a community as is interdicted by ordinances; if to eat in the same room be to constitute an illegal union; and to read pious books instead of entertaining ourselves with vain and useless talk, be to render those meals profane and illicit; if to live soberly and to make the church's fasts a little longer than common, . . . without in this respect compelling anyone to act thus, and being as far as possible from blaming those who act otherwise; if this be to set a bad example and one pernicious to decency of life, we must needs conclude that what St. Basil calls a more pure and exact profession of Christianity is forbidden in our day; that we are less at liberty to practise solid virtue than are the men of the world to abandon themselves to vice; and that a few persons cannot with impunity serve God, while so many more are permitted without restraint to serve the devil."

CATCHING MONKEYS IN SOUTH AFRICA.—The monkeys are considered a nuisance in South Africa because of their depredations on the vegetable gardens. One method of catching them is rather amusing. They are very fond of pumpkin seeds, so a pumpkin with a small hole cut in it is placed near their haunts. The monkey slips his hand in easily enough, grabs a good fistful of seeds, and tries to withdraw them. The hole is not big enough for the passage of his clenched hand, and he has not sense enough to reason this out; and so whilst he is struggling with the pumpkin he is captured.—E. Clairmonte's Africander.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Lime Deposits of Southern New Jersey.

Southern New Jersey appears to the geologist an interesting and instructive field of inquiry into the changes which have been wrought on the earth's surface by the action of water. This is especially the case in the Marl region, which occupies a strip of country from six to fifteen miles in width, stretching from the ocean below Sandy Hook to Salem on the Delaware.

These marl beds consist of several well marked layers of marl, sand and shells, which lie on each other with much regularity—although the exposures are irregular, owing to the varying thickness of the materials lying above them. One of the most prominent ingredients is the green sand, which consists of small green grains, which were undoubtedly deposited in the ocean, as is shown by so many sea-shells and animals occurring in the deposit. The number of these shells is almost incalculable. For example, there is a bed of one kind—the Terebratulina Harbani—which is ninety miles long, and has proved to be at least a mile wide, and is from two to three feet thick. The whole bed is entirely made up of this species, and they are packed together just as close as they can lie.

Among the inhabitants of the ocean are various species of very minute animals forming calcareous shells. These shells are very small—many times smaller than the head of a pin, yet they have contributed largely to the formation of limestone strata. They consist of one or more cells, and the compound kinds present various fanciful shapes. The Green sand is supposed to receive its shape from having been moulded in these minute shells. The materials of which it is composed are dissolved in the sea-water, and they are combined by a chemical action—whether the grains are secreted by the living animals, or in what way they are formed, is not well known.

The same green earth has been found in the shells of recent animals; and there is reason to believe that in parts of the ocean, especially beneath the gulf stream, a deposit of this kind is now going on; so that it is not improbable that the present marl belt marks the course of an ancient current of warm water, the predecessor of the present gulf stream.

The history of the Marl deposit is an interesting illustration of the manner in which Divine wisdom uses the long confined agency of the very small among his created objects to accomplish wonderful changes in the earth's surface. From the regularity of the beds of the marl, it is probable that they were deposited in deep water, below the disturbing influence of surface agitations.

The marl beds contain layers of limestone and limesand; and a friend having offered to pilot the writer to some of these in the vicinity of Salem, the ninth of Ninth Month was selected for the excursion, and a small party of three took the cars on that day. Our stopping point was about four miles north of Salem, and not more than a mile from the locality we wished to visit. We followed the road till we came to a small stream of water that crossed it, and that flowed through a swampy meadow that skirted a steep bank in which the deposits we were seeking were located.

Below the surface of earth and sand the quarries had come to a strata of limesand, more or less mixed with the silicious sand common to this section of country. Successive layers of the limesand were intermingled with the layers of limestone. We counted about half a dozen of these on the face of the perpendicular bank.

The geological report of New Jersey describes a layer of shells below these and underneath that, the Green Marl, but the excavations here had not been deep enough to reach these, if they existed. A person living in the neighborhood seemed pretty certain that there was no marl there, although it was found in a valley near by. A very large amount of stone had been quarried along the bank of this meadow. It was probably cheaper to follow the edge of the valley than to dig below the general level, or to go farther into the bank, at the cost of removing greater quantities of the overlying earth.

Large piles of the limesand had accumulated near the workings, and an examination of these furnished to our party a number of specimens of broken shells and other marine objects of various shapes, proving that the lime had its origin in the former inhabitants of the ocean. It had probably been deposited at a period when the water had become shallow, by a gradual rise of the land.

Along the low ground bordering the stream of water, there were numerous species of plants, some of them of considerable botanical interest. Among these was the Swamp Loosestrife (Decodon verticillatus), a shrub with bright purple flowers in the axils of its leaves; the Indian Rice or Water Oats (Zizania aquatica), erroneously spoken of in a previous article as Phragmites communis. Lobelia inflata or Indian tobacco, derives its specific name from the inflated seed-vessel. It is a poisonous plant, and some years ago was brought into notoriety by its use as a quack medicine. The delicate fern Aspidium thelypteris grew in the low ground. The fruit bearing fronds are remarkable for the extent to which the edges of the small divisions of the frond are rolled back—revolute. All along the stream grew a plant which is not very common in Southern New Jersey, the Scouring Rush (Equisetum hyemale). The cuticle of the plant abounds in silicious matter, which gives it a harsh feeling, and adapts it for scouring and polishing hardwood, metals, etc. The stems are simple and spear-like, and bear a terminal spike of fruit at their summit. These spikes had now disappeared. A large and very showy plant, with yellow flowers, proved to be the Sneezewort (Helenium autumnale). The rays of the corolla are reflexed, or bent backward, and the stem is winged with the apparent extension of the leaves downward. A bush of about six feet in height attracted our attention by the abundance of white fruit with which it was loaded. It proved to be the White or Pinnated Dog-wood (Cornus paniculata). Growing near it was another species of Dog-wood, the Red Osier (Cornus stolonifera). The small branches of these are red purple in color, and the fruit was a pale lead color. It extends itself by underground shoots, and thus forms broad clumps. We met with several of the Golden Rods—two of which, the Solidago serotina, and the Solidago Canadensis are quite similar to each other, but the stem of one is smooth and the other rough hairy. Another species of Golden Rod was the Blue-stemmed. It is well-marked by having the clusters of flowers placed in the axils of the leaves along the stem. The contrast between the bright yellow of the flowers and the green leaves renders it a beautiful species.

There were numerous other plants noticed—as our list amounted to about eighty species.

We had brought the materials for a lunch with us, and this was enjoyed, seated on the stones about the quarry. A neighboring farmer kindly informed us that his wife designed making some coffee for us—and this also was enjoyed in due time, on our return. The apples lying under the trees of his orchard looked attractive, but he said that after hand-picking them and carting four or five miles to Salem, he could obtain for them only five cents a basket.

The stones and the plants principally engaged our attention, but we saw one of the curious box tortoises which can shut themselves within their shells, and a few birds.

Our kind friend took us to view a fine spring two or three hundred yards from the house. In our walk we passed some chicken grape vines loaded with fruit, which cold weather would make very toothsome, but which as yet retained too much astringency to be very good; also some wild cherry trees with abundance of cherries upon them.

Within a few miles of the spot we were visiting, in digging for marl some years ago, the workmen came across the tusk of a mastodon. It was secured as a prize, but the following morning it was found that exposure to the air had caused it to crumble, so that its value as a specimen was lost. Sometime after, the skull of a mastodon was found in the same neighborhood, whether a remnant of the same animal or not, we do not know. The precaution was taken to coat this with some adhesive substance, which prevented its disintegration. I believe it is now in the State museum at Trenton. To preserve bones which have long been buried, it has been recommended to soak them in a weak solution of glue, which penetrates the pores of the bones and binds the particles together.

The bones of animals may be regarded as composed of cartilage, the basis of which is glue, in the cells of which are deposited mineral substances, mainly phosphate of lime, which give them their hardness and firmness. By long boiling and other means, the cartilage may be removed and the bone left in a chalky condition, so as to be easily broken up. This is what takes place in nature, when bones have long been buried in the earth. Soaking them in glue water in some measure restores them to their original condition.

One of our little party on this excursion has been familiar from childhood with the section of country through which we passed, and has furnished the writer with some details of interest respecting it.

Just north of Oldman's Creek was the home many years ago of a humble minded, consistent Friend named Thomas Lippincott. He never accumulated much property, and had but little education, but possessed considerable natural mathematical ability. His nephew, when a scholar at Wilmington, Delaware, finding his teachers puzzled over a difficult problem, sent it to Thomas Lippincott, and he returned it with the answer worked out by three different methods.

Near Woodstown was the home of that worthy minister, Rebecca Hubbs. She was weak mentally, but when spiritual subjects were introduced in conversation, she would speak as with the assurance of Divine revelation. Like James Simpson

"Filled by her Master, wondrously she shone,
The emptied vessel scarce could stand alone."

Owing to her natural deficiency, Friends were in the way of managing her business, and hen needing a new house they selected as they thought the proper place on her lot for it. She said "No," and chose another spot. As she was in her decision, the house was placed where she desired. When they came to dig the cellar they found a bed of ochre—a variety of iron ore—and enough of it was taken out to pay for building the simple home she needed.

The limestone outcrop we visited was upon a headwaters of Mannington Creek. A similar formation is found on the north fork of Big Timber Creek at Laurel Springs.

Baboons and Ostrich Eggs.

One morning at breakfast we were disturbed by a Kaffir herd, who ran in, calling out, "The baboons are stealing eggs!" Up we jumped, seized our rifles from the gun racks and ran down towards the ostrich camps. One side of the breeding birds' paddocks was bounded by a river, and the baboons had crossed it to the rocky hill on the opposite side. So Barker, je baas, who was a crack shot, crossed over to intercept them, whilst we prepared to tackle them on our side. As usual, there was one eeping watch, and as soon as he caught sight of us he gave the alarm, and off they scampered in the direction of Barker, who was hiding in some bushes.

We fired a few shots, without any effect, and aused to watch the sport on the other side. The baboons, thinking they were safe, began to laugh-in, and their loud bark echoed down the hill-side. Presently a white puff of smoke rolled out of some bushes amongst the rocks, and we saw a large baboon tumble down the hill-side. Another puff—another—and the hole troop scampered up the steep hill at a wonderful pace, to disappear over the brow, joining home to finish our breakfast, we could hear their laughing behind us, as if in derision of our attempt to shoot them. Barker soon arrived with a Kaffir carrying the dead baboon, which was skinned to make whip-lashes for the rock whips.

These raids were becoming a great nuisance as well as a serious loss, for they destroyed quantities of ostrich eggs, which, at that time, were valued at five pounds each. We planned to hunt them the next day, with the assistance of our neighbors, who were also troubled by them. Messages were sent around, and next morning twelve of us breakfasted together, and started, with a dozen dogs, to scour the hills. They are such wary brutes that it takes considerable strategy to get near them.

Having lost our pack, we surrounded another ill, and, with the help of the dogs, succeeded in eeping them on the top. The dogs were amongst them before we arrived, and we could hear a eree fight above us. Scrambling up as fast as e could, we came right into the thick of it. he dog lay dead, and several were bleeding adly from severe wounds. We killed most of em before they could escape—the dogs had ot killed one. It would take a very large and owerful dog to master a baboon, and, in any ase, he would stand a poor chance. These ellows stand about four feet high, with power- ul jaws and arms that hang nearly to their eet. One of them would catch a small dog in ts strong grip, and inserting its teeth in a fleshy art, rip the unfortunate animal to pieces and row it aside. A Cape dog is strong and very game, and will nearly always kill a snake when e meets one. We had another skirmish with a small troop, with good results, and went home satisfied that we would be left in peace for a time.

Baboon-killing is, to me, too unpleasant to be called sport. The resemblance to humanity, though unflattering, is too close. They are the only animals I know that meet one with a look in their eyes of positive, intelligent, human expression, and once, when a female baboon I had shot, put her little black finger in the wound, and drew it out, red with blood, showing it to me, with a piteous look in her eyes and a cry like a hurt child, it made me quite sick, and I felt a kind of pang of conscience.—The Africana.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Is Sulphur Fumigation of Much Use?—No, says the Lancet, unless the articles are wet. Rather let rooms be well washed with corrosive sublimate, using one part by weight to 1,000 of water. Whatever will bear the treatment should be washed in boiling water. Carpets, blankets, etc., which cannot be wetted should be disinfected by dry steam. Corrosive sublimate (one teaspoonful dissolved in two quarts of boiling water) is now much used to prevent rugs, furs, etc., from clothes moths. Camphor is not only very dear now, but has no harmful effect on the grubs, if once the eggs are laid. It only acts by discouraging the curiosity of the egg-laying parent. Hang the articles to be treated on a line, and with a whisk dipped into the liquid and shaken free from excess of moisture brush them well over on both sides, enough slightly to dampen them. The liquid should not fall upon hands or face.

A Mine a Mile Deep all but a Hundred Yards is one of the latest big things. This depth has been reached in the Calumet and Hecla copper mine, the shaft being 224 ft. by 14 ft. in section, and divided into six compartments. It is worked by two pairs of triple expansion engines, of 6,000 horse-power in all. A ten-ton lead is hoisted up in rather less than a quarter of an hour. Few other mines exceed half a mile in depth, although in recent years two or three well-borings have exceeded a mile in depth.

The temperature of this mine has naturally been a matter of much interest, and has been found to be of exceptional character. In English and most other mines and borings there has been an increase of 1° F. for every 60 ft., or so of depth. Temperatures were taken at 165 ft., at 655 ft. (the level of Lake Superior), 1,257 ft., (the sea-level), and at four other depths to 4,580 ft. The utmost care was taken, as was natural in a mine belonging to the great naturalist, Alexander Agassiz. But instead of 60 ft., they find that 224 ft. are needed to give an increase of 1° F. This entirely modifies prevalent ideas as to the temperature of the crust. Obviously, the increase is less uniform than was supposed. If the rate here determined were kept up, the melting point of rocks would be reached at about eighty miles instead of twenty. The difference, perhaps, may be associated with the fact that previous observations have been made in much disturbed regions, like Great Britain, or else in delta regions, where great level changes have been going on. But in Michigan we are dealing with the Archaean or most ancient known sedimentary rock, which have been little disturbed since they were deposited.—The London Friend.

HOSEY BIRD.—Riding out one day with

Smith to collect some ostriches, we noticed a little brown bird, which kept chirping and flitting around us. Smith at once recognized it as the honey bird, and said that, if we were to follow it, it would lead us to a bees' nest. We reined in our horses, and the little bird took a short flight in one direction and back to us again. After it had repeated this manoeuvre several times, we proceeded to follow it; it led us up a klouf, and there, sure enough, in the hollow trunk of a spilboon tree, was a fine bees' nest. We smoked out the bees, and turning our soft felt hats inside out, put in the combs, and canteded home with them, not forgetting, however, to leave some for our feathered guide. This little bird is known to take hoop-ards, baboons and other animals to bees' nests, and it is said that not only do animals know the object of the bird, but they always leave it some honey, or allow it to eat with them.—The Africana.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 3, 1896.

When our Holy Redeemer was personally on earth, he exhorted his disciples "to seek first the kingdom of God," and He taught them, that the man who preferred anything before Him, was not worthy of Him. Indeed there are many texts in the Bible which warn the follower of Christ not to devote himself too exclusively to the accumulation of those riches which perish with the using, or which moth and rust can corrupt, or which may be stolen by thieves.

It is the duty of every one of us to love the Lord above all that He has created; and to seek to be conformed to his holy will so that we may be prepared to enjoy communion with Him in the world to come. We believe the cautions alluded to above refer not only to the accumulation of riches as commonly understood but may be wisely regarded by those whose main object in life seems to be the accumulation of literary and scientific knowledge, or the improvement of their own intellectual faculties. Not that these things are wrong in themselves, any more than the acquisition by honest methods of a reasonable amount of property; but every thing of a worldly or temporal nature must be subordinated to our spiritual interests. These things are useful to us in passing through life, and may enable us to help others in various ways; but they all pass away, and the language of our Saviour is very suggestive: "Many hath chosen the good part, which shall never be taken from her."

It is a common experience of those who live to advanced age, that their memory and other faculties gradually fail with the increase of years, so that even those who have been gifted more than the ordinary class of mortals become as weak in intellect as a child.

A few years ago we attended the funeral of an amiable friend to whom we felt attached, and who had accumulated an uncommon store of botanical knowledge, which he freely dispensed to others. As we sat with the company which assembled on this occasion, the thought presented itself, that with the close of life, his scientific attainments had disappeared, and that the one thing important that remained to him, was the degree in which he had submitted to the visitations of Divine grace, and thereby been brought into fellowship with his Lord and Savior, and prepared for an eternity of spiritual happiness.

It is found to be very helpful to those who are studying any particular branch of science to make collections of specimens which illustrate the facts they wish to remember. Hence we have collections of minerals, shells, animals and plants, which are of great interest and value; and we have no wish to discourage those thus employed. But it is an uncommon occurrence, as old age creeps on, to find such collections becoming a burthen to their possessors, and that relief is sought by donating their accumulations to societies or institutions of learning, where they will be properly cared for and made useful in the instruction of others.

We have no wish to discourage a reasonable pursuit of scientific knowledge, or collection of scientific objects, but in thinking of some of our younger Friends, whose tastes lead them in that direction, we have felt a concern that they may put everything in its proper place, and seek the kingdom of God more earnestly than any other acquisition; and be sufficiently impressed with the force of the query, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" When death comes, what advantage will it be to a man to have established a reputation for knowledge or ability?

("An flattery soothe the dull cold ear of death?")

In introducing to our pages the article on Westphalian Friends, it was stated that it had been translated from the German by our friend William Archut. This was an inference of the editor, arising from the fact that the copy was furnished by William Archut. We are informed that the translation was made by John F. Schnell.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 28th ult., the net gold in the United States Treasury at the close of business stood at $122,045,550. The gold withdrawals at New York amounted to $38,200. This was recalled at New York $2,900,000 in gold in exchange for currency.

The bottom of the Pacific between Hawaii and California is said to be so level that a railroad could be laid for 500 miles without the grade anywhere. This fact was discovered by the United States surveying vessel engaged in making soundings with the view of laying a cable.

The meeting of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company and the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company was sold at auction in this city on the 23d ult., under the decree of the United States Circuit Court in the foreclosure suit brought by the trustees of the general mortgage bonds. The total of the bids was $295,000. The parties were the Philadelphia and Reading organization managers, represented by J. P. Morgan & Co. of New York, who were the only bidders.

Farmers about Ocoeeo, Mo., raise only corn and oats in large quantities, and the merchants in the place have to import potatoes, onion and other small vegetables; while over 100,000 in the neighborhood of Albia, Mo., on a farmer this season has raised 100,000 bushels of white onions, and sold them at 60 cents a bushel.

Piled up in the lumber yards of Marinette and Menominee, Mich., are at present 225,000,000 feet of lumber. Before the season is over the amount in the yards will be over 300,000,000 feet. The lumber is worth, at a conservative estimate, over $5,000,000.

John Wamsucker has purchased the entire business establishment of the firm of Hilton, Hughes & Co., New York, the great dry goods house founded by A. T. Stewart & Co., and will conduct a store in the metropolis on the same premises that have made his Philadelphia house so successful.

Hundreds of millers flying about the electric power of the Pendleton, Ore., Light Company, entered the building through an open window one night, and being drawn by suction under a belt leading to the big dynamo, stopped the machinery and put out all the lights in town.

A despatch from Deadwood, South Dakota, says that the typhoid epidemic in Lead City increases. "Over 200 miners are laid off, and it is almost impossible to find men enough for the mines. Doctors and nurses are being hired in from outside, and still there are scarcely enough well people to care for the sick. The disease is of the most malignant type. A number of cases are reported in Deadwood."

A Springfield (Mass.) despatch says that Mount Holyoke College was entirely destroyed by fire on the night of the 27th ultimo. The main building, all the dormitories and gymnasium went to the ground. Loss, $50,000 to $75,000.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 319, which is 78 less than the previous week and 51 less than the corresponding week of 1895. Of the whole number 178 were males and 171 females; 50 died of consumption; 28 of pneumonia; 27 of heart disease; 21 of malarium; 15 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of apoplexy; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of cancer; 12 of convulsions; 11 of nephritis; 11 of old age; 10 of cholera infantum; 10 of diphtheria; 9 of inanition, and 8 from casualties.

FOREIGN.—On the 24th of last month, Queen Victoria was congratulated upon having occupied the throne longer than any other sovereign in the world. In accordance with the desire of the Queen, the occasion will not be celebrated officially until 1897, when she will have completed the sixtieth year of her reign.

A despatch from London of the same date says: "John Lowles, member of the House of Commons for Haggerston Division of Shoreditch, has written a letter to the Daily News, in which he asserts that the remedy made in London at the meeting held in Shoreditch on the evening of the 21st instant to protest against the massacre of Christians by Turks, were incorrectly reported. Lowles declares that he did not state that he was authorized by the Foreign Office to say that Great Britain was confronted by an agreement between the three Powers that she should not attack Turkey upon any excuse or pretext, she would have to face that combination, and that if she fired a single shot or took action alone, it would mean that at that moment there would be a European war."

At a mass meeting on the 24th of last month, held in Liverpool under the auspices of the Liverpool Reform League, to protest against the rule of the sultan and Turkey at the massacres of Armenians in the Turkish Empire, W. Gladstone made a speech, in which he said: "England has a just right to coerce Turkey, and the first step must be the recall of our Ambassador to Constantinople, and the consequent dismissal of the Turkish Ambassador in London. The resolution which I have just proposed against the rule of the sultan, and does not require, even for the sake of a great end, that we place ourselves in state of war with united Europe. Let us restrict ourselves from our present ambiguous position. Let us renounce our neutrality. Let us, by loyally pronouncing her Majesty's Ministers our unending and enthusiastic support, induce them, and, if necessary, to show the determination of arms which may even yet come to such a depth of atrocity as has never yet been recorded in the deplorable history of human crime." Gladstone's anti-Turkish speech was wired to the Sultan. The press of Europe generally criticise it sharply.

There is high authority for stating that just prior to going to Balmoral, the Czar caused his Ambassador, Nelidof, to report to him specially on the Sultan's moral and mental condition. At the time the order was given Nelidof was absent on leave from his post at Constantinople. The Czar's request points to a consideration of questions whether Abdul Hamid could be trusted to reign quietly under new conditions or must be deposed.

The Dervishes have evacuated the Province of Dongola. A number of Dervish Emirs have surrendered to the Egyptian troops.

Cavendish in the Philippine Islands, is occupied by 15,000 insurgents. Over a hundred monks have been murdered in the islands since the breaking out of the rebellion. Many were burned to death. They were fastened to trees, their clothing having been soaked with kerosene oil and then ignited.

The Spanish Government is making preparations to send 8,000 additional troops to the Philippine Islands at once, and also to increase the garrison on the island of Fernando Po.

A Hungarian named Hertz has patented in France a cheap electrical storage battery, in which the electricity is generated by the vibrations of the transverse rays disclosed by Roentgen's experiments under the presence of a vacuum. The apparatus consists of a caratium can keep twenty lamps of ten-candle power going for eight thousand hours.

By a despatch from San Francisco dated Ninth Mo. 23, it appears that Kobe in Japan was nearly wiped out by a destructive conflagration on Eighth Month, 20th, and floods, storms and earthquakes caused the loss of hundreds of lives. The destruction of millions of dollars' worth of property in Northern Japan. The steamer Doric, from the Orient, brought the news of another series of catastrophes that has befallen the Mikado's realm. In Gifu prefecture 400 houses were blown down, and along the Hiji-Gawa 4,900 persons lost their lives. The severest storms occurred on Eighth Month 30th, after the destruction of millions of lives were lost. At Kobe, after the fire had devastated the city, forty people were swept to their death by the flood. In other provinces the loss of life reached 2,500.

Advices from Jacmel, one of the principal ports of Haiti, which shows an extensive trade with the United States, have the effect that a conflagration that occurred there destroyed three-quarters of the town. The fire-appliances in the place were primitive, and little could be done to check the progress of the fire. Many persons have lost everything they possessed, and the suffering among them is very great. The city has a population of about 6,000.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1855.—Sixth Month 3rd.—I have just been looking over what I was a year ago, and see so little change for the better that I feel almost discouraged. I know sanctification is a gradual work and do sincerely desire that one year more may I have more dedication and obedience to be best of Masters.

Last Fourth-day was Monthly Meeting, Yardley Warner there and spoke. "He that loveth his life shall lose it, but he that hateth his life for my sake, shall keep it unto life eternal." H. spoke against having little idols.

Dear Hannah Gibbons has been very ill, but is now recovering, for which I am very glad and thankful.

Sixth Month 10th.—Dear — said, The consolation of man was almost in vain to soothe the afflicted. "Affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground." It is sent for our good, to wean us from placing too much dependence upon our comforts in this world. "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also." "Lay up for yourselves treasure in heaven." With holy confidence come unto Him and appeal as Hagar did. "Thou God seest me." In time we shall be enabled to see that affliction was for our good. "For all we bless thee most for the severe."

Yesterday was the funeral of a little babe. It being Seventh-day afternoon I could go. Went with Mary and Ann Evans, and to the ground with Phebe Howell; afterwards called to see dear H. Gibbons. She looked so pleasant, said there were three nights in which she did not expect to see the light of another day, but she tried to be resigned to being brought back to this world again. I was telling her that several of the scholars had inquired for her, and she said it was pleasant to be remembered by them. She said she remembered that when a young woman at home, a ministering Friend by the name of Simpson, was at their meeting at West Grove. Her mother did not get an opportunity to invite him home with her and she, but he came to see them the next day. Her mother said, I did not invite thee yesterday, but I thought thee knew where we lived and would come. He said, "Yes, but we like to know we are welcome." After that her mother took care to invite strangers and be polite to them, and she said it felt pleasant to know the children remembered her.

Sixth Month 17th.—Silent meeting. I try to think good thoughts, to thank my Heavenly Father for his continued mercy to me and to ask Him for his blessing. This promise came into my mind just at the close. "Bring all the tithes into the store-house," etc.

Last Fifth-day was Mary S. Parkers's wedding-day to S. Townsend Brown. The meeting-house was crowded at an early hour. A Friend spoke to them so well and to the young people generally, said our Saviour came unto his own and his own received Him not, that some kept Him out till his head was wet with the dew of the night. He explained the excellent way so well that I hoped some few in the curious crowd would be prevailed upon as he desired they should, to make covenant with our Saviour and to obey Him.

Seventh Month 8th.—James Emlen called to ask me a question. He said he thought the nearer we kept to the Divine influence within, the more we would be likely to be preserved; to look to Him who has the care of every thing. I hope he (J. E.) will be supported and sustained through the remainder of his useful life. He does much good, particularly by his example, though he has a very humble opinion of himself.

Eighth Month 19th.—On Fifth-day last was our Quarterly Meeting at Woodbury. It was so good. In the last meeting Ruth S. Abbott, who sat by my side, spoke a few words. I felt that this day's favor was another mercy vouchsafed to me.

19th.—Returned to West Chester, Pa.

26th.—Dear H. Gibbons spoke to day, saying she felt a renewed desire that we might all be working out our own salvation, whilst the day of visitation lasted, for we know not that another day would be ours. Seek earnestly, oftener than the morning, to know the will of our Heavenly Father, though under a feeling of great unworthiness, then He will show us his will and give strength to perform it. She desired those who felt as though it was near the eleventh hour, to remember that the mercy seat was over the judgment seat.

Ninth Month 2nd.—Our dear friends, William and Elizabeth Evans, at our meeting. William spoke so well, saying it was a great blessing that the Holy Spirit continued to strive with us and to show us ourselves just as we are, that we must keep on the watch and follow our Saviour faithfully, then we would grow in grace and have peace. Dear E. appeared in supplication for us. She had been reminded of the fruitless fig tree, and prayed that some might be left alone and be dug about one year longer, might be visited one year longer; they have been transplanted into a garden enclosed, but had not produced fruit.

Ah, cast me not off, most merciful Heavenly Father, be pleased to break the temptations which so hold me; have mercy and I will obey.

Dear Phebe W. Roberts spoke at our Monthly Meeting on Fourth-day. "We none of us know how soon we may be called hence. As the tree falls so it must lie, as death leaves us judgment will find us, therefore it behooves us to be living as the Holy Spirit directs, that we may feel sweet peace and assurance when we come to die. How much more to be desired to live with saints and angels than to sink to a horror of wicked company and eternal misery."

18th.—Yesterday Rebecca Pike, of Woodbury, was buried, she was the daughter of Thomas Seatt-rgood.

30th.—At Birmingham Meeting. Dear Phebe W. Roberts there and spoke of faith; that Daniel in the lions' den had faith, he prayed three times a day with his windows open.

Tenth Month 7th.—Abigail Hutchins-on visiting meetings. Grace Evans and Jeremiah Hacker with her. She spoke of the prodigal. I feel that my Heavenly Father is very merciful to poor me.

30th.—I do wish I could be faithful entirely. Went to a lecture that was not useful. I am sorry.

Twelfth Month 6th.—Dear H. Gibbons spoke to the children in meeting; I think it a favor.

1856.—First Month 6th.—Monthly Meeting. Dear H. Gibbons spoke in the last meeting, quoting, "As the heart paneth after the water brooks, so paneth my soul after thee, oh God."

30th.—Monthly Meeting. So good. Dear H. Gibbons spoke. The business part of the meeting was very interesting indeed. Some had encouraged hiring industry; much good counsel was given, and overseers encouraged to do their duty.

Second Month 12th.—Quarterly Meeting. So good. Dear Phebe W. Roberts asked to have the shutters opened again, and a good meeting we had.

19th.—Water froze one half inch in the school-room by the stove.

29th.—"If you die in your sins, whither I go ye cannot come." I hope to know mine to go beforehand to judgment.

Third Month 2nd.—John W. Tatum spoke, "There is a river the streams whereof make glad the whole heritage of God."

Fourth Mo. 2nd.—Monthly Meeting; Yardley Warner liberated to visit families, I was very glad.

On the fifth, Y. W. with James Emlen, visited this family. Oh! I want to be pure, to be clothed with the white raiment.

19th.—My birth-day; twenty-six year.

Fourth Month 23rd.—Yearly Meeting commenced. Some difficulty about the epistles.

25th.—We had some difficulty, but Elizabeth Pitfield supplicated for us just then, and it was quieted.

Fifth Month 4th.—Dear Sarah Mott from Ohio, at meeting. "Then they that feared the Lord spoke often one to another," etc., (was her text).

11th.—Such a good meeting. A friend spoke, and dear H. G. in supplication. "Oh Lord God, be pleased to help and strengthen me to become a fool for thy sake, that I may wear a white garment and go to heaven."

28th.—Monthly Meeting. Walked to Birmingham, had good, contrite feelings. I hope to be humble. "Build the wall over against our own house." "When my father and my mother forsake me, the Lord will take me up."

Sixth Mo. 29th.—Dear H. G. spoke, "When the poor and needy seek water and there is none, and their tongues faileth for thirst. I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel, will not forsake them." So good. Time is passing and I have a great many favors vouchsafed to me, but I am afraid I am not faithful. Oh! that I could be more obedient to my Heavenly Father, that I could watch every minute. I do want to take up the cross that I may feel favor and acceptance with Him who has a right to my whole heart.

Seventh Month 18th.—Closed school for six weeks. Came to town in the stage.

Ninth Month 5th.—J. G. and sister here to tea. When I hear persons making fun and laughing about others, I am sometimes strongly tempted to laugh or join in, but I hope I may be preserved from doing so, for I always feel so sad if I do. I wish I could have courage enough to bear the cross. Holy Saviour bear with me, forgive me and make me holy and thine.

I have been having a very pleasant time since coming back. School is satisfactory, but yesterday afternoon instead of thirty there were only three scholars. A great "Fremont" meeting carried them all to the woods.

One evening last week we were invited to E. Howell's to tea. They have a poor little colored girl who is far gone in consumption; they are so kind to her. We had a real pleasant, visit and rose home in the moonlight.

The next day we were invited to J. G.'s to spend the evening and to meet their minister (Episcopalian). They had often spoken to us of him and wanted us to see him. There were many others of their society present and when the evening ended in prayer, we felt a little by ourselves, for we could not do as they did. I almost always refuse to go there, if I can find any suitable excuse, but this time I could not. She is a very kind and pleasant woman, often wants me to come, more than I do, but there is not a congeniality of feeling. I will tell thee what I like best of all; to sit down in the corner and hear good old Friends talk; that is the best. They won't tempt me to run into the fashions and customs of the world. We cannot always have what we like though, for we have our duties to perform to everybody.*

WHITE-NECKED CROW.—Another great pest is the bird which we call the White-necked Crow. This bird, which is much larger than the common crow, picks up a stone in its claws, and breaks the ostrich eggs by dropping it on them from a considerable height. It then flies down and devours the egg.

*The late Eli K. Price, a prominent lawyer of Philadelphia, who lived to an advanced age, not long before his death, in speaking of the Society of Friends said, "Your safety lies in keeping to yourselves. If you mix with the world you will lose your strength with your distinctive peculiarities."

Lights and Shadows of Port Royal.

By the year 1648, the company of nuns having become too numerous for their accommodations in Paris, and Port Royal des Champs being by this time quite habitable again, Angélique led thither a joyful band, though leaving some sorrowing in the Paris house. The return to the valley was the occasion of great demonstration by the poor people to whom Angélique had dispensed alms in former years. The gentlemen then retired to Les Granges, a farm-house near by, and the two companies were practically cut off from each other. The recluses had this great advantage over the nuns (though the latter may not have recognized it); they were not bound by the regulations and limitations of any order, and they had imposed upon themselves no vows; but, actuated by a common interest and a unity of purpose, they lived together, retired from worldly scenes; practising penances and mortifications, cultivating the orchards, the gardens, and the vineyards with their hands, and doing battle for their faith with their pens. About the middle of that century, the inmates of the two establishments numbered, I believe, near three hundred, perhaps more.

The next year after the return of Angélique and her companions to Port Royal des Champs, the first of the wars of the Fronde broke forth, and the secluded monastery was by no means exempt from a participation in the horrors which they brought with them. The surrounding peasantry flocked to the convent. An extract from Angélique's letter to her sister will best describe the conditions and the events of that period. "Our wretchedness is very pitiful. War is a horrible scourge. It is a wonder that both human beings and animals have not perished through being shut up so long. We had horses, both in our chamber and over against us in the chapter-house; and there were some forty cows, which belonged to us and our poor people, in a cellar. The court was quite full of hens and turkeys, ducks and geese. Our church was so full of wheat, oats, peas and beans, of household utensils and all kinds of clothes, that we had to walk over them to get into the choir; the bottom of which was also filled with the books of our gentlemen. There were besides, ten or a dozen nuns which had taken refuge with us; all the female servants of the farms were inside, all the male laborers without; the farm buildings were full of wounded men, the press-room and the offices crowded with animals. In short, if it had not been for the great cold, I think we should have had the plague.

Everything here is beyond price, so great has been the pillage. In short, it is very pitiful to see the poor country. I did not intend to have told you all this, but I was quite full of pity and concern, and so I have said it insensibly."

But it was not alone for her friends that Angélique cared. Enemies also partook of her benevolence; and Charles Beard says, "The Christian precept to love one's enemies has rarely been more triumphantly vindicated."

At the time of the second Fronde most of the nuns retired to Paris for safety, and "the gentlemen" of Port Royal des Champs proceeded to fortify the place and drill themselves for warfare; but the calming and persuasive voice of De Lari prevailed in favor of non-defense. In 1655 the sisterhood returned to their country place, which by this time had been enlarged and improved. It was during the second conjuncture in Paris that Jacqueline Pascal joined the community as a permanent member, and no account of Port Royal would be complete without some portraiture of her character. Her life closed at thirty-six years, and she was for only a few years a part of this remarkable sisterhood, yet in that short life and in those few years she inscribed upon the tablet of history "a memorial and a name, better," it may be, "than of sons and of daughters." That cry of a besieged conscience, that agonized appeal in behalf of truth and liberty, embodied in her famous "Letter on the Formulary," remain to testify that the life which went out in suffering and sorrow, dispensed an influence like the savor of a sweet-smelling sacrifice. Her childhood was marked by precocity of intellect, with strong poetic tendencies; the evidences of which are still preserved in her biography. How much these poems have gained or lost by a change of tongue it is difficult to tell; but supposing even the sense only to be retained in the following extract from stanzas written on the death of a Hugonot lady, it may be taken as some indication of her depth of feeling and her charitable nature:

"Day by day her dearest care
Was to serve the Lord by prayer.
Could her faith so fruitful be
If it were not given of thee?
Shall the zeal thou didst bestow
Sink her in eternal woe?"

In my dim and sinful state,
Lord, I cannot penetrate
Secrets that my wisdom hides,
But thy goodness yet abides;
And thine equitable will
Is with mercy tempered still."

But it is not the precocious, poetic child, nor the mystic maiden seeking solitude; but the clear-headed, conscientious, courageous woman, that commands our admiration. Vinet, the Swiss Protestant, says that Madame Roland could have taught her nothing. She took her place at Port Royal at about the opening of that long period of persecution which has already been mentioned, and which may be further described now. Jansenism, as we have seen, was in favor with the theologians of Port Royal, although many—especially the women—of the community had not read the Augustinus. The Port Royalists were all, or nearly all, disciples of St. Cyran's school, and St. Cyran evidently accepted Jansen's interpretation of Augustine. The Jansenists maintained that the five condemned propositions were not to be found in the Augustinus in the sense understood, or professedly understood, by the court of Rome, but they were willing to condemn the doctrines taken in a heretical sense. They granted that the Pope could pronounce judgment as to the orthodoxy of a theological tenet, that being within his supposed pontifical function; but they claimed that a decision as to matters of fact, appealing to reason and intellectual knowledge only, was no part of that function exclusively. The king, Cardinal Richelieu and the Jesuits, were all on the side of the Pope and against the Jansenists. A formulary, condemning the said five propositions, was given to priests, nuns and schoolmasters to sign, under penalty of imprisonment and interdiction of the sacraments. Most of the nuns of Port Royal were uncompromising. They held it perjury to put their names to a paper which condemned a work they had never read, inasmuch as the condemnation contained a statement to the effect that the heresy was to be found in Jansen's work. One of their number, the Countess of Brégy, said, "The king cannot ve us belief in a disputed fact. That is out "his province and beyond his power."

About the first move in the series of prosecutions against Port Royal was an order for the rearing up of the schools and the dispersion of the recalcitrants. The impending storm was for the most averted, however, by the occurrence of a peculiar circumstance known as the "miracle of the Holy Thorn." It was averred and devoutly believed that a little niece of Jacqueline Pascal, then at Port Royal, had been cured of serious disease of the eye by the application of the relic; and so confidently was this wonderful cure attested by physicians and others, that even some Protestants have seemed almost to tremble at it, though it is to be accounted for or has been in some degree (at least), on rational and physical grounds.

But the peace thus procured for Port Royal as only temporary, for the enmity of the Jesuits was not to be thus easily allayed. Antoine Arnould had written a book which cost him his face in the Sorbonne, and the publication of which was followed by what has been wittily called "a period of invisibility" on his part. Indeed, the well-known opposition of his family to the Jesuits has been termed the "original sin of the Arnoulds." It was at this juncture that the famous "Provincial Letters" of Pascal made their appearance; the first being in defense of Arnould, and others exposing the dissimulation and corrupt practices of the Jesuits. Amusement, astonishment, triumph and discomfiture, were the several effects of these letters. They were satires of the keenest and most effective kind, and formed a contribution to literature of no inconsiderable value. Macaulay accredited with saying that the Provincial Letters and the social letters of Madame de Sevigné were the only two "perfect pieces" of modern literature. The latter—contemporary with Pascal and a friend of the Port Royalists—warmly appreciated Pascal's "Letters." They were written, too, at a time when the French language had not reached its present development; yet Pascal's style was so pure and simple, that, it is said, there is not a word in the Provincial Letters that has since become obsolete. Concerning their literary value, Sir James Stephen went so far as to say that "in the whole compass of literature, ancient as well as modern, there is probably nothing of the same kind that will bear comparison with the Provincial Letters." As to their permanent effect upon the standing and influence of the Jesuits, there is not entire unity of opinion; at Father Hyacinthe, of the Free Catholic Church of France to-day, gratefully acknowledges the services of the Jansenists in overthrowing the power of the Jesuits at that time.

The letters were printed anonymously, but the authorship was soon suspected, and Pascal also had to "go into hiding." The lively, cutting irony of the Provincial Letters seems somewhat out of keeping with his serious and strongly poetic character, but a tendency to witicism was mainly a part of his nature. He has been called "an ingenious self-tormentor;" and indeed sufferings of one kind or another seem to have come thick and fast into his short life. Great physical pain, resulting from disease, he would not accept as sufficient chastisement, but must upon himself further penances of his own devising. Even his sister Jacqueline, nun that she was, was provoked by his monkish disregard for cleanliness to send him the following epistle. "I have been congratulated," said she, "upon the fervor of devotion which has lifted you so far above the ordinary customs that you consider a house a superfluous piece of furniture. I think that for some months at least, you should try being as clean as you now are untidy, in order that you may show that you can succeed in humble and vigilant care of the body (which is your servant), as well as you have succeeded in humble negligence of it. After that, if you again find it glorious and edifying to others to be dirty, you can do so; especially if it be a means of holiness, which I very much doubt. St. Bernard did not think it was."

(To be concluded.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Cultivating and Dealing in Tobacco.

Having twice seen very lately the printed statement that more than fifteen hundred members belonging to North Carolina Yearly Meeting are either engaged in raising or dealing in tobacco, or in its manufacture, or personally use it, I should have discredited the statement had it appeared in numerals, where the error of a single cipher might have augmented an intended total ten times. This desolating alliance I believe must be attended by much moral loss to the body attacked and cankered by it, if it be not soon broken away from.

It was a curious telegram from Reading, Pa., which was printed in a daily paper yesterday, that the principal of the High School in that city had had a conference with one hundred of the parents of his pupils, in the course of which he told them that they must assist him "in breaking up the wicked and nefarious habit of smoking cigarettes," which was killing their boys. He advised, however, that they should be urged to use cigars as a substitute, and, the despatch says, he had already made a beginning in smoking with the scholars! It is evident that his objection to the habit was grounded on no moral foundation.

Only yesterday I had an experience in this connection which I believe it will be proper for me to mention here. Some one had sent me awhile ago the business card of a city tobacco dealer, the language printed upon which was exceedingly vile. I had thought of simply sending the card with a letter of complaint to the Superintendent of Police, but finally concluded it would be my duty to go down to the store of the dealer, which I found to be far down in the southern part of the city, half a dozen squares below our county prison, known by the local Indian name of Moyamensing. In the show-window of the tobacconist, the vile picture cards which the heart of the manufacturer and the dealer in cigarettes so delight in, were to be seen, while within upon the walls were suspended scores if not hundreds of similar productions. One or two men in the back part of the store were engaged in rolling cigars or cigarettes. My attention, however, was particularly drawn to the two words in raised porcelain letters upon the glass of the bulk window—"Esterbrook's Pens." Ah, I thought, if the worthy elder whose name was so conspicuously blazoned there could have used the stout cane which was his so constant companion, in the way that he would have liked, how quickly he would have shattered the ignoble association!

Little more than a square away is a large public school-house. School children need pens, and the children's Economy often puts it into the hearts of very young children to hanker after cigarettes, and the dealer has his alluring pictorial poison bait to go with the packages of these. I went at once to the school-house and had an interview with the principal, who, unexpectedly, I found to be a woman. Repeatedly the picture cards had been found in possession of the boys, and they had always been taken from them. This incident seems to be the complaint from all the public schools. The Superintendent of Police was then seen, and the matter placed in his hands, the proximity of the school-house to the source of baleful supply being especially noted.

I think it probable that not a child in that public school, or any child in the families of that immediate neighborhood was a Friend. But it is indeed occasion for great regret, knowing as most of our members must know, something concerning the immorality associated with the manufacture and general traffic in the weed, as well as the expensiveness of the habit of using it and the physically bad effects of the practice, that any of us should be found promoting the evil.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Through Jungle and Desert.

This is the title of a book of travels in Eastern Africa recently issued from the press. The adventures whose experiences are recorded in it, were Wm. Astor Chanler, a young American, and Ludwig von Höhnel, an officer in the Austrian navy. Both had had previous experience in African exploration, and were animated by a singular zeal to extend the boundaries of civilized knowledge by penetrating into the regions south of Abyssinia, and to the north of the usual routes from Zanzibar to the great lakes which form the source of the Nile. They knew the hostile character of the Somali who inhabit much of that country, but believed they could succeed by approaching that land from the south. After making elaborate preparations, they selected the river Tana as the most desirable route. One of the great difficulties of African exploration is the transportation of the goods with which a caravan is furnished—such as ammunition, food and trading goods. For this purpose bearers are engaged at Zanzibar, who are mostly slaves to the Arabs residing there, and are paid so much a month from the time they are absent from home. They have certain peculiarities which render them unreliable and a sore trial to the patience of their employers. One of these is a tendency to desert, which our travellers often experienced, and which finally broke up the expedition—the bearers nearly all leaving in a body, when some hundred miles in the interior. Before this, von Höhnel had been badly wounded by a rhinoceros, and sent to the coast for medical treatment, and Chanler was compelled to destroy or leave behind about nine thousand dollars' worth of goods, and with a few men march back.

The personnel of the caravan consisted of one hundred and thirty bearers and a number of personal attendants, Swahili soldiers, two Somali who were to care for the camels, etc. Camels, donkeys, horses and cattle were purchased in aid in transporting baggage. But most of these soon perished from the poisonous bites of the tsetse fly.

The ascent of the Tana River was made tedious by the absence of any definite path, which often compelled them to cut their way through a thick growth of thorny bushes. On one such occasion, our author states that two of them, armed with knives, at the end of five hours' hard work, had proceeded less than half a mile. "The growth through which we cut our path was the most tangled jungle imaginable, and armed at every point with sharp thorns. Added to this were innumerable red ants, called by the natives "boiling water." Before we had been in the jungle fifteen minutes, we were covered with them, and bitten from head to foot. It was dark before we gave up the attempt to cut the road."

A large amount of goods and provisions had been sent up in hired canoes to the head of navigation on the Tana River, at this post, a depot was made, and after a time of rest, the main body of the caravan continued its journey in a northern course. They met with much game, which furnished them with food in addition to the stores they carried with them. Elephants, hippopotamus, rhinoceros, antelope and giraffe were encountered. The caravan was frequently charged by rhinoceroses, and some of the party were often endangered by these angry animals. Chauler mentions a narrow escape he himself had. When endeavoring to stalk a small herd of zebra and giraffes, he noticed at a distance of two hundred yards a solitary rhinoceros placidly feeding, and went on without disturbing him. A shrill whistle from his men soon after aroused his attention. The animal on scenting him had started in pursuit, and the whistle warning Chauler of his danger, gave him just time to leap on one side and avoid the rush of the animal.

Of a forest of acacias, through which they past, he says, "It was literally alive with rhinoceroses which charged the caravan at almost every turn." Lieutenant von Hohnel did not escape so well as his fellow-traveller. When they were pursuing a herd of elephants, they were charged by a rhinoceros. Upon hearing it approach, Hohnel, who had his rifle in his hand, waited before firing, until the brute presented a fair mark; but as it approached, the men with him became nervous and ran across his line of fire, which prevented him from shooting. When the animal came to close quarters, he attempted to hide behind a tree, but found that two or three of his men had already taken possession. When he decided to fire, in raising his gun to his shoulder, it caught in the branch of a tree, and at that moment the nose of the rhinoceros struck him in the stomach, and bore him to the earth. The beast trampled upon him and struck him with his horn, making a ghastly wound in his thigh, and clipping off a bit of the thigh bone.

As soon as he was knocked down, the fox terriers that accompanied the party, ferociously attacked the rhinoceros, and diverted its attention to themselves, thus saving the life of their master. They were hundreds of miles from the coast and a doctor, but the wounded man was safely conveyed there, and ultimately recovered. Two others of the company were struck by these animals, one of whom survived, and the other died.

In the course of their march they came to an extinct crater, much visited by the natives for the sulphate of magnesia which it contained. Salt is a scarce article in many parts of Africa, and the longing for saline matter must be considerable, when it induces people to use Epsom-salt as a substitute.

One night the camp was alarmed by the outcries of the night-watch, who were startled by what they took to be a large body of men crawling towards the camp for the purpose of making an attack. The men sprang to their feet, loaded their rifles, and screamed with excitement. It was found that the attacking party of savages consisted of a horde of apes, which had probably been attracted by the fires, but made off at once on hearing the uproar.

On reaching the country occupied by the Wamsara, they endeavored to trade with them for food. But these people, who had not long before cut off a caravan of Soudanese, seemed more disposed to get their goods by force than by traffic—and a running fight was kept up for several days, until they had passed through their territory. The next tribe was the Embe, who were more peaceably inclined.

The old men seemed to possess the principal authority among them. As an illustration of their judicial proceedings, a case is related in which a man who had a flock of ten goats was accused by a neighbor of having stolen two goats from him. The old men of the neighboring villages assembled to discuss the matter. They spent five days in considering the case, during which time two goats per day were needed for their subsistence—which were furnished by the defendant. When they found his stock had become exhausted, they adjudged the case in his favor, and forced the plaintiff to pay him two goats for having accused him falsely.

The unit of value among the Embe is a goat. For example, a donkey might be considered as worth six goats, and in trading for it, six small sticks would be produced, and as the value of each goat was tendered, whether in iron, wire, beads or cloth, they would put aside one of the sticks, and repeat this action until the full value of the donkey had been accounted for.

After passing the country of the Embe, our travellers pushed on till they met with the Rendile—a numerous and warlike tribe, who possessed large flocks of camels, donkeys and goats. They hoped to be able to purchase pack animals of them, which would enable them to explore the country still further. With their chiefs they went through the ceremony of making "blood brotherhood," but their efforts to trade were unavailing. Under these circumstances they resolved to make an effort to find another tribe of whom they could purchase beasts of burden, and retreated from the Rendile country to an oasis named Seran.

THE TESTIMONY OF EXETER MONTHLY MEETING CONCERNING OUR FRIEND SAMUEL EMBREE, SON OF MOSSES AND MARY EMBREE.

He was born at little Egzharbour the sixteenth of the Eighth Month, 1717, and brought by his Parents when young into Pennsylvania. He was educated in the Principles of Friends, but in his young years was given to Vanity, as himself hath several times related, but through the operation of Divine grace came to know a Victory over it, and about the forty-fourth year of his age found it his duty to teach others; his gift in the Ministry was not large, yet tended to Edification. [He] was concerned in visiting Families both at home and abroad, whose labour of Love we believe was Exceptionable. He was a diligent attender of meeting both for Worship and discipline when of ability of Body, and Exemplary in Humble waiting. A good Husband, a tender Father, an honest and peaceable man and well beloved by his Neighbours, and given to Hospitality. His last sickness, which continued some weeks, he bore with patience, expressing resignation to the will of the Lord, either in life or Death.

He departed this life the twenty-fourth, and was buried at Reading the twenty-seventh of the second Month, 1777. Aged fifty-nine years and some months. A minister about fifteen years.

The Baby's Bank.

It was a little tin affair, which a relative of the family had given to a three-year-old girl in Montreal, and into it she had dropped her first savings. She was looking forward to Christmas, and thinking what beautiful things her pennies would purchase by and by. So one by one she dropped them in, until her bank seemed to her to treasure up untold wealth.

One day her father came in. He had been a respectable resident of the city, kind and loving, a good husband, a tender father, but he had looked upon the wine when it was red, he had fallen under the spell and curse of strong drink, and so one day he reached up and took down the little bank.

"Don't take my Kismas money, papa," pleaded the little child, with tears.

But in spite of her entreaties, the father robbed the little tin bank of the twenty-six cents the baby's little tin; and disregarding her tears and cries, he strolled away, independent and indifferent. An hour later his heavy-hearted wife found him in a neighboring saloon, roaring drunk on liquor bought with his baby girl's first Christmas money!

This is what drink does to fathers and mothers and children. This is the outcome of the "social glass," of the "good times" which men enjoy who "tarry long at the wine" and are "mighty to mix strong drink." "At the last it biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder." It quenches the light of love, it stings the soul with remorse. It hardens the heart against all the tenderness of parental and filial and conjugal love. It makes man a savage, a brute, a demon, and turns him loose upon the world to crush and ravage and destroy. For drink a man will rob his child of her pennies, will steal his baby's shoes, will squander his household treasures, will break his wife's heart, will sink down into degradation and crime, and finally into "the blackness of darkness forever."

The safe thing to do is to "resist the beginnings of evil," to spurn the cup, to flee from the tempter, to cast down the deadly draught, and to seek in the fear of God, in sobriety and temperance and righteousness, to walk uprightly and escape the snares of Satan here, and the damnation of hell hereafter.

"Slavery and death the cup contains,
Dish to the earth the poisoned bowl;
Suffer that silk are iron chains
Compared with those that chafe the soul!"
Christian Safeguard.

The following thoughts from a tract written we know not by whom, but published by the Society of Friends, are worthy of consideration "Should I plead the example of good men under the shadowy dispensation of the law; for instrumental music, "We might on the same ground justify other practices not sanctioned by the Gospel. As it is our privilege to live under a more spiritual and perfect dispensation so it is our duty to look to Him who is the Christian's perfect pattern, and in his example o that of his apostles, we shall find no authority; for recreation or pastimes of a musical character. . . . Surely no one can seriously believe that the melodious sounds proceeding from an inanimate organ will be regarded as acceptable worship by Him, who delights in the sacrifice broken hearts, and contrite spirits, even though uttered in the homely language of the poor publican. Then why is it introduced? Is it not to cleanse the itching ears of the superficial Christian professor? Music does not appear to have been in houses of worship until nearly midnight darkness had overspread the professing Church, when about the year 660 it was introduced by Pope Vitalian. It then became a component part of the half Jewish, half heathen robe of gorgeous and imposing ceremony with which the Church sought to adorn herself, when she had nearly lost the beautiful garments of purity, simplicity and spirituality in which she was originally arrayed by her Divine Founder.—The Christian Advocate.

Belief in God Among the Africans.

To believe that there is a God who has made all things, who gives us life and takes life away, we do not need to be educated. The heathen, who have no conception of education or theology, who do not even know one written sign from another, who have no characters to represent ideas, are quite convinced of his existence, although they call Him by as many different names as they speak languages. The natives of Liberia call God "Niswa." They believe He is ever near, and sees them and knows all they are doing.

They always call upon Him to witness when offering a sacrifice or judging a "palaver" (a dispute of any kind) or a trial. In case of trial by drinking "sawwood," the victim, before taking the poison, thus calls upon God, with eyes uplifted, to bear his solemn statement to the people, "God, thou knowest that I am not guilty. I have not committed this crime. Thou, who knowest the truth, knowest that I am not the guilty party. Therefore, I am not afraid to drink this 'sawwood.' I know that I might lie to this people and deceive them, but I could not deceive Thee, and if I were guilty this 'sawwood' would kill me." Thus they drink it, not fearing the deadly poison, but believing that the All-seeing God will prove their innocence, and make known the truth.

In case of sudden death or any terrifying calamity, the heathen call upon the unseen God, "Niswa," not upon their idols. The Scriptures truly say, "For God hath shown it unto them." I have come into direct contact with the heathen, and have observed how much confidence they place in the Almighty God. Although, in all their homes they have idols that they worship, and although all wear charms and trust in their grues-grues, yet when danger or trouble comes, they look to Him, believing that He alone can help them. This has given me new light on many passages in the Bible, and I have said of a truth, "God hath showed it unto them," for there was no other source whence they could have received such light and knowledge.—Agnes McAllister.

HANDLING "CRACKED PLATES."—Broken hearts get all too little sympathy from the busy world. It is so easy, when the "other fellow" is stricken, to make the blow heavier by untimely censure, by studied aloofness, or by evident lack of sympathy. It is so hard for some men to find time to be kindly and really sympathetic. The Jamaica negro, in abject sorrow, cries plaintively, "Put me down softly,—me a cracked plate!" And his cry is echoed by many a broken heart very near us, yet far off and sorrowing the more because of our heedlessness to its long cry.—Late Paper.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
"HE GIVETH RICHLY."

O Lord, how perfect are Thy gifts divine,
That speak of thee to every listening soul!
How wondrously the ordered seasons roll!
What beauty overflows this world of Thine,
At noon, and noon, and eve, of shade and shine!
What hues and tints, of sky, and leaves, and flowers!
What stars, and tender moon, for midnight hours!
What answering chords, within this heart of mine,
Stirring to beauty's undertone, to song,
Of every sensate creature Thou hast made,
To voice of wind, and ocean's chorus strong,
And silver streamlet, babbling in the shade,
Oh may thy praise my choicest powers employ!
Thou "givest richly all things to enjoy."

SPIN CHEERFULLY.

Spin cheerfully,
Not tearfully,
Though wearily you plod;
Spin carefully,
Spin prayerfully;
But leave the thread with God.
The shuttles of his purpose move
To carry out his own design.
Seek not too soon to disapprove
His work, nor yet to assign.
Dark motives, when with silent tread,
You view each sinner fold;
For, lo, within each darker thread
There twines a thread of gold.

Spin cheerfully,
Not tearfully,
He knows the way you plod;
Spin carefully,
Spin prayerfully,
But leave the thread with God.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Short Account of John Graham

WHO DIED AT BIRMINGHAM, ENGLAND, ON THE TWENTY-SEVENTH OF NINTH MONTH, 1867.

Although nearly thirty years have passed away since the death of this dear Friend, in the prime of his days, yet his memory is blessed to not a few who knew him and loved him, and it is believed that a short notice of his quiet, watchful life and triumphant close may prove instructive to the readers of THE FRIEND. The preparation for the service of his Lord and Master was evident, in the latter part of his life, to those with whom he was most nearly associated, and the close exercises of his mind on his own account and on that of the Church, found expression during his last illness, and might be called messages of interest and of warning to the religious Society of which he was a thoughtful and observant member.

John Graham was born at Brileleik, near Cockermonth, Cumberland, on the twenty-eighth of Tenth Month, 1830. His father soon afterwards moved to another farm a few miles further north, near Wigton. Both these early homes were situated on the high ground which rises from the river Cocker on one side, and from the Solway Firth on the other; a fine prospect of Skiddaw and other mountains belonging to the English lake district, being visible on the south, and on the north the view is far-reaching, of Criffell and many ranges of hills in the Scottish lowlands.

It may be that this early was engendered and fostered that love of nature in her gentler and sterner moods which was afterwards a pleasing characteristic; and hill and valley, mountain and moor, fern and flower, had each lessons for him of the power and goodness of their Almighty Creator.

After spending two or three years at the Friend's School at Wigton, in Cumberland, where he made the most of the opportunities at his disposal, he lived for a few years at Birmingham, where he learned the business of a grocer with his elder brother. Here he improved his mind in his leisure hours, and studied botany and other branches of science—the self-culture thus commenced only ending with his life. In the summer of 1853 he joined another brother as partner in a business at Preston, in Lancashire, one of the centres of the cotton industry, and here he resided for the next thirteen years. He evinced much interest in the mill operatives, and his sympathies were much called forth by their distress during the cotton famine in 1863. For some time he taught a class in the First-day school, and, with three other teachers, compiled a selection of religious poetry, that the scholars might have suitable pieces to recite, and with his characteristic care, exerted his influence that none should be admitted that were not sound in sentiment. During his last illness, he remarked that he had long striven as a First-day school teacher to understand the Bible, but that it was alone, at his place of business, where the early hours of the morning were generally spent, that the true meaning of the Scriptures was often unfolded to him, and the fulfilment of the promise respecting the Comforter known, "He shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you."

He frequently wrote descriptions of natural scenery and other interesting information he gained whilst travelling, to his younger relatives, and extracts from these letters show the thoughtful and reflective character of his mind. During a journey in North Lancashire, not far from Uverstone and Swarthmore, he writes, "I went to see Furness Abbey about three weeks since. It is now a beautiful pile of ruins and must have been a very splendid building when in its glory, about six hundred years ago. I think it was founded by King Stephen before he was made king of England. The monastery was endowed with great power by him and filled with monks, who led very austere lives. It is situated in a vale called B-kaungstill, which means the glen of deadly night-bade, which, however, is a very pretty place, although it has such an ugly name."

In 1854, he describes some of his experiences on the Cumberland Mountains: "I reached Windermere about eleven o'clock on Sunday, the thirty-first ult. I went direct to Bowness, a village on the banks of Windermere Lake, went on board a steam yacht, and sailed up the lake to Waterhead, near Ambleside, from which town (after I had dined) I set off on a mountain tour, with a walking-stick in my hand, a map, compass and glass in my pocket. I was soon toiling up the steep sides of Nabsar, immediately behind the house in which Wordsworth lived and died. The first picture which presented from the breast of the mountain was the beautiful vale of Rydal, endowing its lake and smiling with unusual freshness, for it had that morning been well watered with showers. As I advanced, Windermere Vale, with its lake (the largest in England) began to open out. The lake is ten miles in length, on it are several beautiful islands, and on one of the islands a house is built. Before I had gained the top, Garsmere Vale, with its lovely lake, in which is one small island, spread out beneath me. A hut has been built on this island among a clump of trees. I think it was L. P. Sigourney, who, in writing of it, makes a beautiful comparison:

"Which, like an emerald chasped
In crystal sleeps."

"The morning had been showery and overcast, now the sun had broken out, and the clouds were gathered into white patches, as we frequently see them in sultry weather. It was very hot, so I pulled off my coat, and wound my way upwards, sometimes on smooth ground, sometimes among crags, often stopping to gather the 'heather,' which was 'bonnie wi' bloom,' or scramble up a rocky precipice for some curious fern. Fairly at the top, the prospect was splendid.

"But the top of Nabscar did not satisfy me. Fairfield, rising still higher, was before me. He had 'doff' the cloudy cap which shrouded his head when I saw it last from Ambleside—or rather when I saw its position, for I could not see his head through the cloud. Towards Fairfield, I turned, and soon reached the top, sometimes disturbing the sheep, which, with their lambs, grazed among the crags, where their food is much more scanty than on the lower parts of the mountain—but they are fond of being high up. 'Fairfield Man' is, I believe, 2,950 feet above the level of the sea. The 'Man' is the highest point of the mountain, and a pile of stones, supporting, in its centre, an upright post, marks its position. The 'Man' is to be found on nearly all the fells in this district.

"I followed the connecting ridge along 'Seat Sandal,' 'Dolly-waggon-pike,' and across the foot of Grisedale Tarn, its dark, still waters stretching along the mountain pass between Patterdale and Wythburn. I was now upon the breast of the 'mighty Helvellyn,' but I must turn back for I am not quite done with 'Dolly-waggon-pike' and its connecting ridge.

"Once, on descending into a little vale near the top of the mountain, I heard in the distance the tinkling of a solitary sheep-bell. All else around was silence, perfect silence, such as can only be understood in such a position. There is great solemnity in the stillness of the higher mountains, 'shut out from all the world' and surrounded by mountain peaks, we sometimes hear the 'solemn bleat' of "A lamb left somewhere to itself,

The plaintive spirit of the solitude."

"As I was walking along and looking down into a deep glen on my right, I heard an unusual whistling sound come from an opposite direction. The sound increased in distinctness, and turning around, I saw, at the distance of ten or a dozen yards, that the soft grass was all in motion, as if it had taken life, although there was scarcely a breath of air stirring. I observed that this motion advanced towards me. Instantly perceiving that this was a whirlwind, I fell prostrate and clung to the earth. It carried in its grasp bits of dead grass and sticks, which it whirled quickly around, bearing its burden immediately over me, and, with a whistle and a rush, it passed into the glen. I was glad to witness such a phenomenon, and also thankful that it was not more powerful than it was, else it might have taken me with it. I recollect reading an account of a shepherd and his son being overtaken by a strong whirlwind on Langdale Pikes, when the son was torn from his hold and carried headlong to destruction.

"On Helvellyn, I fell in with a shepherd who was gathering his flock. It was not necessary for him to move in doing this. He directed his dog by words, signs and whistles, and the animal, as if it had understood English, obeyed his commands, and gathered the flock in admirable order. I queried of him if I could not get to Wythburn in that direction, pointing to where I knew it lay. He answered, 'Aye; sure. But don't gae ower far that way.' I thanked him, took the bearings of his walking stick, and plodded onward, over some very soft and treacherous ground, where it is necessary to keep a lookout, or the traveller may be plunged into a quagmire. I descended Whiteside (part of Helvellyn), and came down nearly opposite to where William Ball (a Friend who lives at 'Glen Rothay,' in Rydal) has erected a tombstone in memory of his horse, which died there and is buried in the ditch. It is dated Ninth Month 30th, 1833.

"Crossing 'Dunmail Raise,' where there is a pile of stones, underneath which, tradition says, the remains of Dunmail, the last king of Cumberland, lie buried. I reached the Horse's Head Inn, Wythburn. As I was sitting down to tea the coach which was to convey me to Ambleside came up. Opposite the inn is the parish church. It is the smallest in England. Wordsworth says:

"Wythburn's modest house of prayer,
As lowly as the lowliest dwelling!"

"Rode to Ambleside, walked towards Windermere, had a splendid view of the sun setting behind a mountain. I then walked about a quarter of a mile to Stockgill Force, a picturesque waterfall. Next returned to my lodging, almost tired out, having seen, in my rambles, ten lakes, several taras, and the sea at Morecamb, and had been

"Alang o'er monie a mountain tap,
Alang thro' haudie a glen,
Wi' nature hailing fellowship,
I'd journeyed far frae me."

"Next morning, taking the coach, I rode to Cockermonth through a very romantic country. A few miles on this side of Keswick, we look up St. John's Vale. I returned on Fifth-day to Grasmere."

Early in Fifth Month, 1836, he attended the Yearly Meeting in Dublin, and, after returning home, he wrote: "Was at Bray three or four hours one day. This is a pretty watering-place, ten or twelve miles south of Dublin, in the county of Wicklow. I walked a mile in the direction of the town of Wicklow, and fell in with the smallest cabin I saw in Ireland, under a high rock on the sea-coast. It was inhabited by a poor woman, who told me she had been a widow for several years. Two of the walls were built of clay, the other two were a rock, against which a roof of brackens and boards was cast. The doorway (there was no door) was formed by two strong branches, placed so as to support each other, in the form of an acute angle. The window-hole (there was no window) was near the doorway, and in the corner, nearly underneath, was the bed. The fire-place, made of sods and sticks, was at the opposite end of the cabin, on the ground, the smoke creeping up a kind of chimney, also out at several holes in the roof. The old lady was very civil, and placed me a stool to sit on, which brought me very near the ground. She chatted very cheerfully, and brought me a delicious glass of water from a spring about a yard from her door. She was not alone, but had two visitors with her when I called. They were neighbors who had come to see how she did. Three extra guests and herself nearly filled the vacant room in the cabin. Poor as she appeared to be, she seemed happy, and I left her with the feeling that 'a little with contentment is great gain.'

"I left Dublin on Sixth-day by rail from Belfast, had a peep at Lough Neagh, near Moira, and reached Belfast about noon on Seventh-day. I ascended the Cave Mountain, two miles north of Belfast, and had a good view of the surrounding country from the top. There are three curious caves, cut out of the solid rock near the top of this mountain."

A Baby Among the Slain.

An American officer writes of one of the conflicts in the Civil War:

Darkness had come at last, and the roar of battle had died away to a low growl. Grant had failed to drive Lee. We knew that from flank to flank. If he could not force a passage through those gray lines, he could flank them. Before the sun went down we knew that he would do it. It was not yet night when the movement began, but my division would be one of the last to move, and we must hold our ground and prevent the Confederates from discovering what was taking place. It was a curious coincidence of war that Lee was also moving by the flank, both armies marching in parallel lines from a battle-field that had yielded neither victory nor defeat to either side.

Post No. 7 was under a large tree on the edge of a thicket. To the south, there was a strip of open ground, then a thicket, then an old field, in which stood a log cabin. It was a lonely place, well away from the camps, the dead and the dying, but I was glad to be alone. All along the lines there was a growling of musketry; but this was but a bluff—a bit of acting to cover the real design. I had been nearly an hour on the post without anything happening to alarm me, when I heard a movement in the thicket across the open strip.

Was it a person? Riderless horses had galloped about that day almost without number; this might be one which had found shelter in that thicket.

Rustle! rustle! Step! step! It was a cautious movement. Whoever it was, hoped to reach me without discovery, but there were dead leaves underfoot and the thicket was dense. A hare could not have moved without betraying its presence.

Rustle! rustle! Kneeling down, so as to see under the darkness, as it were, I suddenly made out a black object against the dark background. It is neither horse nor mule, it is a human being. A scout from the enemy's picket post, only a quarter of a mile away? A wounded man hobbling about to find succor? One of our own scouts returning? "Who comes here?" There is silence for fifteen seconds, and then a woman's voice answers: "I can't find the place! It's so dark I can't find the place!"

Aye! it was a woman's voice, and it had a sob in it, too. A woman there in the darkness between the hostile lines—with powder smoke in the air, and stray bullets darting through the thickets with a whizz, as of some great insect stirred to anger!

"Who comes here?" "I wish it wasn't so dark! I am so tired—so tired!" And then she came to the open strip toward me, making no stop, never hesitating, walking straight up to me, as if she could see as well by night as in the sunshine of day. "I can't find the place," she sobbed, as she came to a stop within arm's length. "Good woman! but what are you doing here?" I gasped, almost terrified at her presence. "See! see!" she replied, holding a bundle out towards me. "One time I saw a cautiful spot in the woods, and said to myself that if he died I would bury him there, but I can't find it—I can't find it!" "What is it, 'oman? What have you got there?" "See! Don't be afraid. He's dead. He can't speak or move. Take him!"

She put a bundle into my arms and I cried out and let fall my musket. It was the body of a baby about a year and a half old. Dead? 'es! Dead from a cruel bullet which had pierced its little body and left a great wound which looked horrible to me in the dim light! Dead and cold and bathed in its own blood—dead for hours! And when I reached out and touched the shawl worn by the mother, my fingers burned at the feel of blood! "I have carried him such a long, long way," she moaned, and I have seen so many dead men and heard so many guns! You'll help me, won't you—help me to find the place and bury poor baby?" Was it your baby? Did you live in the cabin beyond the thicket? I asked, still holding the little corpse. "He was so happy!" she said, and she tossed the little bare head with a motherly rapture. "And I was so happy, too! He won't ever laugh and crow again, will he? I've got to find that beautiful place and bury him, haven't I? And you'll help me; yes, I know you will, for you don't swear and curse at me."

She had lost her mind. Think of it—an insane mother wandering over a bloody battlefield, with her dead child in her arms! She had not one idea—to bury it in a dell which she had once visited and remarked its beauty—a dell in which the Federals or Confederates were faultless then burying their own dead. I knew not what to do. I could not leave my post, and I did not want her to go wandering further. I was trying to soothe and quiet the woman when she suddenly cried out, "Ah! it is not so dark now and I can find the place. I'll go on ahead and dig the grave, and do you follow on with baby. Poor baby! He won't know that he is buried, will he? I can find the place and you!"—"Come back! Come back!" I called to her as she fled away in the darkness, but she was two hundred feet away as she answered me: "I'll find the place! Poor, poor baby!"

And when the relief came, I told the story and pointed to the bundle resting on the ground beside me. "God pity her!" whispered the sergeant, as he lifted his cap. "God pity her!" [choed all the others, as they stood uncovered round the poor little corpse. Time meant no man lives that night. Grant was moving by the flank; Lee was moving by the flank to catch him. The morrow was to witness more slaughter—make thousands of other widows and orphans. "Dig here!" said the sergeant, and with our bayonets we scooped out a shallow grave in scarcely more than a minute's time. Carefully now! Poor little thing! Now fill it! That will do. Fall in—forward, march!"

And yet men write of the glory of war!—Herald of Peace.

Ohio Yearly Meeting.

At the Select Meeting, Sixth-day, Ninth Mo. 5th, Jonathan E. Rhoads was present, with a minute liberating him to attend Ohio Yearly Meeting and a few of its meetings. John S. and Esther Fowler, and Anna Crawford, were present, but without minutes.

The Meeting for Sufferings met at three p. m. A memorial prepared in 1894, and presented to be General Assembly, had been slightly changed or adapted it for general circulation. An edition of five thousand copies was directed to be printed, and the committee directed to give it general circulation. An essay by T. C. Battey was presented, and a committee appointed to examine it and report their judgment to a future meeting. The essay was on "Christian Ethics, as Applied to Morality, and as Applied to Laws."

Seventh-day, 26th.—The meeting for business convened with a good attendance. After a time of silence Peter N. Dyre quoted, "Here is the fire and here is the wood, but where is the burnt sacrifice." He spoke of our responsibility as supporters of the doctrines and testimonies delivered us by our forefathers. Elwood Conrad appeared in supplication.

The representatives were all present. A minute liberating Jonathan E. Rhoads to attend the Yearly Meeting and a few of its meetings, was read, and satisfaction with his company, and also that of other Friends without minutes, was expressed by numerous Friends, and the Clerk was directed to insert it in his minutes.

The Epistles from New England, Canada, Western, Iowa and Kansas, were read. Much satisfaction was expressed at the comfortable feeling accompanying their reading, and a committee was appointed to prepare replies. An extract from the will of Robert Miller was read, making a bequest to the Yearly Meeting for the education of children in limited circumstances. The bequest was estimated to reach about eight thousand dollars. A committee was appointed to nominate trustees. A committee was appointed to settle with the treasurer and name a Friend for that service, and revise the apportionment between the Quarters. The representatives were requested to bring forward names for Clerk and Assistant, and messengers to women's meeting, also two Friends for correspondents in place of Jacob Holloway and Aaron Frame, deceased. Then adjourned to eleven o'clock on Second-day morning.

First-day, a large meeting, the house being crowded; it holds fifteen hundred. After a time of silence, Anna Crawford appeared in supplication. Mary Test followed her in an impressive communication. George Mott spoke of Naaman and the little maid who was the instrument of Naaman's cure. Thought there were some there who felt little in their own eyes, as the little maid, who would, if faithful, be made helpers to others. Hannah Stratton followed in a lively testimony. Jonathan E. Rhoads spoke with much feeling, urging the necessity of having the new birth brought about by submitting to the operation of the Spirit of Christ. Anna Crawford spoke, and Jacob Maule in supplication. It was a favored meeting, the various exercises all tending to enforce the necessity of obedience to the Spirit of Christ. Afternoon, Joshua Smith, Esther Fowler, Elwood Conrad, Anna Crawford, Jonathan E. Rhoads, Jacob Maule, A. Crawford in prayer, and W. C. Cowperthwait.

Second-day.—The representatives proposed Barclay Smith for Clerk, and William L. Ashton for assistant, George Blackburn and Aaron Dewees for messengers, and William L. Ashton and James Walton correspondents. The Queries and Answers were read and summaries adopted. Some very suitable counsel on several subjects was offered. The names of ministers and elders deceased, were read.

Third-day.—The school reports were read, and the enumeration of the families and parts of families and number of members. The minutes of Meeting for Sufferings were read. The memorial on Capital Punishment presented to the Legislature in 1894, having been slightly altered to adapt it for general circulation was adopted, and an edition of five thousand copies ordered printed. Charles Livezey, Elisha B. Steer and Dilwyn Stratton were appointed Trustees of the bequest of Robert Miller. Thos. Stanley was appointed correspondent of Springfield Monthly Meeting, Iowa. It was concluded to reappoint the present Boarding School Committee for another three years. Jacob Maule laid before Friends a concern for a meeting for the younger part of those in attendance, to be held at three p. m., on Fourth-day afternoon, which being united with by men's and women's meetings was accordingly appointed. Twelve hundred copies of minutes ordered printed.

Fourth-day.—Peter N. Dyre, Joshua Smith, Mary Test, Esther Fowler and Anna Crawford, spoke. Jonathan E. Rhoads addressed those who had a gift of government in the Church, quoting, "Unto where ye have attained walk by the same rule," to be in spirit of love. At the afternoon appointed meeting, in spite of the rain, a goodly number assembled. Jacob Maule arose with "It became Him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings." He spoke to those who were just commencing this heavenward journey, those who had made some progress, and those who had not taken any steps, and gave counsel suited to each. That the only way to become perfect was through sufferings. He also prayed for those.

Fifth-day.—The report of the Boarding School was read. The electric light and other improvements had caused a debt of over five hundred dollars. An appropriation of four hundred dollars was ordered towards it. The Indian Committee made a satisfactory report. The committee to distribute the approved writings of Friends reported, and asked for another appropriation, which was granted. A Friend spoke to the young on plain apparel and language, Jonathan E. Rhoads spoke briefly, and George Mott returned thanks for favors bestowed, and craved preservation in returning to their homes.

Epistles to New England, Canada, Western, Iowa and Kansas were read, approved and ordered sent.

After an impressive silence the meeting concluded.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 10, 1896.

The Society of Friends has ever believed in the reality and safety of the Divine guidance of the Spirit of Christ. True religion is the result of the work on the soul of that Eternal Power by which, in the beginning, all things were made; and, as William Grover states, "It begins frequently with a little light or manifestation of the Divine will as to some point or part of duty. And as obedience is yielded to this small manifestation, greater and greater degrees of light and of strength are afforded to follow on to know more and more of the Divine will and of Divine things." Thus there is a blessed increase in religious knowledge and experience, and in Divine communion and fellowship. Such obedient ones witness the truth of the Apostle's testimony, "If we walk in the light, as God is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanse us from all sin."

It is a Scripture injunction that, whether or eat or whether we drink, or whatsoever we do, we do all to the glory of God. From this it may fairly be inferred that all of our actions—the general course of our lives—have a religious bearing, and may promote the cause of righteousness, if we dwell under the fear of the Lord. It is especially desirable that in laboring to promote moral reforms, or in other ways to advance the work of righteousness in the earth, the duties we undertake should be as acts of obedience to the light of the Spirit of God.

But if Friends, in these undertakings, join with others who do not recognize the need of any higher principle than their own natural faculties, but trust to their own understanding, they will be in great danger of ceasing to maintain a state of humble dependence upon the Gospel power and of departing from the principles and testimonies upheld by our predecessors, who believed that the influence of the Divine Spirit was a necessary qualification for every good work.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Treasury receipts for Ninth Month aggregate $24,500,000, or $3,000,000 less than Ninth Month, 1895. The expenditures foot up $26,000,000, or nearly $2,000,000 more than for Ninth Month, 1895. The deficit for Ninth Month, 1896, is $1,806,034, and for the fiscal year to date, $24,200,000. Total cash in the Treasury, $849,612,772.

The United States Treasury gold balances at the close of business on the 5th instant stood at $125,400,896. The day's withdrawals at N. Y. were $122,900. The Secretary of the Treasury has ordered the discontinuance of three houses of refuge on the eastern coast of Florida, viz: Chester Shoons, Bilber Creek, Orange Grove. These houses were established years ago when the coast was practically uninhabited.

The Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has affirmed the decree of the Commissioner of Patents in the case of Daniel Drawbaugh, whose application for alleged improvements in telephone transmitters was refused. The Court held that Drawbaugh was not the inventor of the telephone.

The gold fields in Paulding County, Georgia, are being developed, and have proved quite productive. Over fifty carloads of blueberries were shipped from Petaloe, N. B., this season, principally to Boston.

On the 29th ultimo the city of Savannah, Ga., was struck by what was thought to be a West India hurricane. Nearly every building in the city was damaged, and the property loss will go largely above $1,000,000. The lives lost number at least eleven. In Brunswick the damage to property is placed at $500,000.

The same day Cedar Keys, Florida, was nearly destroyed by a tidal wave and storm which passed across the State into Florida. The path of the storm seems to have been about forty miles wide. The heaviest losses in Florida are the turpentine manufacturers. Those heard from report a total loss, and say they will be compelled to go out of business. Large numbers of cattle were killed. The loss of life is heavier than the first reports indicated. The Sea Islands of South Carolina were again visited with destruction, and the people will again need the help of the benevolent to save them from serious sufferings.

In Washington the destruction of public and private property is estimated at half a million dollars. Twenty-four persons were seriously injured by falling trees and in other ways, and in Alexandria two men were killed. In Baltimore the great damage was sustained along the waterfront.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 401, which is 52 more than the previous week and 64 more than the corresponding week of 1895. Of the whole number 209 were males and 192 females; 66 died of consumption; 27 of heart disease; 15 of pneumonia; 21 of influenza; 15 of diphtheria; 15 of cholera; 15 of convulsions; 13 of cholera infantum; 13 of nephritis; 13 of apoplexy; 11 of paralysis, and 9 of cancer. Markets.—U. FOREIGN.—William Morris, the celebrated English poet, died on the third instant, aged sixty-two years. He was born at Walthamton, and graduated at Oxford in 1857. Of late years he was a Socialist in principle.

The London representative of the New York Tribune, says: "There are some signs of improvement in the relations of the two countries, but the press of the Russian press is not only less hostile, but even positively friendly to England. The French Ambassador at Constantinople has taken the initiative of warning the Sultan that the collective note of the Powers cannot be disregarded like previous European remonstrances. This action is in accord with Lord Salisbury's policy, and implies co-operation with him. Moreover, the English Government have gone out of their way to ally French sensitiveness by proclaiming that the Nile expedition will halt at Dongola, at least for this season. These facts point remotely in the direction of a coalition of Russia with the two Western Powers which attacked her in the Crimea, but which is positive evidence that the Emperor's visit to Balaclava has been the turning-point in the history of the Eastern question. He has been amusing himself in the braising air of the Highlands, and is now journeying toward France, where he will be received like a conqueror, for the success of Europe has persisted in outraging the moral sense of Sultan with interest in the Russo-French alliance, and there are few victors. It has contravened the Triple Alliance, humiliated England, established Russian ascendancy at Constantinople and greatly increased French prestige in Europe."

The Spanish Government is taking energetic measures to stop the emigration of lower and middle classes to the United States, by having a reliable military service. The Government has learned that several thousand young men have gone to South America, France and Algeria because they were unable to pay the $100 necessary to redeem themselves from serving with the army in Cuba. Eighteen thousand out of 80,000 men bought immunity in 1895, and the Government has to pay as many per-purchased exemption thus far this year.

Five new asteroids were discovered on photographs of the heavens one evening recently by Dr. Max Wolf, of Heidelberg. This brings the number of minor planets up to 423.

Large and rich gold fields have been discovered by German surveyors on the east coast of Siberia, bordering on the Sea of Okhotsk.

Letters received in Constantinople on the 2nd inst. from Kharput give terrible details of the massacre which recently occurred at Eguin, in the Kharput District, in which, the letters allege, 2,000 persons were killed. The scenes, according to the letters, were similar to those of the former massacres in Anatolia.

Karathodor Pasha, formerly Governor of Crete and the Turkish Plenipotentiary at the Berlin Congress of 1878, has been appointed First Translator to the Sultan, and it is understood that hereafter he will direct the foreign politics of the Turkish Empire.

Khalid, who proclaimed himself Sultan of Zanzibar after the death of Sultan Hamid Bin Thwain, and took refuge in the German Consulate after the bombardment and destruction of the palace by British warships, has been placed on a German warship. A vigorous protest has been made by the letters, were similar to those of the former massacres in Anatolia.

Advices which have reached London from Merv, Turkistan, show that an epidemic of fever has been raging throughout the Turcomans for some time. During the past two months nearly 10,000 have died.

A dispatch from Bombay says the drought continued in Northern and Central India, where there has been no rain for many weeks. The crops in those sections have utterly failed, and grain riots have occurred in many a place as the result of the scarcity of cereals.

China has again refused to sign the Convention with Great Northern Manchuria, but retains the right of pre-emption in thirty years.

Captain General Weyler's plan to trap Maceo and defeat and drive him east has failed. General Melquillo, who led the Spanish troops, has been defeated in three successive engagements with Maceo in the mountains of Pinar del Rio. The Spanish loss is said to have been very heavy.

From an Indian official report it is learned that, in the year 1895, 2,895 persons lost their lives through tigers, panthers, bears, elephants and other wild beasts; 21,538 died from serpent bites, three-fourths of which were caused by cobras. Quite 37,000 domestic animals were killed by tigers, panthers and serpents.

Mahogany sells at Minatitlan, Vera Cruz, at from $35 to $45 a ton for large timber, and one large dealer there sells 1,000 tons a year to New York and European buyers. On a visit to Mexico City lately, he said that, although the stock had run out in some quantities of Huanuco Tehuantepec, there were inexhaustible supplies still in the central portous and also in parts of Vera Cruz.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1856.—Tenth Mo. 12th.—Dear H. Gibbons spoke so warningly. May I take warning and love and not doubt. I must have faith. Oh Lord in mercy be pleased to change my stony heart to one soft and obedient.

17th.—Two English Friends, Priscilla Green and M. Nicholson, came into our school. They have appointed an evening meeting here on the eighteenth.

23rd.—Preparative Meeting. Morris Cope spoke of the widow and her faith in making the cake for the prophet.

29th.—Monthly Meeting. Hannah Warner and Abigail Williams here. Aunt Mary Kite goes to Bucks Quarter. May it be my meat and drink to do my Heavenly Father's will.

Eleventh Month 30th.—Silent meeting. I asked for a forgiving heart and obedient spirit, and I believe it was heard; for the words "Ask and ye shall receive," also, "He giveth liberally and upbraideth not," came so sweetly into my mind that I cannot doubt. Dear aunt Mary (Kite) said at Monthly Meeting, "Abide at the Master's feet and He will help, support and comfort you in his own time." It is a comfort to believe so. Oh! Lord, increase the faith of thy poor struggling servant and preserve me, I beseech of Thee.

On the eighth of Twelfth Month, 1856, her brother John, when on his way to be married, was killed at Alliance, Ohio, by a railroad accident, of which she writes: "Sad, sad day. This evening dear brother John was killed by the cars, telegraph came at noon on the ninth. On the eleventh the remains of my dear brother came. We can see him: funeral at ten on the twelfth. Dear John W. Tatum here. I have such evidence that he is safe in heaven.

1857.—First Month 1st.—Dear Hannah Gibbons said, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, oh, God!" After dinner dear Aunt Mary (Kite) had a word for poor me.

11th.—The dew falleth in the dark night, when there is no rain. If we were to strive to worship God, we should feel the dew of his presence to refresh us.

18th.—At two o'clock, commenced a hard snow-storm. On the nineteenth could not get to school at all. On the twentieth did not get there till ten. Drifts three and four feet high. On the twenty-fourth, mercury 20° below zero.

Fourth Month 10th.—D. Brooks gave up her school in West Chester and went to Philadelphia to be with her mother, who was left very lonely after the death of her son.

Fifth Month 18th.—Went to Mary Holgate's to learn bonnet-making.

Sixth Month 17th.—William Green, from Ireland (at meeting), quoted the passage, "Oh, that thou hast hearkened to my commandments, then had thy peace been as a river and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." True about myself.

Eighth Mo. 3rd.—Quarterly Meeting. William Green appeared in supplication. Mary Ann Loyd spoke, also R. S. and a man Friend.

6th.—Here am I, oh Lord, do with me as seemeth good to thee. "Search me and know my thoughts, prove me and see if there be any wicked way in me," and do thou it away in thy mercy.

Twelfth Month.—The retrospect is humiliating. When will I be the Lord's devoted child? When shall I pray every moment and be humble? My desires have been more ardent and constant of late. Help me, oh, Lord, I beseech of thee, to take up my cross and become thine. I thank thee for thy long extended mercies and blessings to poor unworthy me. Have mercy yet longer, oh! Lord, and twine me unto thee. Chasten me, make me thine. Forgive my iniquities, blot out my sins and transgressions, love me freely for thy mercy's sake. Here am I; do with me as seemeth thee good, only take not thy Holy Spirit from me; only make me thy holy child every minute.

1858.—First Month 31st.—At meeting. A stranger and Samuel Bettle, so good. My God shall supply all your needs, according to his riches in glory in Christ Jesus. I am thankful for this assurance, for I am poor and needy.

Third Month 22nd.—Monthly Meeting at North Meeting. My certificate received.

[Between this date and the year 1860 she does not appear to have kept any record of her feelings and experiences, but from a letter written at Parkerville, Chester Co., dated Fifth Month 8th, 1859, she seems to have returned for a time to teach in a school there. It is addressed to her sister.]

"I would very much like you to be here, this quiet First-day afternoon and listen to the wind in the trees and the voices of the little birds and chickens. Oh! it is very pleasant, but I do not seem to have the heart to enjoy it, as I used to do. The time may come when I will, but it is not now.

"The trees are in bloom around and so many beautiful flowers, I know you would love to see them. But the flowers will have to grow and bloom in joy and peace in my spiritual garden before I can look around with rapturous joy and say with Cowper, 'My Father made them all.'"

"Think of me, sometimes, brother and sister, and when favored to approach the throne of grace with supplication, ask for me too, that I may be enabled to give up all, wear the cross cheerfully and obtain the answer of favor from our gracious Lord!

"Not till all is sanctified in this manner will your sister ever enjoy this world or much that is in it.

"The school here so far very pleasant. The children so kind and behave so well. There are several quite large girls who seem desirous to assist by their good conduct rather than give trouble. I hope it will continue, and that I too can keep in the right spirit. Thirty-five children came the first day, there are forty-one registered; more are expected to-morrow.

"They seem like such a respectable class of children. . . . The whole place has improved so much. A new brick store has been built and the old store-house raised and brimmed into a neat dwelling just in front of our house, and this place is fitted up, painted, papered, a neat porch with trellis work ends and front, and the whole village has a cheerful aspect; my room is very pleasant and Phebe (Parker) is kind and a good cook, so you see there are many blessings. One very sweet tempered and modest young girl lives here with her aunt and is going to school; we three generally compose the family.

"How I would like to hand you some of these specimens of wild wood beauty which the little ones bring in such profuse bunches and load my desk with. . . . From your affectionate sister,
"DEBORAH BROOKS."

1860.—Fifth Mo. 27th.—It is so long since I have written in this little book. Am I really any better? It seems to me the work is going on, but how much bolting has there been? So unwilling to give up all and be as a fool before people in my daily walk. Oh! I have found there is no peace to be had till all is surrendered, the whole heart given up, to be, to do and seem as He would. How long have I held back. Surely God has been gracious and long suffering. Oh! dear Lord and Saviour in thy marvellous, loving kindness, be merciful yet longer and bring me entirely through all into true daily obedience to thee. Bless thy people oh, Lord, and cause thine heritage to arise and shine with thy righteousness.

Ninth Month 1st.—There is more of giving all up to thy indwelling life, but I feel that I have not yet "resisted unto blood, striving against sin." Oh, if I even obey every moment how much cause shall I have to bless and praise my God and Saviour for his marvellous mercy to me.

1861.—First Month.—Hast thou not, oh! most merciful Father, broken my hard heart and brought me into entire submission to thee, led me into paths of fasting and prayer and granted me great peace and joy at last. Great and marvellous have been thy mercies vouchsafed unto me. What shall I render unto thee but my whole heart, for thou art worthy, worthy, everlasting worthy of all adoration, praise and thanksgiving forever and ever. Amen.

Third Month.—Again I have fallen, again thou hast visited and raised the new and inward life. Oh! Lord help me to live all the time to thee. Oh! give me more soberness, more of thy countless indwelling with thee. Thou art thy Holy Head of thy people and Church. Oh! let me remember it all the time and be very watchful. Here am I Lord, form me into what thou wouldst. O only strengthen me.

In 18— she was appointed to the primary department of Friends' Select School in Philadelphia. Her concern for the best welfare of the children was great, and frequently continued after they were removed from under her care. This is manifested by some letters written to a former pupil, whose mind had become unsettled in regard to the principles of Friends and who was inclined to join another religious society.

Some extracts from these will be inserted under their respective dates.

TO L. H. B.

PHILADELPHIA, Third Month 17th, 1861.

"Dearest Laura.—It is with a renewed feeling of that love wherein I so enjoy thinking of thee that I commence this epistle, though feeling at the same time that I have nothing of interest to communicate. Thine so affectionately penned, brought thys-elf and friend very closely to my feelings, and you have been very frequently in mind. May He who takes care of all the sparrows on his earth, care also for you and lead you sweetly along in his paths. I know, I can say He will not forsake you if you keep close to Him, but there is one thing that daily seems more and more certain to me, viz: Everything which He in love requires must be performed or there is no peace.

"Dear L. thy poor friend feels herself so unworthy and unfit to speak of these great truths in this way and it has often been my desire that no words or influence of mine should lead thee wrong. Have I not tried to point to that Saviour whom thou knows and loves, and who is the Wonderful Counsellor? My path often seems so unaccountable to myself, but if it only leads me to perfect union with a knowledge of Him my desires will be satisfied, for thou knowest, 'This is life eternal to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.' Oh! this perfect saving knowledge; how much I need it, and how cheering at times is it to believe that if we ask we shall receive. Oh! for a heart in me to serve Him unreservedly, continually, daily, hourly. It was particularly interesting to me to read thy account of thy valued, lamented sister, and I could sympathize with you. How cheering and confirming it is to hear of happy and triumphant death-bed scenes. Does it not animate us to seek to have our names written in the Lamb's book of life, and also to live the life of the righteous, that we may die the death of the righteous. . . . Farewell my precious friend in that love which is abiding; please also think of me sometimes when thou humbly approaches his holy footstool.

"Thine truly,

THERE is something in the heart and conscience that removes evil; there is no need of proof for this, every one's experience tells him the truth of it; if you will bear this check and reproof it gives to evil, you will find also that it will stir up to good, and encourage you to go on in the one way, and to flee from the other. Now, believe and know for certain, this is Christ; and this is the voice that, He says, his sheep hear and know (John x; 3, 4), even this, that has been so long slighted and neglected in the conscience,—this so much baffled and slighted voice, is that way by which Christ speaks: hear him thus, or not at all.—A. Jaffrey.

Through Jungle and Desert.

While encamped at Seran, they were pursued by a large war party of the Rendile, who had decided not to permit such a prize to slip through their fingers. When their approach was known, the travellers and about twenty men ran forward to meet them. There were a few horsemen and a large body of foot warriors. They professed to be a peaceful hunting party, which neither Chanler nor his men believed. "The two Somali who were with me grinned with excitement and glee, and said, 'Now Master, Allah has delivered these people with horses and camels into our hands. Now let us seize them. They are enemies and they belong to us. We know that the white man does not wage war for the sake of plunder; but let us, the Somali, go with a few men we will select, and in a few moments you will have horses to ride, and camels to carry your goods.'

Chanler adds, "The temptation to yield was, I must admit, next to irresistible; but as the people made no overt attack upon us, and as the horsemen continued to shout 'Peace, peace!' I could not permit myself to indulge in an attack."

An adventure with a snake is thus related: "Shortly after sunset, I had a rather disagreeable experience. I was striding along in the centre of the path, when suddenly I heard Baraka shout, 'Yallah bwana nukubma' (For the love of God, master). As he shouted, I felt a sharp blow on my left side, just over the pocket of my coat, and leaping quickly to one side, I ran on for two or three paces. Upon turning around, I saw a snake rising out of the path which I had just left, with its head fully three feet from the ground. Its fierce eyes shone in the light of the setting sun, and its neck was swollen out until it appeared to have the breadth of two hands. As I gazed, it slowly and noiselessly sank to the earth and disappeared from the path. I did not pursue it, principally for the reason that a shot fired after sunset was understood by my caravan to mean a signal of distress; and that would have resulted in my men throwing down their loads and running forward to meet me, thus delaying our arrival at the water. Had it not been for the fact that I carried in the left side pocket of my coat, two strongly bound note-books, the fangs of the serpent would undoubtedly have penetrated to my flesh, and from its size death would have been practically instantaneous. Upon examination, I found that the fangs had penetrated quite through one of the books, and nearly through the outer covering of the other. It is strange how one becomes accustomed to disagreeable surprises after a stay of some months in Africa. My mind was filled with the necessity of reaching water, and sending back messengers to the men who had gone out of their heads for the want of it; so, after a few exclamations of relief, I pressed on with my boys to our goal." The goal was the crater of an extinct volcano, in whose depths water could be found. Sending the men down to obtain the precious fluid, Chanler himself remained at the entrance of a rift in its side.

After sitting perhaps a quarter of an hour he heard "the well-known grumble of a lion in search of prey." The shadow which filled the rift prevented him from distinguishing anything in that direction, but the rattle of falling stones soon showed that the lion was approaching from above. He was afraid to fire lest it should interfere with the prompt procurement of water by his men, so he seized stones from the ground and hurled them vigorously in the direction from which he heard the lion coming. He continued to throw stones and shout until his arm was tired and his voice hoarse. The return of his men with water at length relieved him of his disagreeable position.

In the course of their travels, our adventurers came into contact with the Wanderaboo, a peaceable tribe who live largely on elephants. They were nearly starving, and endeavored to barter ivory for food; and when told that they had no means of transporting the ivory, they replied, "Buy the ivory, and leave it with us, and when you return, or send a man with some token to these parts, we will deliver it to him." Their interpreters told the visitors that the Wanderaboo never broke their promises to the traders. Taking pity on the starving condition of the village they met with, a stay of some days was made in the vicinity, and several elephants shot to supply them with food. In hunting the elephants the party were exposed to much danger—for the wild animals seemed to be in groups of five or six, and when a shot was fired the whole company rushed down to destroy these intruders into their haunts. On one occasion, Chanler's life was saved by his fox terrier, who dashed at the foremost elephant, and bit him vigorously, all the while barking loudly. The elephants at once halted, and with a scream of fright turned sharply to one side. On another occasion his interpreter, while standing at the edge of an elephant path, saw a herd of elephants approaching him at a tremendous rate of speed. He at once threw himself into the sharp thorn-bush on the side of the path, and managed to get about three feet into the bush by the time the leading elephant reached the place where he was standing. There the elephant stopped, and began to search for him with his trunk, and finally reached for him. He had his sandals in his hand, and being unable to move on account of the thorns, as the trunk of the elephant neared him, he instinctively held out the sandals, which were promptly seized. The sandals seemed to satisfy the curiosity of the beast; for, having taken them with its trunk, it dashed them to the ground, and trampled upon them. Then with a loud trumpeting of rage it passed down the path, followed by its fellows, leaving Hassan offering thanks to Allah for his escape.

It has already been stated that the expedition was finally broken up by the desertion of the great body of the porters. This reduced the party to about twenty men, too small a number to successfully venture into the more northern regions which it was their object to visit, and rendered it necessary for them to return to the coast, so after making liberal presents to the natives, the balance of the goods was destroyed, and a march of about four hundred and fifty miles, in which they met with but few adventures, found them at Mombasa, on the sea-side.

The only way to form anything like an approximate idea of the size of London is to give a whole week to the top of an omnibus. Begin right after breakfast and ride anywhere, it makes no difference where; then take a bus from that point and ride somewhere else; if luncheon hour has come, stop at one of the numberless tea and chocolate houses and have refreshment, and then resume the top of the bus and keep on until night. Do this steadily for several days, changing from the bus to the tram, but always going on the outside, and by dint of a pair of opera glasses, a good, ready tongue, a listening ear, and an understanding heart something of the vastness of this city may be realized. Having done this, the next thing is the river steamboats up as far as Hampton Court, which is at east twenty miles, with the throbbing city life all along the way. By this time London will have a meaning which no guidebook can give, and its immense population will be in some measure a reality.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Short Account of John Graham.

In Tenth Month, 1859, he married Martha King, of Birmingham, a union which added greatly to his happiness and comfort during the last eight years of his life. As the years passed on, his mind became increasingly serious and exercised. His health was not strong, and the need he felt of doing the day's work in the daytime, became obvious to those around him. His nature was timid and retiring, and only two memorandums have been found relating to that growth of grace in his own heart, which, like the heaven of the kingdom, was working there, and bringing all into conformity to the law of the Spirit of Life. The first is dated

"Seventh Month 26th, 1863.—It is with me to place on record something of the experiences which I have this day passed through, believing that such record may hereafter afford either myself or others some encouragement to cling closely to the alone Captain of our Salvation, when in the hour of darkness and apparent desertion, for, under the exercises of mind I have had to pass through, I think I have seen the safety there is, so long as the cloud rests upon the tabernacle, in Israel staying in his tent. It is hardly possible to describe these exercises—something after Jonah's experience when he said, 'I am cast out of thy sight, yet will I look again toward thy holy temple.'

"Under pepped exercising (travail of soul), and some endeavor to plead that the eternal Truth of God may be exalted over all in myself and in the world, without any or little ability to feel those incomes of heavenly love and refreshings, as from his presence, which have often of late accompanied my spirit when gathered unto Him and earnestly endeavoring to wait on Him and worship and adore his holy name. Still, the breathing of my soul has been 'Though thou slay me, yet will I put my trust in thee.' I cannot say that I have felt much despondency or discouragement, for a hope has held me and a sense been given that this baptism is for my welfare. And in coming in from meeting this evening, the 'Life and Experience of Thomas Bulman' lay open before me, and my eye rested upon one of his letters to his brother and sister, in which he says, 'This has been a trying season to us, both inwardly and outwardly, but magnified by the Lord for such trials. He only does with his children according to the pleasure of his own will. And we can say that all things work together for good to them that love Him. Our trying, proving seasons, if rightly made use of, are our most profitable seasons, our times of best improvement. It was from the bottom of Jordan that the children of Israel had to bring stones of memorial, and when in the deeps we shall experience the loving kindness of the Lord."

The other memorandum has no date.

"My mind has been brought under deep exercise, under a sense of the oppressive weighing down of the incurruptible Seed and Word of Life in the world at large, in the professed Church of Christ. And finally, most painfully, because most directly opposed to its own life and theory, in our own religious community.

There has been an earnest travail in my spirit and a cry unto God that He would arise and cause his own eternal power to be made manifest amongst us, that his glory may go over all, and that men, especially members of our Society, may be shaken from their false rests and corrupt supports; that their idols may be dashed in the dust, and that they may know that 'verily there is a reward to the righteous; verily there is a God who judgeth in the earth.'"

Some further extracts from his pen, in a more general sense, may suitably follow:

"We may see, at the first miracle on record, an injunction falls from maternal lips, 'Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it;' in giving heed to that injunction, obedience to the Lord of Life brought the rich blessing, and where there had been water there was wine. So shall it be with us if we obey Him. Our water, drawn from humanity's common font, shall be changed into wine—the new wine of blessing, the good wine, kept even until now.

"No lengthened prayer, poured from the lips of the highest church dignitary but must fall in comprehensiveness, in comparison to the ejaculation, 'Thy kingdom come, thy will be done.'

"No human priest is needed since our Mediator and Great High Priest presides, no chant to bear aloft the aspirations of our souls. No ceaser need dispense its fragrance to accompany the odor of our spirits, for the King sitteth at his table, and the spikenard sendeth forth the smell thereof. For when the King invisible, eternal, immortal, is enthroned and ruling over all, so near does He permit his poor, weak, helpless creatures to approach himself, that, with reverence and worship, they bow in spirit, and such is the hallowed feeling permitted that we wait on Him.

"If then, our hearts have been stirred to their very depths—the quickening visitations of the Lord's Holy Spirit having laid bare all, and discovered to us nothing but corruption, death and darkness—then, through abounding mercy, the Lord of Life and Light hath opened our spiritual eye to behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world, drawn us to himself, the uplifted One, and said, 'Yet a little while is the light with you; walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you; while ye have the light, that ye may be the children of the light.'

"Every man has a triple existence—the animal, or outer life, filling up his physical being; the intellectual, feeding on the refined and pleasurable sensation of all arts tending to expand and elevate the natural faculties, reveling in the beautiful, calling to its aid poetry, painting and music, all that can charm and soothe and satisfy mortal cravings after sublimity bliss; and, finally, but of surpassing importance, the spiritual life, the immortal part in man, called into existence whilst in this state of being, destined to continue through the ages of eternity, fed, even here, on immortal Food given to drink, ay, on this side of the grave, of that river flowing out of the great white throne. The seed of promise, meritorily placed in the hearts of his creatures, is watered in the merits of the Almighty King of Heaven, and is refreshed with showers of love and all spiritual blessings, and nourished with the flesh and blood of Him who was and is the Living Bread from heaven, the seed of promise, which, overcoming the seed of evil propensities, is given to eat of the 'tree of life, which standeth in the midst of the paradise of God,' receiving with meekness the ingrafted word (potent for salvation), desiring the sincere milk thereof and growing thereby from the condition of a babe in Christ, still overcoming, still being fed with the heavenly manna, thus arriving at the stature of a perfect man. The soul, having been cleansed by the blood of sprinkling and robed in the white linen of Christ's righteousness, is sustained in allegiance to the Lamb by his own power, and is fitted, even whilst the probationer passes through the changing scenes of earth, for the purchased inheritance of unending bliss in one of the many mansions prepared for the redeemed in heaven."

Towards the end of his life, he penned some thoughts on the calling and present condition of the Society of Friends, and though he never was able to connect them together as a whole, yet some of the remarks contained in them are too valuable to be omitted.

"The early Friends were called to battle against sin, both in themselves and in the world. They felt with Jehoshaphat, when in full view of the enemies of Judah and Jerusalem, that 'they knew not what to do, yet, as their eyes were upon the God of Israel, they were given to see that the battle was not theirs, but God's, and truly they were called, as was he, closely to discern their Lord's putting forth his re-training and constraining direction, and as it was to Jehoshaphat, so to them, the command of their Captain was clear as to time and place, claiming for Christ the authority to rule and reign in every heart (2 Chron. xx: 17).

"There were giants in those days, and there are giants in these. We cannot discover that the modern Friend is placed at any disadvantage from incompetency, intellectually, morally or spiritually. Nay, I incline to the thought that our surroundings and culture gives us a vantage ground, incurring a greater moral accountability than we may fairly suppose was theirs. However this may be, it is clear that they were stronger men than their descendants are in one important direction, and if I mistake not, the contrast has its action in this—individually and collectively their spiritual life was immeasurably greater than ours, and with many of them, their spiritual senses were kept in marvellous tone. It was that which was from the beginning, etc., they laid hold of with an appreciation delightful to contemplate.

"We are large (collectively) in intellect; in morality we are supposed to maintain a marked place; in energy of body and mind we triumph; but who will say that there is not a great want of soul, of heaven-born earnestness in many of our works? May it not be that we have inherited and imbibed and adopted, on the powerful recommendation of their example, some of the objects they labored upon—which were undoubtedly born of true principle in their case—without our ever having come to appreciate the motive which influenced them, either in their active labor or in their passive testimony.

"The Scriptures they regard as a stream of holy refreshment, unsullied in their Divine origin, in the spirit of their teaching, flowing, as they do, from the fountain of life, ministering joy to the mourner in Zion, light to behold the King in his beauty to eyes anointed with the eye-salve of the kingdom, the eye which has been to the pool of Siloam and there washed off earth's clinging encasements. Yes, the oftener they have been there and have looked through tears of repentance towards God and known their faith in the Saviour renewed, the more have they been able to look into the placid depths of heavenly love, traced by inspiration on the page of outward revelation.

"In accordance with the Biblical declaration that 'the natural man knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God,' the Society of Friends have maintained (and have been particular in the maintenance of this) that man, in his unregenerate and fallen state, however gifted in intellect, is blind to their unfoldings. Nay, even though he were a mental gladiator, he has no power to measure his lance, in the mystery of godliness, against the humble follower of Him who alone hath 'the key which openeth.'

"Do many evidences arise that Truth is triumphing, and that the kingdom is being established, of which there shall be no end? A conclusion none of us would dare to indorse. I would venture to ask those who feel at liberty to abandon everything which they regard as conventional and who appear to have imbibed a kind of antagonism to all that bears the stamp of plainness, to consider whether the road they are taking is bringing them into nearer fellowship and heavenly union with the flock of Christ's companions. On a matter of such importance, let us not be deceiving ourselves. If it be the worldly mind we are gratifying, it cannot be we are walking in the narrow way, which way, though narrow and repellent to the carnal mind, has ever been the path, despite the world's angriest frowns, most thickly strewn with solid peace and lasting joys. There are resting-places where the weary may repose, there are wells where the thirsty may drink. That way is the way that has ever been hallowed by the foot-prints of Christ's companions."

John Graham removed to Birmingham early in 1866, and, in the following year, after a slight attack of rheumatic fever, his health showed signs of failing. The action of the heart had been weakened, many years before, by rheumatism, and the dropsical symptoms which accompanied the progress of cardiac disease, much increased his sufferings during the last few weeks of his life. Accompanied by his dear wife, he tried a change to Malvern, but an increase of illness there made them thankful to return, and from this time he suffered much from faintness and difficulty of breathing.

He said that "he had no sentimental desire for death," and that "it was not his province to choose," but that his constant desire was "Thy will in this and in all things be done."

On Third-day afternoon, the seventeenth of Ninth Month, 1867, he was so ill that much alarm was felt about him, but he thought himself that the time for departure had not come. He wished the passage in Rev. ii read, addressed to the Ephesian Church, dwelling with comfort on the beautiful promise, "To him that overcometh, will I give to eat of the tree of life, which standeth in the midst of the paradise of God." He went on to quote from Hebrews, xiii, laying great emphasis upon the injunction, "Let us go forth, therefore, unto Him without the camp, bearing his reproach." For here have we no continuing city; enjoining upon those around not to be afraid of bearing reproach for Christ. The lines were repeated:

"Sweet to lie passive in his hands;
And know no will but his."

And he responded, "That's all." The will of God being his "one desire."

Ohio Yearly Meeting.

Ninth Month 29th.—As on other days, the Yearly Meeting convened not very punctually, due perhaps to two standards of time being used, viz: the true time for this longitude and that adopted by the railway companies. Barnesville being near the eastern border of this section makes a variation of nearly half an hour between the two reckonings.

The report of deaths of ministers and elders for one year mentioned the decease of five Friends whose ages ranged about from sixty-seven to ninety-two years. The record called forth some remarks on the duties of those in the active stages of life.

A report of the committee charged with the promotion of education in the primary schools elicited much expression of interest in our denominational schools as means of training the children of the Society in its belief and practices. A moderate amount of money bestowed from the funds of the Yearly Meeting rendering possible the support of a Friends' school in places where the number of members is small, and giving relief where parents' income is less than the demands of their families' support.

This being the triennial period for the appointment of a committee for the management of the boarding school, it was concluded to continue the old committee, whose membership is large.

30th.—A meeting for worship is regularly held on Fourth-day. It is attended by a considerable number of non-members, and was again a season of much earnest waiting and of labor in the ministry.

In the afternoon the meeting appointed for the young took place according to arrangement. Several forms near the front of the meeting-room were reserved for the seats of those to whom the concern extended, and these were filled with the youth of each sex. A very appropriate address, full of Christian love and instruction, was calculated to reach the religious sensibilities of those who in the order of nature must be the successors of the men and women who are now the most responsible actors in the Society. As in some other instances, the good impressions made were not increased, it was to be feared, by addition in the same line from subsequent speaking. The occasion, however, was believed to be helpful and confirming.

Tenth Month 1st.—The final session of the Yearly Meeting takes place on Fifth-day.

The annual report of the Boarding School Committee was read, and considered satisfactory. A debit balance in the accounts of some six hundred dollars was due largely to extraordinary repairs to the buildings. An association of old scholars gives substantial assistance to pupils whose means are limited, by loaning them money. A lively interest too is maintained among the Friends generally in the school and in improved methods of education.

Reports of the examination of the treasurer's account, and of the committee for the distribution of Friends' books, were read.

Statistics of the number of families and parts of families in each Quarterly Meeting made this year for the first time in their history, gives the total membership of the Yearly Meeting as twenty-three hundred and forty-four.

Nearly the last business was reading epistles to the five Yearly Meetings with which correspondence is kept up. The theme of these letters was the essential principles of our Christian faith, rather than the activities that are often the subject matter of such communications; fraternal and affectionate in their greetings they were well adapted to bind together in the love of the Gospel the bodies between which they pass.

Evidences of a growth in grace and of united desire to advance the cause of Truth, give a hopeful outlook for the future of Ohio Yearly Meeting of Friends. A deep solemnity covered the assembly as we waited for the period of closing, and it is not doubted many present have returned to their homes with faith renewed in the care and guidance of the great Shepherd of the sheep. Parental care, the Society's schools, and faithful oversight have done much to conserve a pure belief and consistent practice among these Friends, and have been effectual aids in rendering operative the gift of Grace.

The meeting of ministers and elders began on Sixth-day, Ninth Month 25th, and during the period of worship, spiritual communion and introspection were partaken of to the help of the gathered company. Vocal communications expressive of the exercise of the meeting before and during the time of transacting the business helped to unite the hearts of those present. Several Friends from the East were present whose attendance drew the expression of satisfaction from most of the members of the meeting; although some technical points of difference caused adverse criticism upon the reading a minute for one Friend, by a few, which was some interruption to the flow of life that had been enjoyed.

At three P. M. the Meeting for Sufferings sat down, whose business at this time was chiefly to hear the reading of an address on capital punishment, that had been prepared for general distribution. It advocated the abolition of the death penalty for the crime of murder and the substitution of imprisonment for life with the withdrawal of the pardoning power in such cases. The essay seemed well adapted to enlighten the public mind on the subject, and to prepare the way for a reform in this part of the criminal code.

26th.—A session of the Yearly Meeting took place this morning. Epistles from Yearly Meetings in New England, Canada, Indiana, Iowa and Kansas were read to satisfaction. The spirit and tenor of these letters were thought to be more than usually comforting and edifying. A committee was named to prepare replies. A liberal legacy made by a Friend for educational purposes was directed to be placed in the hands of trustees to be nominated by a committee.

The large accommodation furnished for the entertainment of Friends at the Boarding School brings together a numerous company there, contributing to the renewal of old acquaintances and much valuable social and religious intercourse. The Bible-reading in the evening often proves a helpful termination to the day's exercises.

As usual on the first day of the week during Yearly Meeting a great concourse of people from the country around, in addition to the Friends from a distance, and those of several meetings near, takes place. Railway trains and vehicles of various kinds convey hundreds of men, women and children to the meeting-house rounds, many of them intent only on the pleasure of an outing and picnic dinner under the trees. Enough, however, seek an opportunity or worship and religious aid to fill the seats of the large house and in time to settle quietly into a solemn assembly. The free Gospel of Divine grace was largely preached, and both morning and afternoon, it was believed, a good measure of spiritual life was known to circulate.

28th.—The concluding session of the meeting for ministers and elders was held previous to the our of the general Yearly Meeting. John W. Smith was reappointed Clerk. During the reading of the summary answers to the queries addressed to ministers and elders a lively exercise verspread the meeting, and instructive and helpful words of counsel and encouragement were spoken. The opportunity ended in a feeling of gratitude for the favor vouchsafed.

In the general meetings after the appointment of Barclay Smith and William L. Ashton clerk and assistant and some other similar business the reading and answering of the queries began. As this progressed a lively interest in the welfare of the Church was manifested in many brief communications pertinent to the various subjects brought under review. Near the end of the sitting a minister mentioned his concern to have a meeting with the young Friends which was approved by both men and women and a time arranged for its being held.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Westphalian Quakers.

The article which appeared in THE FRIEND recently respecting Westphalia Quakers has elicited a letter from a grandchild of the Christopher Reekfuss mentioned therein. The letter states that C. Reekfuss came to this country and settled in Baltimore for a few years, and then came to Philadelphia about the year 1808. He afterwards removed to Illinois, with his wife and three young children.

"The story of that adventure is a very sad one. After purchasing several sections of land and building himself a substantial house, everything looking promising, he was taken sick with fever and died out there, leaving his wife and children in a strange place and almost inaccessible as far as postal service was concerned, being several weeks sometimes before a letter reached Philadelphia. Remember this was over twenty years ago. My grandmother, after many hardships and heartbreaks, came back to Philadelphia with her little family to my father who was at that time married. Everything out there was left by her in an unsettled condition. She did succeed in selling the horses and cattle, farther than that she did not go—so practically everything was lost. But to return to Christopher Reekfuss—he was always known as a man of deep piety and unswerving truth and uprightness. He was also a generous man who loved his neighbors as himself. As an instance of this, when he came to this country he brought with him a family who wished able to flee from persecution, but were unable to bear the expense, grandfather bore it for them, and without a thought of being repaid, and he never was. The child referred to in the record was buried in the cemetery or church grounds, out there was dug up by the authorities, and in a most cruel manner was thrown over the wall of grandfather's garden. Then it was that the instrument spoken of took place. My mother has told us that grandmother could never relate the circumstance without tears. In view of the stand which these people took for what they considered to be the voice of conscience and light, shed upon their path by the Holy Spirit, and for which they were willing to suffer imprisonment, we may be pardoned for feeling a justifiable pride in such ancestry."

THE MEETING.

A large and reverent company
Were gathered in the meeting-house
That for many years had stood
To shelter those who sought their Lord.
Old Eve-sham house is filled with those,
Who gathered there to worship God:
A feeling of sweet brotherhood,
Seems through the meeting to prevail.
Both branches of the Friends are here,
The churchman and the colored man;
The children of one Father, all,
One universal God to serve,
The true and Christ-like spirit seems
To dwell in every heart to-day.
Oh! how inspiring is the sight,
To see them all united here,
To wait upon and worship God,
For He alone is Master here,
And his interpreter must be Inspired by Him to speak his words.

Oh! what a perfect church on earth,
Where those of different creeds may join
To worship the one God of all;
And Christ-like charity extend
To all who try to serve the Lord:
All dwelling, as we hope, some day,
When to our future home we go,
In love and peace and charity.
As Christ would teach us all to live.
Brothers and sisters, are we all,
And may we for each other live,
And listen for the Father's voice,
To guide and rule the hearts of all.
Oh! what a solemn covering
Spread o'er the whole meeting house.
What inspiration filled the hearts
Of those drawn here to worship God!
The Christ-like spirit seemed to be,
Still teaching his disciples here,
And each went home filled with the truth,
Which God hath power to reveal.
Each took his blessing and sweet peace,
Which always comes from serving God.

ONWARD.

"Have faith in God."

Comrades in Christ's unfinished work—
His confidential friends acknowledged still!
List we the summons which alone can kill
The fears that in our pathway lurk.

Still speels the work, as wears the day:
Vague visions find fixed shape to earnest eyes,
Which weakly shrink not from the harsh surprise
With which at first they cloud the way.

So hath all human knowledge grown,
While God, still lifting the still flowing veil
Of his own works, o'er obstacle and ail
On human intellect hath shone.

Still so the just shall live. His field
Of struggle and exploit shall stretch and change,
While hope, stilled by memory, shall range
O'er new domains half-unrevealed.

Self courts the world; but faithful souls,
Unbound by self, in triumph work, and wield
Anew the staff by which shall still be held
The craven wills which form controls.

The corn is killed in grinding; so
The Truth, to those who know it only by
Its forms, shall seem abruptly to die,
And order into chaos flow.

Not so may we rest in the way;
But dig and plant again while we consume,
And reap rejoicing in that day of doom
Which shall take to each his wages pay!

THY WILL BE DONE

BY H. P. A.

"Thy will be done," we say, and thank
And tremble as he here comes to us,
And shudder as upon the bank
We stand of some great stream.

"Thy will be done," we say, and bow
And cower as beneath a rod,
"Thy thus we say, "Thy will be done,"
When we do speak to God.

"Your way, not mine," we say, and so lie
And grodden, as to shield were sweet;
And joyfully our wills we lose,
As yielding were most meet.

"Your way, not mine," we say, and have
Our own most cherished plans to mend,
"Thy thus we say, "Your way, not mine,"
When we address a friend.

What 'st' to say, "Thy will be done?"
'Tis not a curse 't invoke, nor harm;
'Tis "Father," as a child to say,
'O! hold me in Thine arms."

"Thy will be done," then let us pray;
And say, all self-forgettingly,
"I know not how to choose my way,
My Father, choose for me."

—Christina Alzente.

Nature's Balance.

The more closely nature is studied, the more distinct are the evidences of a thoughtful, carefully devised plan being behind and underneath all its phenomena. Thus, the casual observer deems the events of natural history fortuitous and independent, but the student soon discovers proofs of a careful balance existing between plants and animals while apparently living without reference to each other. This balance of nature may be disturbed by the energetic interference of man, and almost always such successful interference is disastrous, and the same result follows such interference by any agency.

Thus, an English observer, — Ormond, found that a large crop of water cress, cultivated for the table, was much injured by caddis worms eating a large part of it. She then found that these worms were disproportionately increased in the stream where the observation was made on account of the lessened number of trout, as these fish live largely upon caddis worms. Proceeding further in her inquiry, she found that the trout were diminished by the rapacity of herons, which were preserved in the neighborhood in large numbers. Though this special observation is new, it is only one more illustration of the general law above cited, which makes the balance of nature dependent upon the proportionate existence of entirely independent agents. The atheistical scientist will talk of the laws of nature, and the Christian will acknowledge the inevitable power of those laws, but he will go further and see in them only the expressions of that infinite wisdom of God which created all things, and devised the vastly complex universe. To deny them as evidences of personal design, and to attribute them to an abstract law, or the fortuitous arrangement of material atoms, seem as childish as would be the attempt to account for human foot-steps on the seashore by some law which caused the particles of sand to arrange themselves in such an order as to present that particular form. Robinson Crusoe knew better than this, and when he found the print of a foot on the damp sand, forthwith prepared himself for a visit from the man whose presence it proved.—Episcopal Records.

For "THE FRIEND."

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting.

The Meeting for Ministers and Elders was held on the sixteenth of Ninth Month.

For about three miles of the way from Moorestown the road passes through a section of low-lying land, which has evidently been washed out by the floods which in former ages have so greatly modified the surface of the land in southern New Jersey. The ridge on its northern border, on which Moorestown is built, and Mt. Laurel, which bounds it on the south, are supposed to be hills of denudation, that is, elevations left by the washing away of the country between them. The rain of the preceding day had freshened vegetation.

A cluster of Morning Glory vines on the roadside, were overrunning the bushes, and were so thickly covered with large purple flowers as to present a very beautiful appearance. On our return in the afternoon these flowers had shrivelled, their short-lived glory having faded away. We admired also a group of Purple Geraniums, which had established themselves on the bank of a ditch, and which seemed as bright in the afternoon as in the morning. But the prevailing color of the bloom along this part of the road was yellow. In the adjacent fields were large patches of what I supposed to be the brilliant Fleckseed Sunflower (Cucupis trichosperma), different species of Golden Rod (Solidago), and the large-flowered Sensitive Plant (Cassia Chamocrista), adorned the roadside.

The Meeting gathered at Medford under a feeling of depression. This is a not unusual accompaniment of those who are zealously concerned for the prosperity of the Lord's cause, and who keenly feel any evidence of weakness on the part of those who have been looked up to as advocates for the Truth. But as the meeting progressed their faith was in measure revived by the assurance that the Lord still reigns, and that He is as able now as in former times to raise up and qualify those who shall be as standard bearers in his army. The practical lesson was brought home to those assembled, that the failings of others ought to have the effect upon each one to lead them to a close watch over the outgoings of their minds. Our Saviour declared that those things which defile a man come out of his heart; and if we allow our thoughts to dwell upon forbidden pleasures, our strength will be weakened, and in the hour of trial, when fierce temptation "armed with darts tempered in hell," assaults the yielding heart, we will be in great danger of yielding thereto.

It was a satisfactory meeting, in which the hearts of some were comforted.

The Quarterly Meeting for business on the following day was well attended, and was favored with the company of several Friends from other Quarterly Meetings.

There were several communications. Among others a Friend from a distance attempted to quote from the Epistles to the Hebrews, but his memory failing him, he asked permission to read the passage. As this would be an undesirable novelty in our meetings, and might prove an introduction to changes in our manner of worship, one of the Elders suggested, that if the passage did not come up freshly to his remembrance, it would be better not to proceed with his discourse. To this advice he very quietly and properly submitted, and took his seat. There were short communications from several younger Friends, which gave ground to believe that the Head of the Church was still disposed to bestow gifts upon his people, and to raise up those who should be instruments to proclaim his message to others. One Friend spoke of the comfort it was to those who travelled for the welfare of the Church to meet with young Friends, who showed by their dress and manners that they were yielding to the visitations of Divine Grace. Another spoke of the mourning and distress it occasioned to see evidences of conformity to the world, and refusal to bear the cross which Christ lays upon his people, and without submission to which we cannot be his true disciples.

On the whole it was a comfortable and we hope a profitable meeting. J. W.

Lights and Shadows of Port Royal.

A study of these two characters only, Blaise and Jacqueline Pascal, would give a considerable insight into the life of Port Royal. One may admire the penetrating genius of the brother, but there is less to be found in him than in his sister. With her there is a better balance of judgment in some lines, and more naturalness of character and feeling, though even in her the latter quality lacked freedom and completeness. The Letter on the Formulary, already mentioned, was addressed to Angélique de St. Jean, niece of the first Abbess Angélique, and one of the brightest lights of Port Royal. A few extracts (though not given in consecutive order), from Jacqueline's "Letter," will convey some sense of her religious discernment and her intellectual power.

"Truth," said she, "is the only real Liberator, and she makes none free but those who strike off their own fetters—whom bear witness to her with a fidelity that entitles them to be acknowledged as the true children of God the True." . . . "I know it is not woman's business to defend the truth, but perhaps when bishops have the cowardice of women, women ought to have the boldness of bishops. And if we are not to be defenders of the truth, we can at least die for it, and suffer anything rather than abandon it." "The feebleness of our influence does not lessen our guilt, if we use that influence against the truth." "Let us either give up the Gospel, or let us carry out its principles; and esteem ourselves happy in suffering for the Truth's sake. But we may perhaps be cast out from the Church! True; and yet who does not know that no one can be really detached from the church except by his own will? The Spirit of Jesus Christ is the tie that binds his members to himself and to one another, and though the outward signs of that union may be taken from us, its effect cannot be taken so long as we retain the spirit of love, without which no one is a living member of that holy body." "You are doubtless aware that the condemnation of a holy bishop is by no means the only question in debate. His condemnation includes that of the doctrine of our Saviour's grace. If, therefore, our age be so degenerate that none are found willing to die in defence of a righteous man, is it not far more dreadful to think that no one is disposed to suffer for the sake of righteousness itself?"

Yet Jacqueline says that she was used to being treated as a child; and her regard for her spiritual directors and superiors at length brought her to the point of yielding to their advice in the signing of the Formulary—a modified one, I judge. She signed with exceptions and protests, however, but the effect upon her mind was such that she sank under the weight of her grief, and died about three months afterward.

Concerning Pascal and his sister, a writer pertinently observes: "The asceticisms with which brother and sister, in common with other Jansenists, overlaid the foundations of their faith, may well be characterized as superfluous and often absurd; but however disproportioned might be the edifice, beneath it lay the sure corner-stone, whereon whoever buildeth, be he Lutheran or Calvinist, Protestant or Romanist, Jansenist or even monk, shall never be ashamed."

Shortly before the death of Jacqueline Pascal the honorable Mother Angélique passed away. Not long before this time, she had judged it best to join the sisterhood in Paris. The outward tabernacle was now going into decay, but the spirit was as courageous as ever, and her clear intellect apparently undimmed. A remarkable letter written at this time by her dictation to Anne of Austria, is preserved in her memoirs. After representing her condition in something of an apology, she proceeds in the following sentences—though possibly not a literal translation: "For, Madame, being penetrated as I am with the fear of that just Judge who will discern the most hidden folds of our hearts, and will set our secret faults in the light of his countenance, the rigors of his judgments whereof I never lose sight, might easily induce me to disquiet myself the less about the judgments of men. But I should fear, Madame, to offend Him whose justice I dread, if, while your majesty holds in some sort his place here below I should neglect to justify myself before you and if I failed to give my sisters, whom I see borne down by affliction and grief, the testimony which I owe to God and to the sincerity of their consciences, the testimony which I believe I should give at the peril of my life to any house the most alien in the world from me, if I saw I afflicted like this, and was persuaded of its innocence."

During Angélique's last sickness, she passed through an experience which Friends might call a feeling of "spiritual desertion." But before the end, the clouds rolled away, and "an evening time" it was light. She was deprived of the outward ministrations which Roman Catholics are taught so much to regard, but she said she had never put any man in the place of God; and nearly her last words were a testimony to the sufficiency of Divine grace in the hour of extremity: "Jesus Christ! Thou art my righteousness, thou art my strength, thou art my all!" The following sentences are from Frances Martin's estimate of this admirable woman: "She differs from us in creed, ritual and observance; but there is no diversity in the object of her worship and of ours, nor in the faith and love which leave us to cast ourselves as she did, at the feet of Him who is the source of all virtue. We shall gain something, nay we shall gain much, if we learn to look upon her with sympathy and love; if we acknowledge that she was faithful, earnest and devout, and strive in the fuller light of a purer faith to emulate the virtues which make Angélique at least so noble and so great."

I have said that not all the people of Port Royal pretended to a knowledge of the Augustinus, and the character of some of them was very plainly shown before the Jansenist controversy arose. The point to be noted here is this: It was not theology, it was not Jansenism as creed only, that made Port Royal; it was lively, practical faith, operating directly between and his Maker. None of this Christian soul had any idea of separating themselves on the communion of the Church of Rome. Jacqueline Pascal signified that they were not rming "a schismatic church," and they all id themselves to be good Catholics—true sons id daughters of the Roman church.

When severe measures for the suppression of ese Janesist leaders were determined upon, id efforts were made for their arrest, the men Port Royal managed mostly to elude their ursorers, though Fontaine and De Sacy were risoned in the bishop. But in 1664, the suits and the Archbishop of Paris, finding the ibigation and humiliation of the nuns not mplete, carried their oppressive measures still rther. There were at that time about seventy omen of the sisterhood, some of whom were nt away and imprisoned, and the others kept er close watch. Angélique de St. Jean gives ively description of this separation and of her n sufferings in it; and their subsequent return Port Royal, and of their mutual rejoicing at iding each other faithful. It was during this at of persecution that some of those fine letters consolation and encouragement were written.

It might be encroaching too much upon the ace of this paper, to insert many passages from em; but they are worth perusal, and afford an cellent evidence of the intellect and the piety some of the Port Royal company. There was e Countess of Brégy, whose sublime and po- ic style was so rich with the imagery of Scrip- re; there was Father St. Marthe, who wrote the sisters, assuring them that if they looked t back to the flesh-pots of Egypt, they should abundantly grow in grace and benediction; rounseling them not to be cast down if their uls "should at times seem as a parched land," id reminding them that "spiritually as well as mporally, the Son of man grows as a root out "dry ground." And there was Hamon the hysician, outraging the laws of the body, but voted to the health of the soul. It was he who wrote to the nuns in words like these: (We have so often consulted with the ministers ark this!) without being helped in the way, t us now have recourse to Jesus Christ himself, et us confess our sins unto Him, and He will ear our confessions."

(To be concluded.)

IMPROVERISHED BY WAR.—Spain's finances ere had enough before the latest revolt in uba, but the cost of the campaign on that land has brought them to a desperate pass, verything in sight has been mortgaged, the ation is staggering under a debt of sixty-eight illars per capita—our own being about fifteen illars—and the strain is constantly increasing. We are to credit the statement that the salaries all Spain's diplomatic representatives in the nited States are to be reduced one-third; it ident that the government is now resorting ractical and heroic measures.

Italy's campaign in Abyssinia has in like nner added to her already ruinous debt, until or Admiral Colombo is now forced to increase the port duties upon barley and the white corn at constitute the principal food of a considerable part of the population. Italy's debt is nearly re times as large as our own, and amounts rty-three dollars per capita. The provincial and municipal debts are even more crush- g. The reduction of her foreign trade through e customs war with France, the reaction from e wild real estate speculation of eight or ten ars ago, overborrowing on every hand and banking mismanagement and corruption began the destructive work which the cost of the Abyssinian campaign has completed. Wars are very expensive indulgences nowadays.—New York Herald.

What Infidelity Has Never Done.

It never raised a man or woman from sin. It never took a drunkard from the gutter, a gambler from his cards, or the fallen from a life of shame. It never found a man coarse and brutal in life and character and made of him a kind husband and father.

It never went into heathen lands among the morally depraved, and lifted them out of their degradation. It has never written down native languages, translated literature, or prepared text books, or planted schools. It has never founded hospitals for the sick or homes for the helpless.

What discoveries has it made? What improvements has it introduced? Has it added anything to human happiness? Does it bring any ray of comfort to the chamber of death? The religion of Jesus has done this and more too. "The tree is known by its fruit."

The well-known evangelist, Richard Weaver, tells the following story of his early days:

"When I was a working collier, I remember working alongside a great, boastful skeptic, who was engaged removing the supports from certain parts of the workings. It sometimes happens as on this occasion, that a stone gets loose, and comes crashing down upon the miner. This particular stone was only a small one, but quite large enough to frighten my brave skeptic. I was not a Christian myself then, yet I always abhorred his braggart skepticism. When I went up to him he was lying under the stone and moaning, 'Lord help me.' Putting my hand upon the stone I pressed it down so as to make it appear heavier. 'What are you going to do?' I asked; but his only answer was, 'The Lord help me.' As I pressed heavier and heavier, his fear increased, and he redoubled his cries to the Lord whom he had affected to despise. At length I took off my hand, and showed him the size of the stone, saying, 'See there! What is the worth of all your infidelity, when a stone that size can drive it all out of you in half a minute?' Atheism cannot stand the approach of death."—The Christian.

Not long since, in a great city, an aged Christian woman closed her life on earth. She had lived always in very plain circumstances. She had enjoyed only the most ordinary privileges of education. She had no peculiar gift for any form of Christian activity. She had never taught a Sunday-school class, nor led a women's prayer-meeting, nor taken part in a missionary society, nor been connected with a temperance union, or any other sort of organized association. She had never been recognized as an active worker in any capacity. But for sixty of her eighty years she had been a true, earnest, and sincere Christian. She had been a faithful wife and a loving, self-denying mother. She had brought up her family in the fear of the Lord. She had lived a quiet, patient, gentle, godly life. About her coffin there sat a large circle of descendants, her own children and grandchildren. Her life story was a record, not of any great deeds, nor of any fine things done, but of eighty years of plain, simple, lowly, Christlike goodness. Yet it never can be known until the judgment day what blessings that humble life left at its close in the world. Its silent, unconscious influence poured out through all the long years into other lives, making them better, happier, holier, sweeter. S. S. Times.

"TO KEEP QUIET."—The gift of speech is a great gift; but the gift of silence is also very valuable. There is a time to speak and there is a time to be silent; and one time to be silent is when you have nothing to say.

Of course, a man with a well-filled mind and a well-trained tongue can speak on almost any occasion; and if he will speak short and to the point he will generally have a hearing; but when people neglect to store their minds, and do not read, study, learn, and think, they sometimes get into very awkward positions, especially if their talk is stretched out to an unreasonable length.

There is a story of one man who was making a somewhat lengthy address to some children, forgetting how weary little folks become, until at length, having pretty much run out of ideas he said,

"What more shall I say?" when one little urchin spoke up and said,

"Say amen, and sit down!" a suggestion which the speaker was quite prompt to follow.—The Christian.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

It is, no doubt, under troubles of various kinds that the mind is disciplined in the school of Christ and taught to bear his cross without repining. "In the day of prosperity rejoice, but in the day of adversity consider," Solomon says, and he had large experience, both in his hits and misses. I think I never felt more than of latter time the sweetness of the humility of Christ, and there is nothing I more crave for myself and my beloved offspring than that these may enter deeply into it, and there abide. There is nothing more commends us to Divine protection and keeps us aloof from the snares of a watchful and vigilant foe than humility, a grace that lays at the foundation of our spiritual buildings—out of sight, indeed, but very precious.—James Eulen.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 17, 1896.

It has often happened that persons who have received their early education as members of the Society of Friends have afterwards deserted its ranks and joined themselves to some other religious organization. One class of these consist of persons whose religious principles were more dependent upon the instruction received from others than upon the experience of the work of Divine Grace in their own hearts, and the clearness of understanding resulting therefrom—in short, who were traditional and not experimental Friends. Such not having a solid foundation for their profession, are often readily turned aside into other paths. There is often an uneasy feeling with such persons, begotten by the spirit of God, which causes them to feel that they are not living in full obedience to the Saviour's commands, which teach self-denial and the bearing of his cross; yet self struggles against a full submission in all things to the Divine will. In this unsettled condition their safety and true interest consist in surrendering themselves unreservedly to the Lord, and following his leadings through the purifying operations by which He carries on the work of regeneration in his disciples, but it is often the case that the poor, bewildered sinner, too sensible of the infinite value of his immortal part, and easy with a state of alienation from God; and to be not sufficiently humbled to sacrifice all for Christ, is led to adopt some halfway measure, or compromise; and to take up with some profession of religion less exacting than the spiritual doctrines of Quakerism; and in which outward performances have greater place and more dependence is placed on rites and ceremonies. For it remains to be a truth, as stated many years ago by an experienced elder in the church, that the cross, the operation of that power by which the creature is humbled in the dust remains to be the great object of hatred, at which the Enemy of all good is ever aiming his darts.

In addition to the notice of Ohio Yearly Meeting, published in THE FRIEND of last week, we have received another, containing rather more of comment on its proceedings, which we insert in the present number, believing it will interest some of our readers.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Treasury gold reserve at the close of business on the 13th instant was $123,299,116. Official returns from the majority of the Georgia counties show that the Democratic majority for the State ticket will run slightly over 50,000. Governor Atkinson's majority falls below this by several thousand, which his opponent, being a Prohibitionist, secured from men of that party.

A report from Flagstaff, Arizona, states that observations of the planets Mercury and Venus, lead to the conclusion that these bodies make but one revolution on their axes during the journey round the sun, so that each day is a year long.

An old ruin has been uncovered on the Mogul reservation, in Arizona, and nearly two hundred pieces of perfect pottery, and other articles of fine workmanship, were found more than 2000 Germans who have settled in Missler, Ga., and who are making a great success of the cultivation of small farms.

The gold fields in Paulding County, Ga., are being developed, and have proved quite productive.

One of the greatest lead prospects ever discovered in the mineral regions of the United States is located in Duerksen, Mo., the other day. Solid chunks of lead weighing 75 to 100 pounds each, are being taken out.

The marble production in Vermont is decreasing, while the granite industry shows a decided increase.

According to reports, the coming sugar crop of Louisiana will be one of the largest ever produced in that State. There is every prospect that the tonnage of cane delivered at the factories will be very heavy, and the yield should bring satisfactory prices, in view of the reported damage to the beet crop and the bad outlook for the Cuban crop.

The apple crop in Lake Haven, Mich., is the largest for many years. Many of the trees, overloaded with the fruit, are broken down. The winds have blown down thousands of bushes.

A farmer near Sacramento says his crop of apples this season will bring him $12,000, of which $8,000 will be profit. He has twelve acres of it.

The mass of game in the Maine woods during the restricted period has been remarkable. The Boston Herald estimates that at the present time there are 14,000 deer, 12,500 moose, nearly 10,000 caribou and 10,000 bears. In short, the State is a regular menagerie.

In the 12th instant a West Indian hurricane raged with great severity along the entire New Jersey, Long Island and New England coasts. Train service to the various points on the New Jersey shore was entirely cut off and great damage was reported. On the Long Island coast many buildings were washed away. The wind reached a medium velocity of 80 miles an hour. The loss in this city included the numbered 257, which is 18 less than the previous week and 3 less than the corresponding week of 1895. Of the whole number 182 were males and 175 females; 30 died of consumption; 27 of heart diseases; 21 of cancer; 21 of marasmus; 17 of apoplexy; 15 of nephritis; 14 of diptheria; 11 of pneumonia; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of cholera; 11 of peritonitis; 11 of infant; 11 of old age, and 4 of castles.

"FOR SALE."—"Germany," says the St. James Gazette,

"has had five sovereigns since Queen Victoria began to reign. She herself will in future be recognized as the empress of one of the most powerful rulers. Her grandson wears the crown of Germany. Her granddaughter is Empress of Russia. Another granddaughter is the Crown Princess of Romania. Her second son rules over the Principality of Saxe-Coburg. The Hereditary Prince of Saxe-Meiningen is her grand-daughter. The heir to the throne of Greece is her descendant. The Grand Duke of Hesse is her grandson. She has no fewer than 61 descendants within one day than there promise to be at the head of more than half of Europe."

The Archbishop of Canterbury, while attending service in the church building at Hawarden, on the 10th inst., was taken suddenly ill and died in a short time. It is believed that he had pneumonia, which he had heard of. He was 67 years of age.

In one recent consignment a feather dealer in London received 6000 birds of Paradise, 300,000 birds of various kinds from the East Indies and 400,000 humming birds. In three months another dealer imported 336,338 birds from the East Indies.

It is reported that General Grumbkoff's leadership of the Liberal Party, owing to the antagonism of his opinions on the Eastern question with those of the mass of the Liberal party. His resignation will likely make patent the widely divergent views of the Tory and Liberal parties in regard to the Russian alliance.

On the 9th inst. Lord Rosebery made a speech in Edinburgh, in which he said he was opposed to a decided act on by Great Britain in the Turkish question. Such action would mean a European war, with the slaughter of hundreds of thousands and threaten the existence of Great Britain. The panacea, he said, was concerted action by the Powers nearest interested. This could not be long postponed.

The London cable, this week, N. Y. Evening Sun from London says: It is learned upon unquestionable authority that Russia has undertaken to interfere actively in Turkish affairs unless the Porte carries out fully the long delayed Armenian reforms. England and France agreed to give their moral support.

It is understood in Berlin, that the Kaiser will shortly give an audience to General Grumbkoff, the German officer in the Ottoman service, who is the bearer of an autograph letter from the Sultan to the Kaiser. General Grumbkoff is accompanied by the Sultan's Ambassador, Ghali Bey, who will also be received by the Kaiser. The mission of General Grumbkoff, according to the South German paper, is one of great political importance. In the meantime an interview with General Grumbkoff appeared in a Berlin paper, in which the Turkish Commissioner defends the action of the Sultan and the leading officials, contending that no man occupying the Turkish throne could fulfill the demands of the Powers surrounding him. The Sultan, he maintains, must always take into consideration the probable effect of the fulfillment of such demands upon the Mohammedan populace; otherwise there would be great danger of an outbreak of Moslem fanaticism, leading to the total annihilation of the Christians within the Empire.

A free school for teaching the Russian language has been established at Seoul, the capital of Korea. It has forty-six pupils, ranging in age from 20 to 40 years.

News was received at Panama, on the 7th inst., from Guayaquil, Ecuador, that the town has been almost wholly destroyed by fire. Fully 30,000 persons, nearly one-half of the city's population, are homeless. Great destitution prevails, many persons being without food and without even necessary clothing. Miguel Valverde, Consul General of Ecuador, received a cablegram from the 8th, which stated that the fire had destroyed 1000 houses. The loss is estimated at $25,000,000, while the total insurance is but a little over $2,000,000. Consul Valverde's cable states that the fire was probably of incendiary origin, and that great indignation is felt because of the crime. Prompt punishment will be meted out to the offenders should they be caught.

The apple crop in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia promises to be unusually large. It is estimated that the aggregate yield of Canada will amount to 3,000,000 barrels.

BENJ'N. FASMOORE, Supt.

Died, Ninth Month 2nd, 1896, at his residence in Mead, Hawley County, Kansas, aged 86 years, seven months and four days, was a minister and member of Springfield Meeting, in that county, where he has resided from his birth on the land settled by his ancestors in the year 1639, and occupied continuously by five generations of the family from that time until the autumn of 1855. From his early boyhood he was known as a pious and conscientious Christian, much attached to the principles and testimonies of the Society of Friends, and consistent in supporting them. He occupied the stations of overseer and elder in Chester Monthly Meeting for several years, and later in life feeling called to the public ministry of the Gospel, his gift was acknowledged by the church and members of the congregation, and during his entire adult life disease conformed him to his chamber a few weeks before his decease. Great was his solicitude for the spread of Christianity, and the suppression of vice and intemperance in the community where he resided, and in the city of Philadelphia. He spent much time in distributing religious tracts and books, and many of his friends, during his life, were afflicted with their present ills, and those present to them respecting their evil habits; and at times stopping and gently reproving profane persons whom he might have misused the sacred Name as he passed them on the street. He was a loving Friend to the young and Society, deeply interested in their spiritual welfare, and frequently called at their homes, with encouraging them to enlighten under the banner of Christ, take their cross to worldly pleasures, and follow the Heavenly Shepherd. With a humble estimate of his own attainments, he ever sought to honor the Lord Jesus Christ as his Redeemer and hope of salvation; that only best of all things, and the only true religion. When near the close of his life he said to his brother who sat by his bedside, that he wanted all his brothers and sisters to commend each other to the mercy and care of our precious Saviour, adding, "I am very unworthy, very unworthy." Oh him it may be truly said, "Behold an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile."

TO L. H. B.

PHILADELPHIA, Fourth Month 7th, 1861.

"When a little lamb of the fold is in any anger and bleateth, the Good Shepherd has to relieve it from its difficulties. So I believe He prompts me to give an early answer to thy touching letter. I tried immediately to appear thee on my heart before his throne, but words would come to my relief.

"While reading thy letter, the words 'Water of regeneration' came so forcibly again and gain to my mind, and yesterday morning on waking, such a precious sense of his love attended, and a nearness of feeling with thee, that could again commend thee to Him, not in any words but in tears. May He lead us all in thee, teach us and fit us for his kingdom. My mind is at rest altogether on those points (some of the doctrines of Friends), but whenever any doubts arise and I try to spread them before Him and wait for his revelation, they are sure to be cleared.

This is good, dear Laura to wait, deeply wait, before Him for instruction. Surely there is a relation in these days, or how could the thoughts of my heart have been spoken to, time after me, by his faithful ministers? It seems to me my precious friend, if we try to live all the time in his holy fear, letting our thoughts, words and actions be holy, this is confessing Him or is government before men. None could have been more determined to leave the Society than myself at one time, though it was more from rebellion than conviction.

"E. Pittfield commenced her communication this afternoon with the words, 'And the Lord direct your hearts into the love of God and into patient waiting for Christ.' Two or three times she said she felt comforted and thankful in being one of this people, dependent upon the Divine Teacher. Ah! I can respond. I would not like to be anywhere else; God Almighty, my Father, and the dear Saviour, my baptizer, to the new life, my Reprover for my slips, my Mediator upon repentance, the alone Teacher of everything and my All in All! . . . It indeed good to trust in Him for everything. . . . That passage, 'Bread shall be given him, his waters shall be sure, hath often comforted me heretofore, and now it comforts me in a spiritual sense, for I long for more sensible heavenly bread, more of a knowing Him as his faithful children know Him. 'Ask and ye shall receive,' is another precious legacy. . . . Farewell from thy loving friend, but one who often feels herself the very least of all the flock.

"D. B."

1861.—Fourth Month.—Thou God, seest me all the time, may I be more watchful and circumspect.

Fourth Month 19th.—This is my thirty-first birth-day. Oh, how merciful the Lord has been to me; He has led me about, instructed and kept me, and I have been so unworthy of it all. I do this morning earnestly dedicate myself, my all, entirely to thee. Oh! Lord, accept me in thy mercy unworthy as I am. Be pleased to help me to love thee with all my heart, and with all my soul, and with all my strength, and with all my mind, help me to keep very humble all the time, make me what thou wouldst have me to be; oh! be with me in this way that I go. Be pleased to make me very humble and meek and lowly in heart, and wilt thou dearest Father, for Christ's sake, fit me and prepare me for heaven. Teach me how to wait on thee, and grant unto me some living bread and living water.

Again she writes:

TO L. H. B.

Fourth Month 28th, 1861.

"Dearest L.—I look upon no one sect as the 'Church.' Every true struggling Christian belongs to this church militant, and as they follow Him in his baptisms and crosses, or washings of regeneration, will, in the end, join his Church triumphant in heaven. All that fear God and work righteousness are accepted. Thou hast already joined this Church, if thou hast fought the battle with thy own sins and corruptions as manifested, one by one, by this Light of his Spirit, and straining in earnest to walk without sin.

"I am more and more convinced of the truth of this passage, 'Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.' He will indeed manifest himself to his watching, waiting, praying and obedient children. How sweet the promise is of John xiv: 21 and 23, and Rev. 3: chap, 20th verse: 'Thou sayest, my dear, thou lovest the quiet of our meetings for meditation, it may be right for thee; but lately it seems as though I dare not meditate in them, dare not think! but if I get the Heavenly Bread himself, must wait, wait in awful solemn silence for the arisings of his presence. Oh! how I have struggled for this, and now do struggle to get that state when I can worship the Almighty God in awful, solemn reverence and stillness, in spirit and in Truth.' How could I be disturbed with singing, praying, or speaking from another's mind unless immediately from my Father.

"Take not thy flight in the winter season. How thou wast on my heart during Yearly Meeting week, and how I did wish thou was present the last day. Elizabeth Evans spoke so sweetly to the young Friends, of Elijah waiting at the mouth of the cave.

"C. Wistar told me thou was sick one day, and I was fearful thou was worrying thyself too much; please do not do so, it is a gradual work. I used to make myself sick sometimes, but at one Quarterly Meeting long since, E. E. opened that passage so beautifully, 'The King's daughter is all glorious within; her clothing is of wrought gold. She shall be brought into the King in raiment of needle-work.' She remarked that the needle-work was done stitch by stitch, that it was a gradual work, performed by being attentive to one little intimation after another, till we are clothed with the white robe of his righteousness, nothing of our own, all of his mercy in showing us. Blessing, glory and honor be ascribed by us both to his Holy Name here and hereafter, with my soul most humbly. . . . I commend thee to his blessing and mercy and light, and remain thy deeply interested and loving friend,

"DEBORAH BROOKS."

Fifth Month.—After passing through the blackness of darkness the few days past, on account of many wilful transgressions, and begging earnestly to be forgiven, I do this morning feel such an assurance that I am now indeed born again. Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin. I never felt such sweetness and heavenly love before, such newness of life. Oh! I can indeed bless thy Holy Name, oh, Lord, for I am thine now, do with me what thou wilt; grant me preparation and innocency oh, Lord, if sin, temptation and the devil should ever come again.

Seventh-day morning.—Teach me, oh Lord, how to dwell with thee, through life! Oh, give me life, heavenly life in myself. Oh, unite my soul to thee, so that I cannot sin; unworthy though I am, give me of thy Holy Spirit to strengthen me. Show me, oh Lord, how to keep with thee while attending to outward affairs.

12th.—The following words of Isaac Pennington speak the language of my heart so thoroughly. "Oh! how the soul that is sensible of its filth longeth to be washed! How it panteth after the pastures of life, the food of life, the living waters; to appear before and enjoy God in the land of the living. Oh! how doth the heart that is daily afflicted with its unbelief and disobedience, long for the faith that stands in the power, and the obedience that flows from the power. Oh! teach me thy statutes; show me the pure path of obedience in the way of life, guide my feet in the way everlasting. Oh!

The one same effort of the mind, the other perfect stillness. William Penn said 'Love silence, even of mind,' and how refreshing and strengthening to the weary soul some such seasons are.

write thy fear in my heart, that I may not depart from thee; create a clean heart in me and put thy Spirit within me, to be my strength. Oh! continue thy loving kindness to them that know thee, and thy righteousness to the upright in heart. Oh! what unutterable breathings daily issue out of the broken spirit towards the spring of its life."

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Sixth Month 2nd, 1861.

"Dear Laura, thy poor friend is in the depths here. I could tell thee much here, but I am often reminded of an old saying, viz: 'Religious experience frequently related is like a smelling bottle, which frequently exposed, loses its scent and savor, and is lost.' Only I would ask one favor, let us pray for each other that we may have faithful, obedient hearts. I have just been reading over thy sweet letter again, and can rejoice that thou art so enabled to lay hold of his precious promises to us, poor and unworthy as we are. May He, in his own time, give thee relief. Thine in love,

"D. B."

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Seventh Month 8th, 1861.

"The closing sentence of thy letter brought much comfort to my heart. The 'Rest of the people of God'; how sweet it is, and how my soul longs for more deep draughts of it, which I know is in store for the truly obedient children.

"D. B."

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Ninth Month 9th, 1861.

"Two Friends came on Sixth-day and asked me to open Northern District Primary School temporarily, as Jane Boustead had resigned, and mentioned their opinion, I could have it permanently if I wished. It felt pleasant to me then and has since, generally. Two or three times it has seemed sad and a disappointment, but I now enjoy being with the little ones so much that it would be a cross to go back. Oh! saith my soul for a faithful heart to follow a crucified Lord, every moment of my life.

"It has often seemed to me that if we read much and ponder the writings of other societies it is apt to bring confusion, and perhaps lead to a desire to be like them. What will say I am prejudiced, but really it seems safer for me to keep to Friends' writings generally, and not reason too much. The next Third-day after this was here, Wm. Evans was at our meeting; in his communication said, 'That our Society made a higher profession than any other, viz: 'That of being led by the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit,' (though we have sadly to acknowledge not always possession). 'Be thou in the fear of the Lord all the day,' is the command.

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Twelfth Month 12th, 1861.

"Of late I have thought much of the passage, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart and with all thy soul, with all thy strength and with all thy mind.' I do pray for a clothing of his love over me, over my mind, and that his holy fear may be written upon my heart.

"I think it is the will of our Heavenly Father that we should take care of our bodily health. The heart, the heart is what He searches. . . . Thou mentioned dear Elizabeth Evans, how sad the feeling is, when we reflect we can see and hear her no more. Shall we not pray for ability to follow her as she followed Christ.

If I could only attain to half her excellence and favor with the Almighty One.

The Hindu Magistrate's Death.

At the Wednesday evening biblical lectures for non-Christians at our Free Reading Room at Madanapalle, in 1871, there was one countenance that we always expected to see.

The grāma reddi, or village magistrate, Musalappa by name, always came early and took his seat by the second window on the right from the speaker's desk. He listened with apparent pleasure, and the fixedness of his attention always attracted the notice of the speaker, and his reverent mien during the concluding prayer made one feel that he was silently joining in its petitions.

He was a cousin of the high caste Hindu farmer whose hand and arm had been so fearfully crushed under the wheel of the idol car, shortly after we located at Mandanapalle, as they were drawing it, in its annual outing, late at night. He was one of those who ran to my house, and waked me and begged me to come and see if I could save the man's life, for he was dying with nervous shock and loss of blood. The man's life was saved. The ten fractures in his fingers, hand and forearm were set and united so that he again had the use of his right hand, and neither he nor his brothers or cousins ever joined again in those car-drawing festivities.

When the reading room was opened in 1870, and the weekly biblical lectures for non-Christians were begun, he seemed to be glad to have a chance to listen to Christian teaching without mingling in a Christian congregation and drawing on himself the adverse remarks of his co-religionists.

He was a very quiet, sedate, reticent man, whose character was respected by all. His attentive, earnest countenance, both in our church on his occasional attendance there, and weekly at the reading room, made me feel that the truth was gaining an entrance to his mind and heart. He seemed to avoid giving me any chance to speak to him personally; and I was content to let him continue to drink in the truth weekly at our services, fearing that he would be driven away if I personally pressed the truth home.

A year had passed from the opening of the reading room. In August of the following year, 1871, there was an epidemic of cholera and of smallpox at the same time, and a number of cases of typhoid fever in the town. My assistant in the hospital was absent on a vacation, and I was driven with work beyond measure.

One morning as I was sitting at the dispensing table in the hospital, Musalappa came in and sank upon a seat, exhausted. I saw that he was very ill and went to him at once. He said that he had been very sick for a week or more; that he had asked his brothers—for they and their families all lived together in one house as one family—to ask me to come and treat him or to bring him to the hospital in a coach or palanquin, but they had absolutely refused and called in native doctors; that he was sure he was fast getting much worse, and that that morning when they were all out of the house he had got up and, unnoticed, stolen away on foot to the hospital for me to prescribe for him. I did all that could be done, giving him medicines for the day and night, and sent him home in a conveyance, promising to come the next morning to his house and see him. I was quite at a loss to account for his family so objecting to his coming to me for treatment, as many of them had been to me for treatment at different times.

The next morning, and daily, I went to see him, though I was so driven with work that I could go but once each day, and then make but a very brief visit. A crowd gathered around the moment I went into his room every time I called, and seemed to seek to prevent my talking with him any more than to prescribe. I could not but notice that there was an unusual commotion about the house, which I could not explain. It was typhoid fever, and he died, in spite of all that could, at that late stage, be done for him.

One of his cousins, some months afterward came to me and told me that during his sickness he was talking continually of Jesus Christ and of Christianity, saying that it was true, and they must embrace it; and it was undoubtedly their fear that he would openly embrace Christianity before his death, and bring a stigma on them, that made them keep him so long from coming to me, and so guarded when I was present.

I spoke to him generally on the subject of death and of Him whom alone we can trust in such an hour, but did not press it home so personally as I would had I then suspected what I afterward learned to be the fact.

When I spoke to him of Christ, his brothers standing by, prevented his replying, saying that he was too weak to converse. His cousin afterward told me that during the night before he died, after incoherent talking of Jesus and his salvation for some time, he suddenly rose to a sitting posture in bed, and called out with a clear voice: "The glory of Jesus Christ is filling the whole world, and we must all bow before it. He is the Divine Redeemer."—Jacob Chamberlain, M. D., in the Independent.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

A Visit to Ocean City.

Accepting the invitation of a kind friend who is learned in shells, to go with him to Ocean City and see what spoils of the ocean could be found on the beach, I took the cars for that place on the twenty-second of Ninth Month.

Ocean City is situated on the northern end of the beach that commences to the south of Great Egg Harbor Bay, a few miles south of Atlantic City. The railroad from Camden goes towards Cape May, but about twenty miles before reaching that point a branch runs eastward to the coast, and after crossing the salt meadows, comes to the beach at Sea Isle City. From Sea Isle City a railroad runs along the beach northward to Ocean City.

A search for shells along the beach is a very uncertain business. After a southeast storm, it is often the case that the waves wash up from the bottom, multitudes of shells and other sea products, and strew them by myriads on the sands, so that a rich prize awaits those who come at once and pick up these treasures before they are buried in the sands, which are ever moving by the force of the winds, and soon hide small objects from view. At other times the most careful search may fail to reveal much of interest. That was the situation on the day of our visit. The weather had been comparatively calm for a considerable time before we went to the shore, and my shell friend expected but poor success. We found only about ten species and these in comparatively small numbers. The first variety I noted was a small cylindrical shell, lying among the grass or sedge, called Melampus bidentatus, deriving its specific name from two ridges or prominences or teeth at the lower end of the opening which leads into the interior of the shell—Bidentatus means "two-toothed." This animal is an air breathing one like the common garden snail, and although it appears to enjoy its salt water baths, it requires intervals of exposure to the air.

Another small shell, but rather larger than the Melampus, being nearly three-fourths of an inch in length, was Dog-whelk (Nassa tritortosa). It may be described as a spiral one, starting from a fine point and showing three distinct coils as it approaches the larger end or mouth of the shell. This species is carnivorous and bores holes with its tongue into other shells and feeds on the animal within. Several of these species I picked up had been treated in the same way, and were pierced with the small round holes, through which their flesh had probably been extracted by an enemy of their own species, or some other carnivorous variety. One of the foreign Nassas is very destructive to the oysters on the French coast.

I found also a larger species of spiral shell, not much longer, but much thicker—the Periwinkle (Littorina irrorata). It is an interesting looking object, with numerous prominent revolving lines on its surface. The Periwinkle is largely used for food in Great Britain where the number used was estimated a few years since as two thousand bushels a week during six months of the year, and five hundred bushels a week during the other six months. The Periwinkles are vegetable feeders. Both it and the carnivorous shells are provided with a peculiar soring ribbon or tongue, which is closely beset with horny teeth, which by backward and forward motion rasp down objects that are brought in its way. The common European species is said to have about six hundred rows of teeth on its tongue.

The species thus far described all belong to the univalves or one-shelled mollusca. We found also several of the bivalve or two-shelled species. One of these was the Surf-clam (Maera solidissima), which is an abundant inhabitant of the sandy coasts. The shells, when full grown, are as much as six inches long, and were formerly used by the Indians as hoes in the hilling of their corn, and more recently as sugar scoops. In one that I picked up, the two valves were still adhering, and were kept open by an elastic ligament or small mass of cartilage which occupies a small cavity in the back of each valve. On the inner face of each valve are two round scars at which, when the animal was living, were attached the strong muscles whose contraction closed the shell. When the death of the animal destroys the muscular action, the elasticity of the ligament opens the shells. These clams are much used for bait in fishing, but are not much esteemed for food.

There was a third member of our little company who was as much interested in the wild flowers and plants, as the shellman was in his ocean favorites. We collected more than sixty species of plants around Ocean City, and would probably have added to the list, if we had not been driven from the spot by a shower of rain, which induced us to take an earlier train home than we had intended.

Several of the seaside plants are fleshy in their texture, such as the Sea-purslane (Sesuvium portulacastrum) and the Salt-wort (Salsola kali). This is a low branching annual, with rose-colored flowers and short and thick leaves, all prickly-pointed, so that the plant cannot be handled with impunity. It is said to be closely allied to the Russian Thistle, which has given much alarm to the western farmers by its rapid growth.

An interesting plant of the Grass family was the Sea Sand Reed (Amphiphila acuminata), which grew abundantly on the piles of bare sand. On approaching one of these piles where the wind or other force had removed some of the sand so as to leave a perpendicular bank, my flower-loving companion called my attention to the long root-stocks of the grass running down several feet into the earth. From these there branched out numerous layers of fine rootlets which tended to bind the sand together.

A common road-side weed is the Clot-bur (Xanthium strumarium). At the shore we found another species, the Xanthium canadense, in which the beaks of the fruit were armed with hooked spines, and intermingled with abundant hairs. In one upland species the hairs are wanting, and the beaks are straight. Gray calls the Clot-burs coarse and vile weeds, yet they are botanically interesting. But we met with many plants so beautiful and bright, that they are attractive to those whose tastes are not scientific. Such were the two purple Gerardias—G. Purpurea and G. Maritima—the splendid shore Golden Rod (Solidago sempervirens), the Sea Lavender (Statice limonium), the delicate and slender-jointed Polygonum (Polygonum arifolium), and the beautiful marsh Century (Sabbatia stellaris), bright with rose-purple flowers. FOR "THE FRIEND."

DWIGHT, Kans., Ninth Month 27th, 1896.

Having, as I apprehend, been led to see that some things connected with the usual exercise of the elective franchise are inconsistent with some of the testimonies borne by us as a people, it has pressed upon my mind to present some of the reasons why I have felt like declining of late years to vote at our general elections.

Probably the first thing which seemed to fasten upon me in this way was the fact that in all political parties I found men equal to or superior to myself in judgment and general information, who were equally sure that the success of the political party to which he belongs would tend to the greater good of the country.

Being conscientious that I be casting a ballot which, were it to decide an election, should certainly work the greatest good to the greatest number, I began to investigate both the principles and practices of those parties which make our nominations and shape the political concerns of our country, and soon found that in order to keep duly posted on passing political events I so used the spare time at my command that my time for religious reading and reflection was very much encroached upon; and further my thoughts were turning more and more to these things and less and less to things of more lasting concern. I observed that near election time not only myself, but my friends, turned to politics as a principal topic of conversation, and I reflected that from the "Abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh," and further that we were enjoined to "Seek first the kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof." As I allowed place to these considerations, other things connected with the exercise of the right to vote presented; among them are the fact that when voting for a President we are helping select the head of the army. The Governor of our State is also the chief commander of the militia. The Sheriff of our counties in most States becomes the hangman in case of capital punishment, and in exercising the duty of arrest should he take the life of a man he is justified before the law; and, when fully known, the duties of many of our public officers at times lead them into the responsibility of sacrificing human life, and this in time of peace.

If I, by my vote, elect these men to an office the known duties of which under circumstances likely to occur, may lead them to cut short the thread of life in my fellow man, how can I escape the responsibility of an accomplice in causing his death. I am aware that far the larger share of those who are members of the various branches of the Society of Friends feel it almost a duty to vote at all general elections, if not exactly for candidates of entirely satisfactory character, at least for those whom they believe most nearly represent their views. I believe that far the larger number of these have not given these matters that proper consideration in the light of our higher duties which its importance demands. We have no right to "Do evil that good may come of it," and there are times when we should "Let the pot-herbs of the earth strive with the potsherd's." C. H.

EARTHQUAKES IN FORMOSA.—Earthquakes are very common and do enormous damage. In 1891, on one day, four shocks were felt, and a month later, two more. Years ago, at Keelung, rumbling sounds were heard, and the waters of the harbor recoiled until fish of all sizes were left wriggling and floundering in the mud and pools. Women and children rushed out to secure such rare and enticing prizes, but shrieks from the shore warned them of the return of the water. Back it came, furious as a charge of battle, overlapping its appointed bounds, and sweeping away all the houses in the low-lying land along the shore. The story of that tidal wave is handed down as one of the great catastrophes in history. At Kim-pau-li, not many years ago, a shock was felt. Rice-fields suddenly sank three feet, and the sulphurous waters rose and still cover the place. Sugar-cane is now cultivated in large tracts where boatmen plied their oars in 1872, and the waters of the Fannsi River glide over places where stood villages in which I preached the Gospel twenty-three years ago.—Selected.

WHAT SIXTY CENTS DID.—According to a Texas paper an investment of sixty cents in whiskey, by a young man named Dean, in the year 1869, cost Fannin County, in time and money, more than the revenue arising from the whiskey traffic for five years amounted to. Dean, inflamed with his whiskey, shot and killed Dan Coulter. Then the McDonaids shot and killed Dean. For this offence they were arrested, and after continuing the case several times, were tried and convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to the penitentiary. While in jail they were rescued by their friends breaking open the jail and liberating them. Taking it together, this sixty cents' worth of whiskey killed two men, made one widow, caused two men to be incarcerated and kept in jail at an enormous expense to Fannin County, and caused trouble to the families and friends of those two men; and then the expense of witnesses and trials in court, with loss of time to the sheriff and posse, put Fannin County to the expense of not less than ten thousand dollars.—The Christian.

THE HOUSE OF OBED-EDOM.

MARGARET E. SAUGSTER.

The house of Obed-Edom,
Where safe the ark abode,
What time were wars and fightings
On every mountain road;
What time was pitched the battle
In every valley fair,
The house of Obed-Edom
Had peace beyond compare.

With famine on the border
And fury in the camp,
With the starving children huddled
In the black tent's shivering damp,
With the mothers crying sadly
And every man a prayer—
In the house of Obed-Edom
Was neither want nor care.

The fields of Obed-Edom,
No foe-man trod them down;
The towers of Obed-Edom
Were like a fortress town;
And only grace and gladness
Came speeding on the road
To the house of Obed-Edom,
Wherein the ark abode.

And far and near they told it,
The men that heard that way,
How fell Jehovah's blessing
On that home by night and day;
How the smallest to the greatest
Had joy and hope and love,
While the roof of Obed-Edom
Was watched by God above.

The line of Obed-Edom
Is on the earth to-day;
In the house of Obed-Edom
Still he may safely stay—
Who, dearer than all treasure
For which men toil and plod,
Shall prize the covenant-blessing,
The hallowed ark of God.

And never strife nor clamor
Shall break the tranquil spell
In which our Lord's beloved Forever safely dwell.
In the house of Obed-Edom,
In sunlight or in darkness,
Abides the ceaseless blessing
That rests within the ark.

RESCUED.

The willows bend in silent weeping,
The fir tree bows its stately head,
Something is gone from out our keeping,
A voice is rescued, some one lieth dead.

A voice is still'd that used to sing at evening,
A baby voice that lisped in accents gay;
A mother born in silent grieving,
A seraph form has past from earth away.

'Twas when the snows were softly falling
And wintry winds were moaning round,
And now I hear the song-birds calling,
And flowers are blooming on a baby mound.

A FINISHED EDUCATION.—One of the poorest things that can be said of a man, or that he can say of himself, is that he has a finished education. It is equivalent to saying that he has ceased to grow and to gain; that he will never make any more progress. A child was born into a home of wealth and refinement. It was a bright child, and there was hope for it on the part of parents and friends. It continued to grow and to learn until it was ten months old, and then all growth and learning stopped, except in faint signs of added months in the lines of the face, and in a little fulness of flesh. That child lived on to nearly forty years of age, but it never knew any more than at ten months. It was called a case of "arrested development," but it might have been called a case of "finished education." God pity us if we cease to gain and to grow through this life!—Selected.

A Short Account of John Graham.

On Fourth-day night he was much tried with restlessness, and during this time he recounted some preservations from sudden death which he had experienced, and he afterwards supplicated, "Oh! Thou who art over all, help me to, bear all! Can I still say, 'Thy will be done?' Oh, this poor suffering frame, can it be long?" At another time, when in much suffering, he said, "I shall be relieved in the Lord's time," and then repeated, "Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you"—"my peace."

In reference to an impression that had long rested upon his mind, that more public service might be required of him, he said, "I can't feel that my day's work is quite done! Oh, have I the blood of any on my skirts? Have I told them faithfully? I have tried the fleece, wet and dry. Oh, can I say, I am clear, fully clear?" It was replied, "We know thou hast striven to be in the way of thy duty," and he remarked, "Too much timidity, perhaps." Addressing his wife, he said, "For years, as thou knowest, I never went to meeting without a feeling that I might have to open my mouth—not here, not here, except in matters of order; there has not been much opening. I have thought much of my grandfather (James Graham), a very worthy man, almost uneducated, but an eminent minister, as many hearts could testify; he was brought so low in the preparation for this service, that many of his friends thought him about to yield up his natural life; but he lived long after. One day, after feeling severe pain when in the minister's gallery, he rose with the lines:

'My life, if Thou preserv'st my life,

Thy sacrifice shall be;

And death, if death should be my doom,

But joins my soul to Thee!"

"That must be my motto. I want a motto now that will do for a longer or a shorter time."

On Fifth-day, the 19th, he was not so well, and when a little revived from an attack of faintness, his soul was poured out in fervent supplication for himself, for those around him, and for the church. For his dear wife he besought the blessing of the Lord, which being given, "there can be no bane;" and expressed his full confidence that she would be comforted in her sorrow, saying, "Trust in the Lord," and quoting Hab. iii: 17. To those around he said impressively, "never quench the Spirit." At this time he sent messages of love to absent friends; and dwelt with comfort on the blessedness of the redeemed, who through much tribulation have entered the heavenly kingdom, laying great emphasis upon the words, "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more," as he could appreciate the latter clause from his outward experience. Whilst apparently in a sinking state throughout the day, his mind was kept in perfect peace. He said, "I have for some time felt that I should not continue long, and bless the Lord, there is no terror in the prospect. Some feel ecstasy—I have not that, but a deep settled peace, still in all and through all. I pray the Lord's holy will be done, either for continuance here, or for inheritance in the land above, of my own Father."

He was often deeply exercised lest the maintenance of those principles and testimonies which our religious Society was raised up to show forth before the world should be lost sight of; and in reference to this, on the afternoon of this day, he wished the following taken down in writing:

"It was Esau that saw the broken-down places of Jacob, and determined to rebuild them; and what was the answer? 'They may build, but I will throw down' (Matt. ii). The Lord will ever cause to be thrown down the buildings of Jacob which are not built after his will.

"I have for years seen and felt, and travelled in spirit for the maintenance of a true ministry, committed to this people in such an especial manner, indicating that all the springs of the ministry, and all the service of the ministry, have their only source from Jesus Christ himself. He being the eternal and glorified Head of his own church; unto Him belongeth not only all the power, but all the dominion, for the government must ever be on his shoulders. Let not any think, with how muchsoever of Christian life, and feeling and earnestness they may bring to bear, but that their offerings will be their own, unless they are brought into the deep life and the power of our glorified Head. Their equipment is in danger of being (and great is the danger in this day), like unto that armor of Saul that seemed so plausible to fortify the warrior. David must be willing to be a fool, and go forth in the name of the Lord of Hosts; and then it matters not what eloquence and power of intellect the minister may have."

Seeing the sweet peace with which he was favored, it was remarked that the Lord was truly "a rich rewarder of them that diligently seek Him;" when he repeated, "diligently, diligently!" it's been too spasmodic sometimes with me; but unworthy as I am, there seems nothing in the way—all removed. I hope I'm not deceiving myself! I hope I'm not misleading you!" A bright smile lighted up his countenance, as if looking beyond the things of earth, and he was asked, "What is it dear, dost thou see Him waiting for thee?" He replied, impressively, "I wait for Him!" Turning to his wife, he said, "Don't keep me, dear Don't fret! Remember Mary Penington!"—in allusion to her having been enabled so to follow her departed husband in spirit that she could rejoice almost as much as if he were still with her in the flesh.

In the evening he spoke of the need there is for all to be really living as in tents, ready to strike them at any time, not knowing when the call may come; and dwelt vividly upon some passages in Solomon's Song, especially the seventh and eighth verses of the first chapter, saying he saw so much meaning in the injunction of Christ to his church, "Go thy way forth by the footsteps of the flock, and feed thy kids beside the Shepherd's tents"—"the kids, the little ones, all the tenderest aspirations—brought to feed beside the Shepherd's tents!"

After this he again rallied, and for some days his fluctuating state gave some hope that he might yet be restored to comparative health. This was not, however, his own opinion, and when a hope was expressed on Sixth-day that he might be spared for our sakes, he said, "Tha does not seem likely, in all human probability but I do not know that I have much wish in it I am in the Lord's hands."

The lines were quoted one day:

"I shall sleep sound in Jesus,
Filled with his likeness rise;
To live and to adore Him,
To see Him with these eyes."

he replied, with his quick detection of error "Not with these eyes! 'We shall not all sleep but we shall all be changed.'" Afterward dwelling upon the description given by John 0 "One like unto the Son of Man."

His desires for entire sanctification were constant, and found expression in such words as these: "Cleanse, cleanse, cleanse; purify, purify, purify!" "Purge me with hyssop; that's bitter," and at another time broke forth, "Oh, to drink of ambrosial streams!" to lave in the river of the water of life! "Nothing that is impure!" Cleanse me, Almighty, from every remnant of iniquity." Some part of the hymn, "Nearer to Thee," was quoted, when he exclaimed, "Nearer! Oh, I want to get nearer! I haven't lived near enough!"

On the evening of Third-day, the 24th, the time for dismissal again seemed near, and he gave directions respecting his funeral, requesting that everything might be very plain, and no plate on the coffin; and at another time said, "Let there be no black; I have felt a strong testimony against that." He spoke to his brother of the way of salvation in a very instructive manner, saying that it was "through Jesus Christ, the appointed Mediator and Intercessor." It seemed indeed to come from a heart deeply feeling the great reality that was shortly to be experienced. He also said that he feared to ask for remission of suffering, lest the work of sanctification should be in any way obstructed.

On Fourth-day morning, the end was apparently not far off. After thanking an attendant for her kindness, he said, "It can't be long for any of us, and if we are only ready, when the time comes, it will be better, far better; and could we only realize the joys beyond, all these things would bear no comparison—none at all!" In the afternoon he was in severe pain, but his mind was perfectly clear and unclouded, and expressions like the following were caught: "Pray for me, that I may be gathered into the center of life. I ever feel that I have no claim to ask of thee! I ever claim the merits of the Holy Redeemer. Thy spotless Lamb!" "That I may enter into the fulness of joy at his right hand!" "Yes, blessed Saviour, my Mediator, my Potentate, my Intercessor with thee, the Father of everlasting praise; let our voices be attuned to sing unto thee and the Lamb. Let us reach away from this earth, even unto where Thou dwellest in ineffable brightness. Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, just and true are all thy ways, Thou King of saints, King of kings and Lord of lords! Thou holy, holy, holy! Let all fall down before thee, Thou Infinite Being! Thou Maker and Sustainer of this thy universe. Thou who knowest all the ways of man, and though so high above all, art so condescending as to direct the ways of them that fear Thee! Let us continue to give thanks unto Thee, Oh, Lord, our God; let us commit our spirits unto thee; as unto a faithful Creator. Different as our thoughts are from thy thoughts, and our ways from thy ways, Thou hast seen meet to open up a way whereby we may approach unto thee, even our ever-living advocate, who laid down his life for these sins of ours." "Clinging to thee, clinging to thee, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Receive all our spirits. Oh that my tongue were attuned to sing the praise of the Lord for ever and ever!"

In the evening he obtained some relief from pain, and it was hoped he might pass quietly away without further struggle. He was asked if he wished to see any one, and his reply was, "Only my Lord, in the brightness of his coming," adding, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit!"

Fifth-day, the 26th, was one of intense physical suffering, so that he entreated those around him to unite in prayer with him, that if "consistent with his will, this might now be the Lord's time for his release. At seasons, glimpses of the glory so soon to be revealed were permitted to cheer his spirit, and such expressions as these fell from his lips: "Drawing nearer unto the gates of death! Open, open, open unto me, Lord Jesus, I pray!" Joyful pictures of an eternity of bliss, when this world and its cares are ended! Perhaps I've been too anxious for a realization of the world to come, but however, I've nothing to trust to but the mercy of God in Christ Jesus."

When almost too ill to speak, he said to a sister-in-law, who approached his bedside, "Train them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord!" And to another near relative, "Be thou faithful in the little, and thou shalt be made ruler over more." When allusion was made to the nearness of the prospect before him, he assented, and said, "It is all right, and I am going, through redeeming love and mercy, to exchange a state of mixture for one of everlasting blessedness. He was asked if he was in pain, and he replied, "Yes, great pain, but the Divine will be done, the Divine purposes be fully accomplished." During the after part of the day, his chief desire was to be kept patient; once he said to his brother, "Travail with me in spirit, that I may be preserved in patience."

The night was an almost sleepless one, in the middle of which he broke forth in supplication, commencing with the Lord's prayer, and continuing for some time in a loud voice, adding, "I should like when I pass away, to be engaged in singing the song of the Lamb and the redeemed: Alleluia, alleluia, alleluia, Lord God Almighty, just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints! let all the nations of the earth bow before the Lord and his loving way! Behold, I come quickly! Even so, come, Lord Jesus!"

Daylight again breaking, he wished the blind drawn up, saying with a smile, "I think this is the day! Joyful, joyful day! Lord, if it please thee, may this be thy day to let a trembling, yet confiding creature come and appear before thee." This desire was soon granted, for about half-past seven o'clock, after a severe attack of oppression upon the breathing, the spirit was permitted to pass quietly away.

HERE is an illustration of the better side of the rule of England in India—and that rule is mostly the better side. Most unfortunately the Salvation Army in India has suffered a deep humiliation in the conviction of Ensign Brodie, who, with his wife, was in charge of the Army's work in some villages of the Ahmednagar district. On one of his trips his wife had been insulted by the foul tongues of the people. Two weeks later Ensign Brodie, with a native Salvation captain, rode over to the village, called on the native magistrate, read him a pretended Government document on the offense of the village, saying it had laid itself liable to a fine of two hundred rupees, but that if paid immediately, twenty-five would be accepted, in view of their ignorance and poverty. In an altercation which followed Brodie fired his pistol and shot a man fatally. He was tried for the homicide and condemned to seven years' imprisonment, which was just. Now, the creditable thing is that the judge, who tried the case impartially, and whose charge to the jury is fully approved, is himself not an Englishman, but a native Mohammedan. England allows Englishmen to be tried by natives. Whether this case tells anything against the discipline of the Salvation Army in India we cannot say, but our readers know it has been severely criticised.—S. Leitch.

The Witch Superstition.

Among the Liberian tribes in Africa there is much belief in the existence of witches, and the bad effect of their actions. This often leads to much injustice and cruelty. The following incident is related by Agnes McAllister, who was for several years located in that part of the country. "All was war palaver in town. They had accused the king of witching the war, and two of the devil-doctors of making medicine to kill their own people. Everybody was excited. Men and women came down from the bush-towns of our tribe to take this war palaver. The women did the principal part of the talking. The people all sat down in the sun before the king's house at ten o'clock; and although there came a heavy shower of rain, they did not move their seats, but talked on through it all. Some of the women are great talkers and can hold the attention of all the people. Although the king denied the charge, yet many of the people believed him guilty and threatened his life if any more lives were lost in the war.

"That night the king, fearing the anger of the people, started to run away, but was caught by the people as he was crossing the river to the other tribe. They tied him hand and foot, put him in the top of a small hut, built a fire, and threw red pepper into it. They smothered the flames to smoke with green grass and bushes, and shutting the door, left the poor creature there until morning, when he fell down to the floor through the hole in the ceiling through which they had put him up.

"They untied him then; but he was so stiff and stupid that he could scarcely move. When he felt better they again asked him whether he was guilty or not. Knowing that the people would take no explanation, he said that he was, but would make some "medicine" to counteract all the witchcraft he had used in the war. They kept him shut up all day, but let him go to his own house that night.

"The next day, being Sunday, I went to one of the small towns to hold service. We had not been able to have service for several weeks, since the excited people could not be induced to sit together in one place; and it was seldom they were in town, for all the smaller towns had to be guarded. I had just gone congregation together and started the service, when there came a man who called all the people to the king's town for palaver. My meetings were at an end for that day, and I went with the rest to hear the palaver. It was about the king's witching the war, and the warriors were furious. Some of them wished to take the ring off his ankle, and take him out and kill him. But he begged them so hard not to do it that they left him to make the "medicine" which he had said would counteract all the witchcraft and give them sure success.

"I had been in the habit of taking one day for rest and letting the children go to the river to fish. But since the war had begun I had had no rest day, for many people called at the mission, and I never liked to refuse to see them. In those war times I felt that possibly I should not see them again or have another chance to urge them to accept Jesus Christ as their Saviour.

"One morning the king passed our house without coming in. I asked him to stop, but he said he was going to find some "medicine" and would be back soon. So I set the tea on the stove, as I knew he would be sure to want a drink of tea and something to eat on his way home, for he was always hungry. I looked for him for some time, but he did not come. I thought that perhaps he had gone home by another way and was making the "medicine" for the war.

"Just as it was growing dark he came, and stood for a few minutes under the house, listening to discover whether any of his persecutors were there. One of my boys came to tell me that the king had arrived. I at once felt that something was the matter, for these people do not like to be out in the dark if they can help it.

"I went out and met him just as he came into the house. It was almost dark. I asked, 'Is this you, king?' 'Yes,' he answered, 'is there anyone in the house?' I told him there was no person but our family, and invited him to sit down. He said the people had been all ready to kill him in the morning; but he had run away, and had been in the bush all day without anything to eat. He had two cassadas in his hand, and asked me to cook them for him. We made a fire and got something for him to eat. He asked to stay all night. I told him he could, but inquired what he meant to do in the morning. He said that he intended to run away and never come back to the country again.

"When a man is made king a metal ring is put on his ankle as a sign of his authority; and this ring belongs to the tribe and is handed down from one generation to another. I asked him whether it would not be a good thing for him to take the ring off his foot and leave it with me. I would take it, I said, to the people in the morning, and tell them that I had seen him, and that he had gone to another tribe; and I would beg them not to search for him. Yes, he said, if it had not been for the ring on his foot he would have gone far away that day, but by the ankle any person he met would know that he was a king, and he would be more easily found out. I got down on the floor, and with a pair of pincers, unwound the wire that fastened the ring.

"After supper I gave him matches and a blanket to wrap himself in, and prepared him for his journey. He had a dagger with him. He said he was going to sleep in the bush, and would take some vegetables from the farm as he passed along. He wanted the matches to light a fire to roast them. He lay down on his mat to sleep, but asked me to let the lamp burn by him. He kept his dagger by his side, and was so nervous that he would start at the least sound. None of us slept much that night. At four o'clock I got up and got something for him to eat, and he started off before daylight. He intended never to return to his home again, but hoped to meet some friendly tribe with whom he might live out the rest of his days, which would not be many, for he was already an old man.

"About eight o'clock his brother came up to the mission to see whether I knew anything about the king. I showed him the king's ring, related what I knew, and told him that I was only waiting for the dew to dry off the grass before coming down to bring the ring and explain that the king was gone.

"When I went to town they called the warriors together. I gave them the anklet, and, telling them what had passed at our house, asked them not to follow the king, but let him go in peace. They thanked me many times for taking the ring off the king's foot and bringing it to them, saying I had done them a good service.

"The king wandered on for three days, crawling through the thick bushes at night and hiding away during the day, that he might not be found by his own tribe. But when he was near the place where he was going for refuge a hunter discovered him, and he was brought to one of the bush towns of our own people. They were kind to him, keeping him for several months, and finally making peace between him and his own townspeople, and bringing again him to his former home. For many months he had no power at all among the people. At length, however, the devil-doctor declared that the devil was not pleased with the way they had treated their king, and wished them to put the ring on his foot again. Accordingly a sacrifice was offered to the devil for the wrong they had done, and the king was restored to the king's foot; and he wore it until he died, two years later."—A. McAlister.

Lights and Shadows of Port Royal.

An incident worthy of notice is related concerning Sister St. Eustougie (the countess of Brégy), and the Archbishop. On one occasion he urged her to sign the formulary, saying that if there was any sia in it, he would bear it for her. Her reply was not without a pungent rebuke: "Pardon me, my lord; but it would grieve me too much to put upon your lordship's heavy incumbrances the least additional burthen."

Among the legacies bequeathed to us by that company is the "Gift of an Abbess to her Nuns," by Agnes Arnauld, which contains a portraiture of "the perfect and the imperfect religions." In this work she instructs them that unless "He who has the key of David, unlock the heart, the most holy truth (of Scripture), will find no entrance;" that those alone are blessed who, hearing Christ's words, "abidingly keep them." She teaches them that Christ is to be known, "not by theory, but by experience; for it is only by the teaching of the Spirit," said she, "that men can call Him Lord." Surely no Friend could object to these sentiments.

In the course of years, when the old stock had somewhat disappeared from Port Royal, the ecclesiastical officers and their subordinates found a company more pliable and more to their own minds. But there still remained some to bear testimony to liberty of conscience, and to exemplify the fortitude which is bestowed on those who suffer for righteousness' sake. Among these later champions of truth was Gertrude de Valois, a woman of rank and culture, and one whose character appears as beautiful and as nearly complete, as that of any of her sisters. When she was threatened by the bishop with exile and imprisonment, she replied: "If you immerse me in a dungeon, truth will descend there with me; and He who is the God of truth, will both console me and make me truly free amidst captivity; and if you put me to death, then the same truth will deliver me forever and crown me." To the threat of being deprived of the sacraments, and of burial without "Christian rites," she answered with a smile: "Well, I do not think your lordship will be able to discover any place to cast my body, where our Saviour will not be able to find it and raise it up at the last day; and if in the meantime my soul be happy in Heaven, it is of very little importance where my body is cast."

She endured a rigorous imprisonment in two convents, to whose communities her excellent example was not lost; and she was finally transferred to the convent of Etréas, where, we are told, her presence was like that of the ark to the house of Obed-Edom. During the early part of her captivity, her persecutors endeavored to draw her from her steadfastness by reporting that some of her friends had put their names to the formulary. Her reply seems to manifest the spirit that actuated most of the Port Royalists: "Whatever others are so unfortunate as to do said she, "the word of God cannot be broken on that word I cast myself. He declared, 'Thou shalt not bear false witness;' and his word remains the same, though every one of the children of men should alter. Let God be true though every man be a liar."

The final dispersion of the remaining nuns a Port Royal in 1709 was briefly referred to in the early part of this essay. At the time of that event, there was presented the extraordinary spectacle of a force of armed men three hundred strong, going up to the monastery to carry away twenty-two peaceable old women (some of them paralytic and helpless) to their several places of confinement. These conscientious nuns were pursued, one might say, to their very death-beds; and sometimes their hands were seized and made to affix the name to the formulary, the signing of which had been so often urged in vain.

Upon his death-bed Louis XIV, as is well known, found that he had been kicking against the pricks. He had always "demeaned him as the sons of earth," and now he shifted the blame upon his Jesuit confessors, and said he had "sincerely sought the peace of the church." Cardinal de Noailles, so active in the destruction of Port Royal, also had troubles of his own afterward, and bemoaning them once in the presence of a certain lady, was met by this epigrammatic rebuke: "What would you have, sir? God is just. It is the stones of Port Royal falling upon your head." This prelate, however afterward became apparently penitent, and made what reparation was in his power.

One can scarcely turn from a contemplation of the history of Port Royal without some serious feelings and reflections. It may have to some its perplexing and discouraging aspects as well as its instructive ones. Port Royal has foes of its own household, and there were weaknesses and errors in its best members. It is difficult, too, to reconcile all this admixture of error with the precious substance of unchanging truth; but that truth and error are often and generally mingled in the human mind, no one will deny. Even Lady Guion did not question that her own weakness had been "too much mixed" with what she terms "the sacred intelligences of his pure light." These people were not as those unto whom blindness had happened but as those who were recovering from blindness; and there is something for us to emulate in the integrity and devotion and persevering faithfulness of Port Royal. This is probably the united judgment of many who have acquainted themselves with its memorials; though I believe one writer takes the ground that its dissolution was the punishment it received because "it came not out" from the Church of Rome, while one has also described the differences between the Port Royalists and their ecclesiastical oppressors as "a Protestant quarrel fought out within the limits of the Catholic Church." Perhaps we cannot exactly credit the Port Royalists with so much of the reforms with, but they occupied at least what Vinet calls "the Alpine heights of Catholicism." They clung to many hindering, traditional usages, but they seemed to look beyond them all to the unifying realities.

It may be remembered that the period over which we have passed in this account, includes that also of the persecution of the Huguenots; and our interest is naturally engaged to see what the position of these persecuted Jansenists might be with regard to others who were suffering for conscience's sake. How gratifying would it be to find a more positive word of sympathy for the sufferers, and of censure upon the course of the violent and bigoted oppressors! Not a word of this kind, as it affects other cases than their own in most instances; though a letter of St. Marthe, written to Port Royal des Champs in 1664, breathes a spirit entirely opposed to that of persecution. "When spiritual teachers," said he, "resort to courses of conduct and mysticism, not only unprecedented in Scripture, but wholly opposed to that practised by the apostles; we have solid ground for believing that the doctrines themselves, which demand so different a method of promulgation, must also be different. Now the apostles never resorted to force, or to any worldly incitement, either of pleasure or pain, to compel the will. . . .

Beware then of the doctrines of those whose practice is so wholly opposed to that of the Lord he professes to serve. Such practices are those he would was wont to use against the church, but those of the church against the world. Now neither the world nor the church change their natures. Where then we see worldly practices resorted to, we may safely conclude that it is not the Spirit of Christ, but that of the world in disguise, which has crept into it, that is the agent; and that for the gratification of its own purposes. . . . it is for a time assuming the mask of that church, to whose vitality and spirit it is the most deadly and irreconcilable enemy."

The Jansenists appear not to have discovered what should have been a bond of sympathy between themselves and the persecuted dissenters from the Church of Rome. Arnauld indeed justified the measures used against the Huguenots, and one of St. Cyrano's last works was directed against the Protestants. We look in vain also for what we should like to find in Lady Guion. But silence, it has been suggested, on the part of Roman Catholics at that time, need not be taken to mean more than acquiescence in the decrees of that church, whose authority they were used to accept, and a membership in which was, in their view, an essential passport to salvation.

CONSCIENCE MONEY.—A somewhat amusing example of the power of conscience may be cited, in which the proprietors of Punch are reported to have received threepence in conscience money from an anonymous correspondent, who is said to have surreptitiously read an entire number of Punch from the various pages displayed in the shop front in Fleet Street. Such an instance of the unburdening of the conscience is only equaled, perhaps, by the story told of a fellow of Pythagoras, who, it is related, had bought a pair of shoes from a cobbler, for which he promised to pay him on a future day. He went with his money on the day appointed, but found that the cobbler had in the interval departed this life. Without saying anything of his errand, he withdrew, secretly rejoicing at the opportunity thus unexpectedly afforded him of gaining a pair of shoes for nothing. His conscience, however, says Seneca, would not suffer him to remain quiet under such an act of injustice; so, taking up the money, he returned to the cobbler's shop, and, casting in the money, said: "Go thy way; for though he is dead to all the world, yet he is alive to me."—Chambers' Journal.

A Louisiana Flower Pest.

Reports from the parishes declare that the water hyacinth is proving a far greater nuisance this season than last year, that it is beyond the control of the local authorities, and that the federal government will have to take in charge the task of getting rid of it, or all the waterways of the Southwest will be dammed up and rendered unnavigable. The water hyacinth is a Central American aquatic plant which produces a beautiful flower of lilac or light blue. Nine years ago it attracted the attention of a Louisiana visitor, who brought a few of the plants here and cultivated them in a bucket. Nobody has traced the history of the plant for the next five or six years, but three years ago a few of these flowers were found in Bayou St. John, one of the outlets of New Orleans. It seemed to flourish in the climate of Louisiana even more luxuriantly than in Central America. When, however, a freeze came, the water-hyacinth disappeared, died, and sank to the bottom of the bayou. Next spring, however, it showed itself again, and before the cool weather came it had completely covered the bayou, which looked like a field of purple heather, the water being absolutely invisible, hidden by the thick foliage of the plant, and navigation was seriously impeded. At considerable expense the hyacinths in the bayou were got rid of, but it has since been heard from in a hundred different localities.

Last year the police jury of Terre Bonne Parish had a special meeting to determine what to do with this pest, which was damming up bayous Terre Bonne, Blue, Caillon, De Large, and others, and strangling the lumber industry to death. It was resolved to abandon these bayous already invaded by the hyacinth, as it would cost too much to get rid of it, and try to preserve those still free from it by means of booms or obstructions thrown across the stream. The news now is that all the efforts made to stop the spread of the pest have failed. It has invaded Grand Lake, forty miles long and from two to ten broad, considerably larger than Lake George, and threatens to convert it into a meadow—a score of purple islands composed of water-hyacinths floating on its bosom and being wafted from one side to the other. Even the mighty Atchafalaya, the largest river in Louisiana after the Mississippi, one-third the volume of that stream, and with a velocity of four or five miles an hour, is dotted with hyacinth islands. So far no means of getting rid of the pest has been found. The hyacinth disappears with cold weather, and occasionally without any apparent reason, the bulbs sink to the bottom of the stream; but whenever it does so it always comes to the surface of the water next season worse than ever.

There are some four thousand five hundred square miles of lakes and waterways in Louisiana, and if they are all given over to water-hyacinths the latter will be a great public nuisance, as these "water-lilies," as the general public calls them, are very "odoriferous" at times.—Harper's Weekly.

CLEAN minds are necessary for clean hearts. Indecent and sensational literature are sure poisons for the mind. The popular novel of the day contains many germs that will breed contagion and death. The impure thoughts are the symptoms of contagion, and soon bring forth the unholy acts which are the evidences of approaching death. The mind fed on the light sensation of the novel cannot flourish on the plain and substantial truth of the Bible. The brain stored with the irreverent or obscene story of the office, workroom, or club, cannot retain the simple but saving tale of the cross. The mind filled with the stock reports or scandals of the Sunday paper, cannot aid in the purification or protection of the heart by thoughts concerning God during the morning hour of worship. The mind buried in the thoughts of Satan cannot contemplate the purity of Christ.—Christian Intelligencer.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 24, 1896.

In the present number of THE FRIEND we print a communication from a Friend in Kansas, the tendency of which is to discourage our members from taking part in political contests; and it advises to abstain from voting for executive officers. As to the caution it conveys against allowing the mind to be unduly absorbed in political matters, we can endorse the concern of the writer. As to the latter part of the essay, we do not wish to sit in judgment on the refusal to vote on conscientious grounds, nor are we prepared to condemn those who believe it right thus to manifest their choice in the selection of their rulers. The Apostle Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, cautions against judging one another in regard to matters in which different views may be taken, and adds, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." We believe this is substantially the ground ever occupied by the Society of Friends. There have, it is probable, always been among them some tenderly scrupulous men, who believed it safest for them not to vote, but there were many others, who felt it right to do what they could to secure good laws, and a proper administration of them.

A recent cursory examination of some works written by military officers, show how the professional spirit seems to blind the eyes to the real horrors of warfare, and to create in those affected with it a desire for fighting and bloodshed.

In the description by Eridon Powell of the campaign against the African kingdom of Ashanti, there are several references to the disappointment felt by the officers and men of the invading army, that the King of Ashanti yielded without a battle. It would evidently have been far more satisfactory, if a few hundred men had been slain or wounded before submission was made.

So also, in the account given by Lieutenant Beynon of the march of a British army to relieve the fort of Chitral in India, there are several passages which show that the excitement of actual conflict was grateful to the soldiers. It seems to be one of the results of war, that those engaged in it, become so familiarized with bloodshed and destruction that they lose in large measure the natural shrinking from these dreadful accompaniments of military operations.

Some months ago a concern spread over the minds of the members of our Meeting for Sufferings at the growth among the people of this country of a military spirit. After spending some time in deliberating upon this affecting subject, it was referred to a committee for further consideration, who were authorized, if way should open therefor, to prepare an address on the subject to religious persons of other professions, so as to enlist their interest in the spread of the principles of peace.

The result of their labors was the preparation of an appeal to professing Christians on the subject, which was printed and referred for distribution to the committee that had prepared it. They had an edition of fifty thousand printed, which have nearly all been distributed. It was concluded to send one copy to each of the Ministers in the United States, whose address could be procured. More than forty thousand copies were disposed of in this way. There still remained a large number of ministers who had not been supplied. The Committee made a report of their proceedings to the Meeting for Sufferings, which met on the eighteenth of Ninth Month, which encouraged them to continue the work they had entered upon. From many of those to whom the appeal had been sent, letters were received expressing their unity with its contents, and in many cases requesting copies for distribution. One of the requests was for two thousand copies—but the number sent in response was somewhat less.

The following extract from a notice of the pamphlet in The Moravian may interest our readers:

The object of the Appeal is to draw the attention of Christians to the inconsistency of a warlike spirit and of all wars and fightings with the true spirit of Christianity, which is the gospel of peace on earth and good will toward men. The Friends have always borne consistent witness to the un-Christian character of war, especially between the so-called Christian nations of the world; and there is no doubt that their efforts in this direction have helped to bring about the present tendency on the part of these nations, to avoid the evils and miseries of war, and to settle their differences by peaceful arbitration. This is certainly one of the most hopeful features of the times, and should receive the hearty approbation and support of all who desire that the kingdom of Christ, which is the desire of "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," should prevail more widely in the hearts and lives of men, and in all the world at large. War is certainly a relic of barbarism, and in proportion as a higher Christian civilization is developed, it will be seen more clearly in its true light, and will not only be deprecated as the greatest of evils, but discontinued and discouraged until it is as dead as the sun. "The nations shall not learn war any more," and if we pray for the coming of that day it is our duty to do all in our power to hasten its coming. With the present prevalence of the military spirit among all nations, and the tremendous modern power and development of the armaments of war, it is evident that the nations are not ready for a general disarmament, which will be necessary to the prevalence of a general and permanent peace. But the faithful and consistent inculcation of the doctrines of Christianity, as applied to the hearts of individuals, will be like the leaven which, with its silent yet irresistible force, will eventually leaven the whole lump."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated, on authority of President Hayes, that the little dispatch boat Broncott, never about the world, has been ordered to receive a passage through the Bahamales, as applied to foreign aid. A telegram from London says the British fleet in the Mediterranean has not been advised of such a movement, and cannot, therefore, assist the American fleet, as it stated it would do in a report published by a New York paper.

The United States Treasury gold reserve at the close of business on the 19th inst., had declined to $121,757,293. The day's withdrawals at New York were $285,500.

The United States Coast and Geodetic Survey has just concluded the field work upon the survey of the transcontinental arc, along the 39th parallel of North latitude. This gives the United States the longest base line in the world, to establish subsequent surveys, in existence in the world.

Fitzhugh Lee, Consul General at Havana, has been granted leave of absence from his post in Havana, and will return to his home in Virginia. It is said he returns solely on account of his health.

The assessed value of farms in the United States in 1880 was over ten billion and in 1890 over thirteen billion dollars.

The Secretary of the Venezuelan Boundary Commission said recently that no decision had yet been reached by the Commission, and that the Commission is not yet in possession of all the facts necessary to form a definite judgment.

H. S. Graves, of New York, an expert in the employ of the United States Forestry Commission, has returned from an investigation of the Oregon forests. The finest and largest trees of the kind H. S. Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, First Month 12th, 1862.

"Thy inner life, whether it is one of conflict or of joy unspeakable, often interests the sympathies of thy friend. Hast thou enjoyed this day? To me it has been a season of renewal of the covenant made just three years ago, by my dear mother's dying bed. Seeing so fully my own impotency and weakness to take one good step of myself, I could humbly pray, 'If thou wouldst be with me and keep me in the way that I go,' etc.

"One time thou said if thou took thy vows thou wouldst keep them. It struck me very forcibly then, knowing that without constant watchfulness and prayer and dependence on Him, it could not be done. May this be thy happy lot! How sweet it is to be passive in his hand. Peaceful poverty of soul seems to be my portion to-night. In the world ye shall have tribulations, but in me peace. 'Be of good cheer I have overcome the world.'

"Thy loving friend,

"D. B."

TO H. L. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Third Month 25th, 1862.

"My letters are often written in much fear, knowing how prone my heart is to vanity. 'Remove far from me vanity and lies, feed me with food convenient for me,' is such a profitable humiliating prayer. Since thou was here I have thought so frequently, Can there be any possibility of my precious Laura ever turning back in heart to the lying vanities of the world? Didst thou see that stirring appeal, 'The forgotten sheaf,' in last week's FRIEND? Oh! for preservation, is the prayer of my heart for us both. Oh! for more of his life and power dwelling daily in us, that we might know more of Him and of the power of his resurrection, being made conformable to his death.

"I cannot divest myself of the desire that thou shouldst be a Friend, a Quaker indeed before Him. Sometimes it seems to me, that if this deep 'Life, light and immortality' were really brought to light in thy soul, thou couldst never find it required of thee to turn away from us. It often seems so to me when I hear of any one being disowned, did they know this deep, inward walk with God, those white blood-washed and spotless robes which real Friends experience?"

"May He keep and preserve us, and may He bless us, has often been my prayer when bowed in humble supplication before Him who sees in secret. With prayers and supplications and thanksgiving let us make known our requests unto God. May our Saviour manifest himself and his will more and more fully unto thee, is the sincere, farewell prayer of thy poor friend,

"D. B."

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Fifth Month 1st, 1862.

"Dearest L. my heart seems again to fill full toward thee, and I sincerely hope thou mayest be able to 'Leave all and follow Him.' It is indeed a comfort to know thou believest only in the baptism of his holy consuming fire and the washing of regeneration.

"I am sorry if thou thinks Friends believe they are the only ones that are pure and holy, for we do not think so. Everyone that walks in holiness before the Lord is accepted of Him. One thing though is certain, our profession is higher than that of any other, and those of us who live entirely up to it, are favored with the presence of the Lord dwelling and walking in them, as He has promised to all who have his commandments and keep them. Others have attained and can attain the same by minding his blessed in speaking voice.

"In that love which I pray may more and more fill our hearts and souls until we are like Him, all love and holiness, I remain thy endeared friend,

"D. B."

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Eighth Month 4th, 1862.

"How I have longed really and truly to know that I did give real worship in meetings, real, true, living worship and silent adoration of the Almighty and our Saviour. Dost thou not think this pure and heavenly stream can be felt? May our Heavenly Father introduce us both into all purity before Him.

"D. B."

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Ninth Month 30th, 1862.

"Lately I have been reading in Job Scott. Last week I commenced his treatise on baptism, and it seemed so clear no one could doubt in regard to these ordinances being fulfilled, after reading it. I so much wished thou could read it, not that I want to harass or perplex thee, but it is so clear and conclusive.

"D. B."

1862.—Twelfth Month 7th.—Job Scott says, "Oh! Lord enable me to walk circumspectly as an example of true sobriety, gravity and holiness among those whose hearts thou has touched."

14th.—How much of life, light, joy and peace I felt to-day in meeting. I have longed for it so long, and to-day I tasted it. I hope I was not deceived. Oh! that I may be helped to become more and more like a little child. Give me an entrance into thy Kingdom of life. Oh, my God and Saviour, I have stipped some this week. Thy mercy, oh, Lord, has held me up. Help me the coming week to live only to thee. Thou art everlastingly worthy of all glory and honor.

28th.—An ancient Friend said, "If only one in a meeting was gathered to the Lord, it went through the whole meeting."

1863.—First Mo. 4th.—I commenced the new year in watchfulness and prayer, and thought I should continue, but being invited into company twice I went, thinking to keep watchful and weighty, and succeeded in part, but my kind Heavenly Father knows what is best for me and has commanded silence, so I feel unhappy for having gone and indulged in conversation. I shunned the cross thinking to make my friends feel more comfortable. I feel pardoned this night after repentance and renewal of covenant.

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, First Month 18th, 1863.

"I wish thou couldst feel our Saviour as near, as He in his mercy has drawn to my soul this week. It seemed as if I could embrace Him in my arms and say with Thomas, 'My Lord and my God.' This is the experience I have so long craved, 'He that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also.'

"Dearest L. faint not! We shall reap in due time if we faint not. He will arise with healing in his wings, and 'the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come into thy temple.' The following text is so sweet: 'The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come unto Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.' Let us submit to every cross that will make us pure in his holy sight, that we may be of his ransomed and redeemed in the end.

"Thy deeply attached and loving friend,

"D. B."

TO L. H. B.

"Fifth Month 18th, 1863.

"I often sympathize with thee in thy wish to depart for that home and be forever at rest with Him whom thy soul loves. But the question always arises, have I sowed all the good seed I could? have I glorified Him as He would have me to do? and then comes the prayer to be more dedicated. Oh! for a heart as passive as clay, bowed to every intimation of his holy will, however greatly in the cross to mine! He is good, I know He is, and I know thou enjoys his good presence sometimes. Then let us be content with all He gives, saying, 'Thy will be done.'

"D. B."

TO L. H. B.

"Sixth Month 7th, 1863.

"To-day in morning meeting I was afraid of feeling dull and of passing the time unprofitably, but soon remembering our conversation, it came into my mind to examine and see if I am really in the exact faith I profess. The bare prospect of ever joining any other Society passed before me; could I enjoy other ministry? 'Freely ye have received freely give,' came for my answer. Could I be baptized? Our Saviour baptizes with the Holy Ghost. I want the answer of a clear conscience. And my communion I want it always with my Saviour, in the kingdom of heaven in my heart.

... Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you.' It is the Spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing. Soon John Stokes arose with the words, 'O Lord, one faith, one baptism,' then the thoughts came not two baptisms. The apostle declared that John said, 'He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire.'

'Oh! Laura, I kept thinking of thee all the time, or so frequently. Friends never sing aloud, probably when the heart is full they make melody in spirit. I often feel as if I could sing aloud of his love, his praise, his goodness, and of his mercy, but I would not like to have to sing always when others did, I might be sad. These were my reflections, and so I came to the conclusion that I was a Friend in principle; but oh! to be a true living Quaker, to walk daily and hourly in the light of the Lord, to have fellowship with and love for others, and to know his precious blood to cleanse from all sin, and to be fitted to join the song of the redeemed in heaven; this is what I long for. And what a sweet thought it is to realize that our Saviour can do it all for us. In Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily.

Returning to the diary, she says:

Second Mo. 15th.—Oh! my God, thou only knowest the longings of my soul after purity. It seems to me this day thou has helped me to walk by a straight line, not turning to the right hand or to the left. How I desire it for the week. Help, oh Lord, for vain is the help of man, my own resolutions are nothing unless thou condescendest to keep me to them.

Third Month 1st.—Be willing, oh, my soul, to be anything or nothing, to put my mouth in the dust, if so be, there may be a resurrection with Christ, an entrance into the glorious liberty of the children of God, and into that good land flowing with milk and honey. How my soul longs to taste of the joys of thy salvation, and yet turns aside continually from the bitterness of the cross. I have said this day, if the cup pass not from me, except I drink it, "Thy will be done."

22nd.—Week after week the desire for entire holiness and dedication seems to grow brighter and deeper, but do I really submit? I have done so a good deal this week, but not all the time. Oh! to live soberly, godly and righteously.

Fourth-day.—This evening I read that Moses was to take the oil and spices, a sweet incense. How much I need to seek the holy oil, the Holy Spirit, for with the help of that only, can I offer sweet incense unto thee, oh! my God. How I long to bless and praise thee, and glorify thee this night, but I feel so unworthy.

In the memoranda preserved by Martha Routh of her religious visit to America, she mentions that when in New England she went to see a young woman who was near the end of life, and in great distress of mind from the fear that the work of preparation for eternity was not fully perfected. M. R. remarks, "I could say very little, but recommended to her and those about her as much stillness and inward retirement as they could attain, and to seek the Father and Fountain of all sure mercies; feeling little or no evidence respecting her life or death, acceptance or rejection by the Lord; yet I expressed a hope that a little longer time would be given, remembering the compassion of Christ to the thief on the cross. This proved to be the case; during which time my mind was brought under an unusual travail, both by day and night, on her account."

Before the removal of this young woman an evidence was granted that there was mercy for her with the Lord, and that her warfare was accomplished.

The travail of spirit which M. Routh passed through is an experience of which Christians often partake, either on their own account, or for the sake of others towards whom their minds are turned. We believe such often feel that they must abide under this exercise, and not lightly cast it off, but let it have its perfect work upon them.

The Sassa-wood Ordeal.

When the Cape Palmas and Rock Town people were at war, a young man from Garraway went to look on, and, standing too near, was shot in the leg. After a few weeks he died. His brother who came home to see him, got there just a few hours after he was buried. He, in turn, had not been home more than ten days when he was taken sick and soon died. For two brothers, strong young men, to be taken within a few weeks in this way was an occasion of superstition among the people. They all believed that some witch had been the cause of their death, although they say when a person dies that "God took him."

The morning after the last young man died we went to town. They had made up a bed with boxes, spread his mat upon them, and laid him out there. The body was washed and the face streaked with paint. A large new cloth had been put over him; beads were strung about his neck; a pipe lay on his chest, with the stem toward his mouth, and a comb by his head. They had built a canopy over him for a shade, and for decorating used cloth of all kinds and colors, hats, caps, coats, and umbrellas. Tables and stands were set around the house, with looking-glasses, pictures, and all kinds of fancy and common dishes on them—a regular variety store, as it looked.

As we approached the town we heard the call of the "Queen"—a secret society of men, called by some "the Devil Society," though the native name is "Queen." We knew when we heard them that they would not bury the man without palaver, and most likely would accuse some one and would compel him or her to drink the sassa-wood. We went at once to the head man of the Queen, and I begged him not to give sassa-wood. He was in a great hurry, and did not want to be talked to; but I caught his arm and held him with both my hands. I knew him well. At last he said he would not allow sassa-wood to be given. I asked him if he meant it and he said he did.

Several men came to persuade me not to have anything to do with the case, and wished to shut me up in a house. But I said, "Don't anybody dare put hands on me." I knew that if they once took hold of me they would soon put me into a house; for it was against their custom for a woman to see or be seen while the Queen was out, and I was the only woman now outdoors, all the native women being shut up in their houses and not daring to open the door till they received permission from the society. If a woman sees the Queen she has to pay a heavy fine, and all the women and girls are afraid to go out while the Queen is at work, for they are taught, and believe, that it is really the devil that has come to town. It is only the warriors, of course, dancing, singing, and beating drums and cybals; and the devil is a man blowing a whistle with a peculiar note.

I started back to where the corpse was. On my way I came to where the chiefs were talking, and I sat down with them and listened. They spoke very encouragingly for a few minutes, as if they had determined not to resort to the sassa-wood, then turned to me and said: "Teacher, do you hear what we say?"

"Yes," I answered, "and if you do as you say here and not give any sassa-wood I shall be very glad."

They all rose up to go where the corpse was but did not know what to do with me, for the Queen had now passed through the town and gone to ask the dead body who had killed him. I saw they were confused and said:

"Come on, I am going too."

"O no," they replied, "Woman no fit to go there to-day. Don't you see all women go in side? You must go inside."

"No," I said, "I can't go in any house to-day. I am going to see what you men are doing."

I then led the way. Some said to me, "No don't go there. But I laughed, and then they laughed. We walked along, I about two steps ahead of them, till we came close to the place. They had run their rope and hung cloth over it thus inclosing a small yard, and inside this the Queen was at work. As soon as they saw me some one called out, "O, there is teacher!" I said, "Yes, and who is there?"

With that I drew the curtain aside and shoved my way through the warriors, who were seated in a circle inside the curtain. They hustled the devil and got him out of the ring. Some scolded, some proposed to carry me into the house, and some laughed. I marched round the circle and said that I had come to bury the man, and that it was time now to carry him to the grave. Some of the men took hold of my arm and said, "Come and sit down, teacher; come inside, the sun is too hot. But I told them that I had not come to sit down, and that I had an umbrella. I told them how foolish it was to have such a performance over a dead man, and that we all must die, and then preached Jesus to them. Meantime, the Queen had removed into a house and were going through their performances there. After giving them enough for a funeral sermon I went into a house for a few minutes for a drink of water, and then came back and sat down with the kings and chiefs.

They told me that it was the devil that was causing the wonderful excitement and making the queer noise.

"No," answered I, "I can tell you who it is."

"Who is it?" they asked, supposing I did not know, because the identity of the man who impersonates the devil is a great secret among them.

"It is Zanier" (Butterfly), I replied; "that is his house," pointing to it.

The kings were much surprised and said: "Just look, teacher, knows everything. Who has been to tell you?"

"It is not hard to tell who that is," said I.

It is not a secret. It is not only you who do his kind of fashion. The time I went up Callala River I saw the people do this, and the man we took as a guide to the Falls was the man who played 'devil.' We sat in town and saw it all. When we would not go into the house they covered him with a blanket, and when they were through they carried him into the bushes and he soon came round the other side ready to go with us, and we all started up the river."

The kings and chiefs all laughed and thought it a fine joke, but said that I must not tell the women. I did not make any promises.

Soon a young man came to tell me that they had taken a woman to give her sassa-wood. I went out in the bush where they were. Some of the younger men were there, but none of the headmen who had authority to stop the proceedings. As the younger men would not be persuaded, but said that unless the "big" man sent them word they could not let the woman go, I left them and went into the town to find the headmen. I had been in town only a few minutes when they brought in the woman. She had drunk the sassa-wood—three basinsful—and carried the wooden basin in her hand. The driver behind her had the pot in which the liquid had been mixed, and he cried out, "A witch! a witch! a witch!"

About three o'clock in the afternoon they buried the man; and the accused woman vomited the sassa-wood before night. But they would not admit that she was innocent, and took her back to drink more next morning. I did not go. But the Christian men from our "Zion" village and some of the kings went to beg for the woman; and they let her go and did not give her any more sassa-wood. The Quee concluded to let the matter drop.

After several days had passed the women themselves took up the case. They said that the men did not have "a strong heart" to do anything, so they were going to find the witch. There is no regular society among the women, like the Quee; but they all join together when they wish to accomplish anything, and the men are afraid of them, for they say that the women are stronger witches than the men.

One evening while still in this town we were disturbed after retiring by some person at the door calling the woman of the house. She lay asleep on her mat, with her infant by her. Being awakened, she answered the call and opened the door to see who it was. As she did so I saw several persons there, and heard them call out, "Whee! whee!" She went out, shutting the door after her, and they all went off. This was new to me. I called one of the girls and asked what it meant. At first she did not know; but after listening to the conversation of the people outside she said they were catching people to give them sassa-wood.

At that moment the family with whom we were staying rushed into the house, threw themselves on the floor, and began to cry. We got up and dressed. I went out to find Sere, whose house we were in and whose wife they had taken. He told me they had caught five persons. Everybody was quiet, fearing what would come next, and daring to tell me hardly anything.

PICTURES, OR BANK NOTES.—An old woman in Scotland was living in the most abject poverty. Her neighbors thought it strange, knowing that she had a son in America reputed to be in comfortable circumstances. One day one of them ventured to ask her about the matter.

"Does your son never send you money?"

"No," reluctantly answered the mother; but, eager to defend him against the implied charge of forgetfulness and ingratitude, she quickly added, "But he writes me nice long letters, and sends me a pretty picture in almost every one of them."

"Where are these pictures?" queried the visitor; "may I see them?"

"Why, certainly," was the answer. And the old woman went to a shelf and took down the old Bible, and there between the leaves lay the "pictures" that her son had been sending her from America through all the years.

What were they? Nothing more or less than bank notes, each for a considerable amount. During all this time of need the woman had had under her hand a sum of money sufficient to satisfy her every want, and she did not know it. She had looked at the pictures; she had thought them pretty pictures; they had been to her reminders of her far-off son, and evidence that he had not forgotten her, and that was all.—The Golden Rule.

The Schwenkfelders.

The one hundred and sixty-second anniversary of the coming of the Schwenkfelders to this county was celebrated at the Schwenkfelder meeting-house, Worcester.

Most of the members of the denomination were present, for it is at once a reunion and religious event of interest. The morning session was opened with a historical sketch of the cause which led to the migration.

At noon a simple repast was served in the meeting-house. Tables were spread with a plentiful supply of bread, butter and apple butter, after which the people were invited to partake of the frugal meal. This simple and unpretentious fare has been served on all these annual occasions ever since the observance of this day of thanksgiving.

Caspar Schwenkfeld was a Silesian nobleman and reformer (1490-1562), who could not see his way clear conscientiously to pledge allegiance to any one of the great religious sects, and thus continued to work for the advancement of Christ's kingdom independently of these bodies, and yet as far as possible, in harmony with them.

Believing it inconsistent with the professions of a Christian to take up arms against fellow-believers, he constantly abstained from defending or upbuilding his views by use of worldly power or force. Up to the time of the flight from Silesia to Saxony, in 1520, the faithful followers of Schwenkfeld suffered many miseries and afflictions. Here, under the protection of Count Zuzendorf, who afterwards paid a visit to Eastern Pennsylvania, they found refuge and rest for a time, but at last notice came that even he could protect them no longer.

They consequently started from Saxony in April, 1734, for Pennsylvania, and finally, after great hardship, landed September 22nd, of that year in Philadelphia. The next day they appeared before the proper authorities and pledged their allegiance and fidelity to the King of England and the proprietor of the Province of Pennsylvania. The day following, September 24th, was observed as a day for thanksgiving to God for his fatherly care over them, for delivering them from the hands of their enemies, in giving them friends in their day of dire distress, for the land of the free and the home of the oppressed, founded by William Penn, where they had at last found a place of refuge. This day has been solemnly observed ever since by these people.

Among those who spoke in the afternoon was Professor Oscar S. Kriebel and Rev. Wm. Anders. It is learned that Professor Chester Hartman, of Hartford, Conn., a descendant of the Schwenkfelders, has for a number of years had representatives at work in Europe tracing out and arranging the numerous old records relating to the denomination. These are to be published in book form. To-day's attendance was the largest for years, nearly every member being present.

To-day the denomination in America numbers between six hundred and eight hundred members, all of whom live in the territory embraced within the three counties already mentioned. They have a number of meeting-houses.

Up to a few years ago the Schwenkfelders always selected their ministers from among the members, without paying attention to special ministerial training. In the lower section this method is still in vogue, but the upper portion of the church, which includes those of B-rks, has a paid minister, educated both in an American university and abroad. He is Prof. O. S. Kriebel, Principal of Perkiomen Seminary, who belongs to one of the old Schwenkfelder families.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

How the Women Vote in Colorado.

The writer has frequently been asked regarding the practical workings of women's suffrage in the West. The following remarks may prove interesting to some. Colorado and Wyoming are the two States where women vote, but there is evidence that in this as in other matters, some of the older and more conservative States will soon follow.

I recall a beautiful autumn morning two years ago, when from our front porch in Denver, was observed what would in the East be a very novel sight. The time was almost seven o'clock. About one block away were the polls. Near by were the pretty stone and pressed brick houses. The city stretched away towards the West. Beyond arose the purple hills, whilst over all towered the mountains of glistening white against a sky of richest blue. In the foreground nearly one hundred people were in line waiting for the polls to open.

Soon my wife and myself joined the procession. The sexes were about equally divided. In the row were young and old, young married people, a few children in arms, and a baby-coach or so, were close to hand. Everybody was well dressed, all were chatting, and all were just as polite to one another as if at a party. The women especially seemed to enjoy to the full the privilege granted them of exercising the universal franchise given to the adult citizens of Colorado. They all understood how to vote, and could operate under the Australian system as deftly as any men.

Politics for a few weeks previous had been very, very warm throughout the State, and the women had taken an active part therein. The Populist ticket had been exceedingly distasteful to most of the women, largely for personal reasons. They did not like the candidate for Governor on that ticket. He was a profane old man, and that fact settled him as far as they were concerned. Men may not bother much about such matters, but women will, and in this case they worked hard to secure his downfall. Women speakers had addressed large afternoon mass meetings, where the moral and family side of political questions had been ably presented. Clubs had been organized, composed exclusively of women. These clubs had at least twice made up into evening trullies-parties, and had paraded over the city. All was orderly, and the women properly escorted.

This brief description may outline a typical campaign in Colorado. The feminine voters won a splendid victory; and the vanquished candidate admitted that they had been the cause of his defeat.

Some of us, who were originally educated to the belief that enthusiasts were the only advocates of women's suffrage, have discovered our error. In Colorado almost everybody believes in it; and it seems satisfactory to everyone except to professional politicians, keepers of beer-shops, and the less desirable strata of society.

Some people express a fear that voting tends to injure women, and place them in situations calculated to shock their finer sensibilities. This in actual practice is not the case; in fact when men raise women to an equality with themselves at the polls, their own behavior is greatly improved. Rowdism and bad language ceases, and indeed are as quickly repressed as anywhere else where women are present. In 1894 the warmest political battle ever contested in Colorado was positively dreaded by many who anticipated serious trouble. Yet not a man was killed on that day, although murder had often before been committed at times of less excitement. Nor have I ever heard of domestic irritation resulting from different members of a family voting different tickets. The woman who votes is not one whit changed. She is not thereby made either "strong-minded," assertive, or foolish. A Western man thinks none the less of his wife, sister, or loved one, because she is on the same level of citizenship as himself, but rather thinks all the better of her and her capabilities. It would be a poor estimate of her that would fancy the reverse.

It is noticeable that women generally enjoy voting. It gives them something to talk about outside of their domestic duties, or shopping, or small talk. Sometimes they hesitate to go the first time to the polls. But when once the ice is broken they are eager to again mark the magic slip of paper which so surely expresses their judgment and views. There seems quite a fascination in helping to make aldermen, mayors, governors and presidents.

The average woman, I believe, more appreciates her political responsibility than does the average man. There is reason for this. She of all others demands desirable school directors, and good school houses for her children. She enjoys good streets. She, even more than does a man, appreciates the need of efficient police and fire departments. She practically thinks of sewerage or of other matters bearing on the health of her family, and she also considers them in connection with the taxes which she or her husband contribute towards the public welfare. She has forced upon her consideration the laws governing the liquor traffic, and other social questions. A man thinks about his party, but a woman does not seem to do so to the same extent. She also more closely scans the moral character of candidates than does a man.

I have observed that women take time to investigate political subjects. They really seem to get a great deal of enjoyment, as well as information, out of such matters. This especially applies to those who have some leisure. But what if they do take the time for such work?

The result is beneficial to them and to the community. Is it not better for them to occasionally go to a lecture, and to exercise some downright persuading with others to vote on the best side, rather than to pass the same hours in the useless formalities of afternoon teas or superficial society calls?

But some objector will say that all those women who work for the "best side," are offset by careless voters on the other side. Experience shows that this argument is largely without foundation. As a matter of fact Christian women take hold, and zealously work for what they apprehend is best for the community, whilst those who have little principle will often even let their rights to the franchise go by default. The ignorant, the vicious and the poor, do not take the same interest in politics as do the educated, the moral and the well-to-do. The latter kind of women will organize, and make their organizations tell, when the former will not have either the time or ability to do so. All these conditions are the reverse of what we often see amongst men in politics.

To illustrate, I have seen about one hundred men and women meet in a parlor on an evening, hold a caucus, elect delegates, go to the primaries the next day, and "break the slate" made by unconscionable politicians, who would be suddenly appalled at the frustration of all their wire-pulling and hopes. Such efforts largely carried on by women are valuable to a community, and can only be the outgrowth of a healthy Christian citizenship.

Western people do not blindly follow the lines of thought laid down for them either by tradition, or newspapers. They look at all sides of a question, and then pursue what they consider is proper. So the men of Colorado think that intelligent and honored womanhood should not be deprived of rights which are so freely accorded to the uneducated and to foreigners. They believe that to tax women and then refuse them a voice at the polls, is "taxation without representation." This in itself is unfair, and contrary to the genius of our institutions.

FOR "THE FRIEND." The Great Rift Valley.

Among the numerous works describing the exploration of Eastern Africa, is the one recently issued by J. W. Gregory, of the British Museum, narrating his experience during a journey in 1892-3. The caravan started from Mombasa, on the shores of the Indian Ocean, about four degrees south of the Equator. Its general route was northwest. It reached Lake Baringo. The principal objects of the expedition were geological and geographical. They met with the usual difficulties of African explorers—want of food and water, trouble from hostile or suspicious native tribes, sickness and obstructions from swamps and bushes. On their return journey, a visit was paid to Mount Kenya, a lava peak of 17,500 feet elevation.

While encamped on its slope, Gregory says, "In the morning the men came to tell me that the water they had left in their cooking-pots was all bewitched. They said it was white and would not shake. They begged me to look at it, and I told them to bring it to me. They declined, however, to touch it, and implored me to go to it. The water of course had been frozen solid. I handled the ice and told the men they were silly to be afraid of it, for this change always came over water on the tops of high mountains. I put one of the pots on the fire, and predicted it would soon turn into water again. They then sat round and anxiously watched it; when it had melted, they joyfully told me that the demon was expelled, and I told them they could now use the water; but as soon as my back was turned, they poured it away, and refilled their pots from an adjoining brook.

Lake Baringo lies in a great depression or trough, which begins with the Dead Sea, extends down the Red Sea, and ends at Tanganyika. This depression is called by modern geographers the Great Rift Valley, and extends about four thousand miles from the Lebanon Mountains in Syria almost to the Cape of Good Hope. Scattered along its floor is a series of over thirty lakes, of which only one has an outlet to the sea.

The part of the Rift Valley visited by Gregory is bordered by an immense plain of lava which does not appear to have been poured forth from volcanoes, but to have come through numerous openings scattered over the area, and to have had its origin in great subterranean lakes or pools of melted rock. The removal of the contents of these lakes and the spreading of them over the surface has destroyed the equilibrium that before existed and led to great earth movements, and by the sinking of the surface rocks these rift valleys have been formed. This has probably taken place at intervals, and not by one simultaneous action. Our author states that the region was the scene of one of the two greatest series of volcanic outbursts known in the world's history. "One region has been raised and another depressed; in one place a fiord has been opened from the sea, and then separated from it; elsewhere a line of movement has reversed the direction of rivers, and transferred lakes from one river system to another. The evidence of these changes is apparent on every hand. Scars of great earth movements, extinct volcanic craters, dried lake basins, and old river beds, show the structural instability of the region of the great Rift Valley.

The Debt of Christendom to Africa.

Among the great divisions of the world, it has fallen to the lot of Africa to suffer a long series of injuries from the other Continents—from Europe, Asia, and even from distant America. For centuries, the infamous slave trade spread massacre and misery along her coasts and far into the interior. And even to this day, the most shocking cruelties are still perpetrated by Mahomedan slave-hunters amongst myriads of the wretched inhabitants of East Africa. In former years, Briton, Yankee, and Portuguese were scarcely less brutal in other portions of the Continent. And, notwithstanding the formal abolition of the slave traffic by Europe and America, there is little doubt but that, in various forms, many a dark deed of oppression and fraud is still caused by whites along the African coasts, although such occurrences may seldom obtain publicity in the newspapers at home.

In the present century, the Dutch inflicted a long course of barbarities upon the Hottentots and Kaffirs in the South. Nor are the native blacks, to this day, treated by the Dutch Boers in a manner at all consistent with the highly Scriptural professions of these white immigrants. The British also have waged war after war with Kaffirs, Matabeles, and other tribes, and have done much to make both the name of England and of Christ hateful to the aboriginal inhabitnts. The Portuguese settlements have, in many ways, been a curse to the Africans. The French treatment of the Arabs in Algeria is of historic notoriety for inhumanity; whilst their arrival in Madagascar has plunged that unhappy island into a sea of trouble and misery, which has involved also, even in the present year, the destruction of hundreds of Christian churches and chapels. The Belgians in the Congo Free State, and the Germans in the East, have only of recent times invaded the soil of Africa, but hey, too, have already some very dark spots upon the record of their procedure there. Even in Morocco, which geographically occupies a position close to Western civilization, the official representatives of Christian nations have too often allowed greed and injustice on their part to introduce gross evils, especially in connection with the protection of fraudulent agents, whose actions are a source of much suffering to the native population.

Altogether, to the poor African, from Cape Bon to the Cape of Good Hope, and from Cape Verde to Cape Guardafui, the advent of progressing Christians, throughout the ages, has been associated with rapine and slavery, with massacre and lust, with poisonous alcohol, and with constant spoliation of goods and estate. Even within the last decade, the European nations of "light and leading" have stolen by wholesale from the natives myriads of square miles of territory, without right and without compensation—and solely by the power of sheer violence—the justification of the highway-man and the pirate. Germany, France, England and Italy—can plead, for their recent appropriations of African territory, only the old warrant of feudal rigour and a Viking terrorism. Thus Africa has been the bleeding victim of three Continents, and to counterbalance all this wickedness and violence, what has Christianity done for her? The Christian Governments, as such, have done almost nothing, except evil. It is true that in Egypt the British Government has secured certain advantages and improved administration for the poor peasantry of that down-trodden land. But when the motives and causes of this interposition are looked into, all the merit disappears. For it had its origin in the outcry of selfish bondholders and usurers, and was preceded by the utterly unjustifiable and wicked bombardment of Alexandria. Then, too, Belgium may have done a little good for the Congo region; but here, again, the motives must not be too closely analyzed. Germany has tried to push a trade in Africa—but, of course, for her own interests. As to France, Portugal and Italy, their African record is so black as to be scarcely relieved by one white spot.

The best that can be said for really Christian influence in Africa is that it has been exerted through a comparatively small number of private individuals—chiefly missionaries of the Cross—by such true heroes as M'fadd and Livingston, and by Bishops Colenso, Callaway, Mackenzie, and Hannington. But what were they amongst the overwhelming legions of slave-stealers and man-slayers?

The voice of Africa has, doubtless, ascended before the supreme and final Judge of all; and solemn retribution will one day be exacted. But meanwhile, in the interests of peace and righteousness, it is incumbent upon every Christian nation and community deeply to consider its own responsibility and debt to Africa. And, in particular at the present time, looking at what has taken place in Rhodesia and the Sudan, both the British Government and the British people have need to take this responsibility very seriously to heart. For it must indeed be a serious matter, in the regard of the Highest.—Herald of Peace.

MY FRIENDS.

ROBERT BEVERLY HALE.

Slow as I journey on from day to day,
I come on other wanderers in my path,
Some sad, some smiling, some in latter wrath,
And some who join me for a little way—
Not always very far. Perhaps we see
That one step moves too slow and one too fast;
Some I have overtaken, loved, and passed,
And some there are who would not wait for me.

Some cross my march just once—across the lawn
I hear a footstep; we shall almost meet!
Alas! we may not stay too long to greet,
A nod, a pleasant word—and he is gone!

How many million friends there are whose lot
Keeps them outside my path for life's short while!
But through the distance and the dark I smile,
For I can love them though I see them not.

FORBEAR.

Forbear, when'er an unjust taunt
Shall quickly flash thine eye,
And flush thy cheek with swift desire
To give some sharp reply,
Forbear; wrath only kindles wrath,
And stirs up passion's fire:
While answering softly, mildly, tends
To check the bitterest ire.

Forbear, though some well-meaning friend,
Perchance with good intent,
Should roughly crush some sanguine hope,
Or brilliant plan prevent.

Forbear, their wisdom may be far Superior to thine own;
They may have built such castles, too,
And seen them overthrown.

Forbear, when sickness clings thy care,
And murmuring accents prove,
Breathing complaining fretful tones,
Sad trials to thy love.

Forbear; thou mayest not know how keen
The pain which seeks to find Relief in feverish words, and yet
Means not to be unkind.

Forbear, when children's noisy mirth
Distracts thy thrumming brain,
Which, pressed with many anxious cares,
Seems bursting with its pain.

Forbear—oh, do not wound their hearts,
Because thine is oppressed,
By careless or impatient tunes,
When they would be caressed.

Forbear; I know 'twill cause a pang,
And many a fervent prayer,
And mighty efforts, ere thou learn
In all things to forbear.

I HAVE just been looking over a newspaper, one of the most painful and solemn studies in the world, if it be read thoughtfully. So much of sin and so much of suffering in the world, as are there displayed, and no one seems able to remedy either. And then the thought of my own private life, so full of comforts, is very startling when I contrast it with the lot of millions, whose portion is so full of distress or of trouble. May I be kept humble and zealous, and may God give me grace to labor in my generation for the good of my brethren, and for his glory! May He keep me his by night and by day, and strengthen me to hear and to do his will, through Jesus Christ!—Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, within a week of his sudden death.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

AN EPI-TILE OF CAUTION AND ADVICE TO PARENTS, RECOMMENDING A GODLY CARE FOR THE EDUCATING THEIR CHILDREN IN A CHRISTIAN CONVERSATION.

Dear Friends:—It having pleased the Lord in his great mercy, to visit a people in this latter age with the knowledge of the Truth; and having brought us to a certain understanding that the blessings thereof are only enjoyed in following the Lord in the strait and narrow way that leads to life; wherein, by the daily bearing the holy cross, it hath, in a good degree, crucified us to the world, and the world unto us; whereby the temptations of it become daily more and more weakened, and our souls set free to serve the Lord in righteousness and holiness. And for as much, as next to our own souls, our offspring are, or ought to be, the most immediate objects of our care and concern, being a peculiar blessing from God; for we ought to be thankful to Him for them, and wait upon Him for wisdom from above, thereby to be enabled rightly to discharge our duties towards them, and then we shall be eminently careful to be good examples to our children, as well as diligently exercised in a conscientious care and concern for them.

And in order to make this the more easy to us, and effectual to them, parents should begin with their children betimes, and endeavor to teach them, as soon as they are capable of instruction, that their wills ought to be entirely subject to the will of God, and to the good advice of their parents. And we desire particular care may be taken, to require nothing of them that is unreasonable or unbecoming religious and tender parent; for where a due care hath been neglected and put off, until they are grown up pretty far in years, it hath been often seen by woeful experience that it is then too late to bring them into that subjection which is their incumbent duty.

Dear Friends, Be early careful to keep them out of the vain fashions and evil ways of the world, and bring them up from the first, in plainness of language, apparel and behavior, which may be a means to prevent their being drawn therefrom, by the practice of others, when they are grown up.

Be careful to bring your children, in their young years, to meetings, not only on the First-day of the week, but on other days also; which has been of great advantage to many; and instruct them to sit sober when there, and to have an awful sense of God upon their minds, and to be diligent in attending the testimonies of Truth, when testimonies are born, that they may feel the love of God to sea-on their spirits.

And we entreat and exhort Friends to labor with their minds, stayed in the gift of God, to bring their children to a sense of the same gift in themselves, impressing on their minds an awe and fear towards Him, which is the beginning of wisdom, and as they advance in years cause them frequently and reverently to read the Holy Scriptures, and endeavor to make them sensible of the great love of God in sending his Son Christ Jesus into the world; as also, of the great benefit of his sufferings, death, resurrection, ascension and mediation, in order to the great work of salvation; instructing them in the work of sanctification, through his blessed Spirit, that they may know the operation thereof, against everything that is wrong, and thereby may come to distinguish between good and evil in themselves, and see the great benefit there is in a sober, virtuous and religious life, and the many mischief and ill consequences that attend the contrary, that so they may embrace the one and avoid the other; for as they learn to make a godly conversation their choice in their young and tender years, the cross of Christ will become easy unto them.

And as the minds of children are early busied about something or other, and apt to receive any impressions, we advise that beside the reading the Holy Scriptures, they may have the advantage of reading other good books, tending to promote the true principles of the Christian religion.

And we earnestly exhort and entreat all Friends, as much as in them lies, to keep their children from reading profane books, romances and pamphlets, which tend to infect the minds of youth, and which children are too apt to please themselves with.

And Friends are desired to remember, that indulging them in pride, idleness and luxury, is a great fault in parents, as well as of dangerous consequence to children, according to the testimony of Ezekiel (xvii: 49, 50): "Behold this was the iniquity of Sodom, pride, fulness of bread and abundance of idleness was in her, and in her daughters, neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy; and they were haughty and committed abomination before me, therefore I took them away as I saw good." Wherefore parents ought to be very careful to restrain their children from those things which lay a foundation for very great evils. And when they perceive an inclination in them to pride, to take care no ways to promote or encourage it, but on the contrary, as much as may be, restrain it. And an especial concern should be early taken to prevent a habit of idleness, and therefore some employment, suitable to their circumstances, ought to be provided for them.

For those who are bred up in pride and idleness, do often, if their circumstances permit it, live in luxury and spend their thoughts (that might be better employed), in contriving what they shall eat and drink, and clothe themselves withal; and sometimes can hardly invent anything delicate enough for them; so that it is no wonder that many, whose education has been after this manner, spend their precious time and substance about things which are prejudicial to the health and welfare both of body and soul, and reproachful to our holy profession. And to the end that the labors and good advice of parents may take the better effect, great care should be taken to keep children out of bad company, and to have such servants as are religiously inclined, sober, discreet and orderly; for it hath been found by experience, that such servants who are strangers to the cross of Christ, have been a means to turn many of our Friends' children from the plainness and simplicity of the Truth, and lead them into vain and vicious company, whereby they have been greatly corrupted in their minds, and a spirit of undue liberty hath prevailed to their great hurt.

And we believe Friends might find it profitable, as they feel the Lord seasoning their spirits thereto, to wait upon Him with their children in their families for the manifestation of his blessed power, that they may witness his seed of life and grace in their hearts, to beget in them a living knowledge and love of truth in themselves, that they may come to know the work of sanctification and regeneration; the consequence of which will be, that virtuous, holy and religious conversation, which we desire they may grow up in, and then they will be an ornament to our holy profession, and be preserved from the sorrowful effect of a loose and vicious conduct; and we question not, but as Friends are duly exercised herein, the Lord will of his mercy open in them suitable counsel and advice to their children and families and will give a blessing to their sincere endeavors.

And let it be also the care of Friends, at proper seasons, to tell their children their own experience, and what God hath done for their souls; for it is very often seen that the good impressions that children receive in their tender years from their parents are not easily worn out. As the Psalmist says, "We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what works thou didst in their days, in the times of old" (Psal. 44).

And as there is an incumbent duty on parents in the education of their children; so the same lies on school-masters, and therefore what is herein recommended to parents, ought to be put in practice (as much as may be), by masters, mistresses and tutors of children, and those school-masters that teach the Latin and Greek tongues should be careful not to make use (in their several schools), of any heathen authors, that tend to profaneness, lasciviousness, or immorality.

So, dear Friends, we having an earnest desire that Truth may prosper, and that Zion may become an eternal excellency, and Jerusalem the praise of the whole earth, and your children may follow the steps of our worthy ancestors; and, that the name of the Lord may be magnified from generation to generation, do in a Christian concern of mind recommend these things to you, heartily desiring, that you may find the same concern to put them in practice, as has been on Friends' minds in this meeting, to recommend them to you.

Archibald Crosbie and other Friends in Scotland.

The accompanying communication, giving details of religious service in Scotland, will be read with satisfaction by those who are interested in watching the growth of spiritual vitality in the northern half of the Kingdom.

It is dated from Elgin on the eighteenth of Eighth Month, and is extracted from a letter written to the editor, by Archibald Crosbie, just before his return to America. We sincerely reciprocate the feelings of the writer near the conclusion of his letter in the retrospect of his service on this side of the Atlantic, and assure him of a warm place in the esteem and love of many Friends who have had the privilege of his acquaintance, and who will be glad again to welcome him should he ever feel called to revisit his native land.

"I left Stavanger on the evening of the twenty-fifth of Seventh Month, and had a rough passage to Hull.

"Looking back on my sojourn in Norway, I believe that it was in right ordering, and, from the testimony of Friends and others there, it was evidently helpful and encouraging to them.

"Though much inclined to proceed from Hull to Lancashire, I deemed it best to go north to Edinburgh. On the thirtieth I attended the usual mid-week meeting there. Going to Ardrossan I attended the forenoon and evening meetings on First-day the 2nd inst. The company was larger than usual. Clear evidence was also given of increased appreciation of our profession by those recently received into membership, and by others looking in that direction.

"Returning to Edinburgh I was present at the two months' meeting, where the sense of the presence of the Master was very marked, and though the number in attendance was small, the blessing from on high was great. Several applications for membership from attenders in Argyshire were presented to the meeting. Richard B. Brockbank was present with a minute of Holm Monthly Meeting, liberating him for service in Scotland. The meeting uniting with his concern expression was made at this token of the Lord's continuous care of his vineyard. Feeling some liberty to accompany R. B. Brockbank during at least part of the work I was encouraged to do so.

"ABERDEEN GENERAL MEETING.

"As a first move therein we proceeded to Aberdeen to attend the General meeting for Scotland. The Meeting on Ministry and Oversight was held on Seventh-day the 8th; Walter Robson and Mary Anne Wallis, members of the visiting committee, appointed by the Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, were present. Also James and Sarah B. Clark, with minutes of Mid-Somerset Monthly Meeting.

"The meetings for worship on First-day were large especially that in the evening, when about two hundred persons assembled. Several Friends were engaged in ministry, giving clear testimony to the simplicity and power of the Gospel of Christ. As part of the concern of Richard B. Brockbank, a similar meeting was appointed for Second-day evening, which proved to be an occasion owned by the Great Head of the Church many being impressed by the spiritual nature of religion as perhaps they had never been before.

"The General Meeting itself was held on Second-day morning, and though considered to be the smallest gathering in its whole history, its proceedings were nevertheless more than usually interesting, affording unmistakable evidence of a spiritual life, and hopeful signs of increased vigor.

"Individual faithfulness in the line of the Lord's leading was felt and admitted to be the great remedy for decrease of numbers, and the basis of vitality in meetings large or small.

"After visiting some families in Aberdeen and neighborhood, R. B. B. and myself were present at an appointed meeting at Kimmuck, on Third-day evening. About fifty persons came to it from the adjoining farms, and the power of the Lord overshadowed the worshippers, with blessings to many. The meeting-house here is virtually closed, being only opened on special occasions. The two aged Friends, W. and R. Gray, who reside near it, being unable to go, regularly hold a meeting at home. The building is among the oldest in the country, having been purchased from the Roman Catholics in the year 1643 by R. bert Barclay, of Ury, Alexander Jaffrey, of Kingswells, and John Forbes, of Aquhorthies, near Old Meldrum, and was long a well attended place of worship by genuine Quaker 'Scots Worthies.'

"Concern was expressed that the mantle of such men might yet fall on the shoulders of baptized instruments in this day, that the proclamation of truths so long loved and maintained by consecrated sons of the morning of former times, might produce a real revival to the glory of Him whose name continues to be 'The Word of God.'

"Returning to Aberdeen we left the follow-ng morning for Strathpeffer in Invernesshire, and had a meeting with about eighty persons. The occasion was a favored one, many testifying to its value. Our Friends Drs. T. and F. Fox, who had made the arrangements were very eifful. On the thirteenth we were at Dingwall, and had a meeting there, and though the company was not large we felt in our place, elevating that good was done. At Cromarty, though being unable to secure a suitable hall to meet in but few came. We believe, however, had good seed was sown. At Inverness and Nairn there seemed but little opening. Meetings at both places were held, and though these were the smallest companies we had we trust that our labor was not in vain in the Lord.

"This evening my dear Friend R. B. Brockbank and I will have to part from each other; he is looking to continue his labors in Scotland, and I to recross the Atlantic, which I have thought right to do by securing passage on board the S. S. State of California, sailing from Glasgow for New York on the 21st inst. In view of that and in regard to my sojourn among Friends in the three kingdoms, and in Norway, I cannot express my sense of thankfulness for the manifest protection and support of my Heavenly Father and for the loving interest shown to me by those under our name wherever I have been. I did think that it might be required of me to revisit some of the meetings of Friends in Lancashire, but it now appears as if that must be left. Hoping to write again on reaching home, I am and hope to remain ever by Friend in the fullest sense."—British Friend.

FOR "THE FRIEND"

Iowa Yearly Meeting.

Iowa Yearly Meeting of Friends convened at Earlham, Madison County, Iowa, Tenth Mo. 4th, 1896, in a public meeting for Divine worship.

On sitting down in solemn silence, a feeling of liveness and dependence spread over the meeting, which solemnity was broken, by the appearance in prayer of one of the members of another branch claiming the name of Friend; which to those accustomed to the pouring forth of the soul to God, under the Divine union, and immediate qualification of the Holy Spirit, is practised by those who adhere to our ancient principles, seemed dry and formal; as did some other vocal exercises of the day, from those not of us; but by several living testimonies, our hearts were cheered to believe that his little company, known as Conservative Friends, have not lost their ancient banner, but are struggling on, amid trials of faith, peculiar to those who are "troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair." "Thou hast a few names, even in Sarulis, which have not defiled their garments: and they shall walk with me in white; for they are worthy." was the language felt on this occasion.

The meetings for business opened on Fifth-day morning, and were seasons of calm, deliberate consideration of the state of Society, and travail of soul for the upholding of our testimonies in accordance with the guidance of Truth.

The reading of epistles from the five Yearly Meetings of Conservative Friends was comforting and encouraging.

Reports from the Quarters composing the meeting were read, and the answers to the Queries brought the meeting under exercise for the right maintenance of the precious principles of our Society.

In a later sitting in joint session, for the purpose of hearing a report from Archibald Crosbie, of his late religious engagement in Europe, this concern was again revived, and brought the meeting into a very humble and contrited view of itself. The earnest desires for preservation, and for a deepening in the root and principles of life, met a response in many hearts, while tears of contrition fell from many eyes; and the way to a better state was pointed out as being only through individual faithfulness to the pointings of the Divine Finger in the secret of every soul.

A large company of different religious denominations gathered together on First-day, and with a little exception in the morning, the two meetings for worship were held in accordance with the views of Friends.

That the Bible is not the "Word of God," although a precious instrument given forth by Divine inspiration, was plainly and forcibly set forth in the morning meeting. It was further testified, that a measure of the same Light which gave them forth is given to every man, and that this spiritual Light, this quickening power of the Spirit of Truth, in the secret of every soul, only, can lead into a nearness, a union and communion of soul with God, which distinguishes his true followers from the people of the world.

In the afternoon the meeting was dipped into an exercise in regard to the true spiritual nature of Divine worship, and the audience listened with attention to the setting forth of the principles of our profession on this point. The conversation of our Saviour with the woman of Samaria in regard to worship being largely dwelt upon.

That music is no part of that worship set forth on that memorable occasion in these words of Christ Jesus: "God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth." Also that music is an art of man's invention, and therefore cannot tend to draw the mind away from the things of the world and center it upon the true object of dedicating the soul to God, and experiencing the Divine anointing, the washing of regeneration.

Meetings for Discipline continued on Second and Third-days, on which occasion replies to epistles from other Yearly Meetings were read and approved, and reports on education, recording and printing minutes, etc., were read, and committees appointed to have care of the same this year.

The meeting ended in joint session, at which time extracts of minutes from the Meeting for Sufferings and the Select Meeting were read.

Under a sense of the renewings of Heavenly love and desires for the preservation of Zion, the meeting closed, feeling that the Father of Mercies had condescended in love to tender the hearts of many together, in acknowledging his power to be over all the workmanship of his hands.

Woman in Medicine.

In 1848 Elizabeth Blackwell wrote to several medical colleges making inquiries as to a course of medical study. Only one college, at Geneva, N. Y., digned to answer the letter, and the story of that answer has recently been told by Dr. Stephen Smith of New York, as follows:

"The first course of medical lectures which I attended was in a medical college in the interior of the State. The class numbering about one hundred and fifty students, was composed largely of young men from neighboring towns. They were rude, boisterous, and riotous beyond comparison. On several occasions the residents of the neighborhood sent written protests to the faculty, threatening to have the college indicted as a nuisance if the disturbances did not cease. During lectures it was often impossible to hear the professors, owing to the confusion.

"Some weeks after the course began, the dean appeared before the class with a letter in his hand, which he craved the indulgence of the students to be allowed to read. Anticipation was extreme when he announced that it contained the most extraordinary request which had ever been made to the faculty. The letter was written by a physician of Philadelphia, who requested the faculty to admit as a student a lady who was studying medicine in his office. He stated that she had been refused admission by several medical colleges, but as this institution was in the country, he thought it more likely to be free from prejudice against a woman medical student. The dean stated that the faculty had taken action on the communication, and directed him to report their conclusion to the class. The faculty decided to leave the matter in the hands of the class, with this understanding, that if any single student objected to her admission, a negative reply would be returned. It subsequently appeared that the faculty did not intend to admit her, but wished to escape direct refusal by referring the question to the class, with a proviso which, it was believed, would necessarily exclude her.

"But the whole affair assumed a most ridiculous aspect to the class, and the announcement was received with the most uproarious demonstrations of favor. A meeting was called for the evening, which was attended by every member. The resolution approving the admission of the lady was sustained by a number of most extravagant speeches, which were enthusiastically cheered. The vote was finally taken with what seemed to be one unanimous 'Yes!' When the negative vote was called, a single voice was heard uttering a 'No!' The scene that followed passes description. A general rush was made for the corner of the room which emitted the voice, and the recalcitrant member was only too glad to acknowledge his error and record his vote in favor of the affirmative. The faculty received the decision of the class with evident disfavor, but returned an answer admitting the woman student.

"Two weeks or more elapsed, and, as she did not appear, the incident of her application was quite forgotten, and the class continued in its riotous career. One morning, all unexpectedly, she entered the lecture-room with the professor. She was quite small of stature, plainly dressed, appearing diffident and retiring, but had a firm and determined expression of face. Her entrance into that bedlam of confusion acted like magic upon every student. Each hurriedly sought his seat, and the most absolute silence prevailed. For the first time a lecture was given without the slightest interruption, and every word could be heard as distinctly as if there had been but a single person in the room. The sudden transformation of this class from a band of lawless desperadoes to gentlemen by the mere presence of a lady, proved to be permanent in its effects. A more orderly class of medical students was never seen than this, and it continued to be so to the close of the term."—The Christian.

THE FRIEND.

TENTH MONTH 31, 1896.

A letter recently received from a Friend in Queensland, Australia, says of the meeting to which the writer belongs: "I am sorry to say our little meeting does not progress in the Divine life as it ought to, nor in numbers. It seems hard to convince people of the true inward life in these colonies; they love the grand ceremonial part too much. Eloquent preachers, grand organs, and solo singing are gaining great power to attract people in this day; but true silent waiting in communion with the Spirit, that some real good may be obtained, is out of the heart of professors of ceremonial works; yet I believe the Society of Friends do often open the door to unbelievers, and even show the other churches some of the glorious truths revealed to them by the Spirit. They are getting to be felt as God's people. Many of the great professors have to acknowledge the power of Christ through the Quaker family. May the Lord stir us all up to a more earnest work in this day, that the kingdom of Christ may be seen to have come among men!"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Arkansas Supreme Court has decided that the Governor of the State has the right to appoint members of the Legislature where vacancies have been caused by death, resignations or other causes.

The East River tunnel scheme was before the railroad Committee of the Brooklyn Board of Aldermen on the 20th instant. New York city has already given its consent to the building of the tunnel, which is intended to connect the surface lines of the two cities. The tunnels will be 8,700 feet long and each contain two tracks. Passengers will be carried from City Hall, Brooklyn, to City Hall, New York, in two or three minutes. It is proposed to issue $6,000,000 stock and $6,000,000 bonds. Frederick B. Esler, counsel for the company which proposes to build the railroad tunnel under the East River, says that it can be built inside of a year. The cost of construction would be $2,500,000, but rights of way, terminals, etc., would increase the expense to $9,000,000. The passenger traffic between New York and Brooklyn is now about 95,000,000 a year, and the tunnel, he thinks, would provide the most convenient means of transit for three-quarters of these.

A Los Angeles despatch says that the first carload of this season's crop of oranges was shipped on the night of the 19th instant to Chicago, "four weeks earlier than ever before."

California's fruit crop is short and dried fruits promise to be high.

Pineapple culture thrives so at points where it has been tried in Florida that the acreage is being extended constantly, and importations may not much longer be necessary. A pinery started eleven months ago at Citra, by H. B. Sterns, has proved so successful that others are to be established there.

Charles E. Crisp, ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives, died in Atlanta, Georgia, on the 23rd instant.

Fishes in the Sabine River carried a floating island of fifty acres of water hyacinths up and down stream past Orange, Texas, for a week.

On the 20th instant the large grain elevators of the Chicago and Pacific elevator Company at Govac Island, Indiana, were destroyed by fire, together with over a million bushels of wheat and other grain. The loss is estimated at $1,200,000.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 374, which is 11 more than the previous week and 12 more than the corresponding week of 1895. Of the whole number 178 were males and 196 females; 39 died of pneumonia; 33 of consumption; 31 of heart disease; 18 of cholera; 17 of typhoid fever; 14 of cancer; 13 of Bright's disease; 13 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of uremia; 12 of bronchitis; 12 of convulsions; 10 of membranous croup, and 10 from casualties.

FOREIGN.—Queen Victoria is busily engaged in drawing up the programme for the fêtes attendant upon the celebration next Sixth Month of the sixtieth anniversary of her accession to the throne. The celebration will be conducted on a grander scale than was the Queen's Jubilee in 1887. Besides the presence of the Kaiser and his suite in any way related to the Queen, her Majesty desires that her representatives shall attend from all the various colonies of the British Empire. The state pageants will last a month.

The London correspondent of the New York Tribune says: "The best explanation of the advance in the bank rate to 4 per cent, which was expected last week, is that the money market this week, is that it is due to the large increase in the purchasing power of American wheat. While the gold exports to America have been large this week, it has not been thought likely that they would continue, since a large proportion of the wheat and cotton crops has already been moved and paid for. The great rise in wheat has increased the purchasing power of the United States in the English money market to such an extent that large exports of gold are now expected in settlement of remaining shipments. The 4 per cent. rate is now avowedly a precautionary measure to protect the Bank of England's gold reserve and prevent its further depletion. With the demand for American wheat so great as it is now, and with the price of bread-stuffs advancing by leaps and bounds, it is not probable that even the high bank rate will bring gold shipments to an end. Europe must pay for its imports either in gold or in American bonds; and the latter are already rising with the increasing prospect of McKinley's election, and are likely to go higher in November."

On the 24th inst., the civil and religious ceremonies uniting in marriage Prince Victor Emmanuel, Prince of Naples and Crown Prince of Italy, to Princess Helene, third daughter of Prince Nicholas I, ruler of Montenegro, were performed.

Another despatch says: "Hayashi Tsolson, the Japanese minister here, has been notified by his Government to St. Petersburg. Ratifications of the Sino-Japanese commercial treaty were exchanged here yesterday, October 20th."

An American syndicate will advance 200,000,000 tons for the construction of the Hankow-Pekin Railroad. The route is about twenty-seven rivers, including the Whang-Ho, all of which are to be bridged. The entire works will be transferred to the syndicate, but the shares of the company will ostensibly be held by China.

Baron de Bay, a French archaeologist, has been digging up the Kurgans, or old turtleback burials of the nomads near Tomsk in Siberia. Some of these dating before the Russian conquest of Siberia, contain beads, earrings, knives with artistically carved bone handles, copper kettles, rings, bracelets and ornaments of silver. The oldest mound was five or six centuries old. The mounds that were built only 300 years ago showed a much poorer state of civilization, very few metal objects being found. The arrow heads and the knife blades being made of bone.

A letter has been received from William Niven who went to Mexico last Seventh Month, that he has discovered the ruins of a great Aztec city. Professors Putnam and Seville, of the American Museum of Natural History, placed the most reliance in his statement of what he has found. He writes that he has been four weeks riding among the ruins of the prehistoric city of Quezomictlepan, and finds that it covers a much wider area than what he had first supposed, something like 100 square miles. He has dug into some of the subterranean chambers of the large buildings, and found them filled with broken pieces of plaster, painted bright red and white, and on the floors beads, axes, idols and broken pottery. "I have already taken over 200 pictures," he writes, "and at least 20 per cent. are simply brilliant, and of course the subjects are unique. I will take about 300 more of them before I return, which will be about the end of the season. I found the ruins of twenty temples, instead of three, around Quezomictlepan, and photographed them all. It is about seven days' ordinary travel on horseback from here to the City of Mexico."

There is a scheme on foot to furnish electric power to the City of Mexico from peat beds nine miles distant, owned by Boston interests.

Jamaica has prohibited the importation of American cattle.

The annual financial statement of the Dominion of Canada, for the year ending Sixth Month 30th, 1896 has been made public. It shows a deficit for the year of $363,481, and an increase in the public debt of $5,528,531. The net public debt now aggregates $258,528,531.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1863.—Last day of Third Month.—I have ried again and again to open my soul to the blessed Saviour, and He has come. I have had a sight of the blessed Saviour's supper, and perhaps tasted a little. I have resisted my sins mostly this day. Oh! preserve me dear Lord and be my Master.

Anna Scattergood was married this day. We had a silent meeting though we had valuable ministering Friends present. How useful I find this deep, solemn silence, it humbles and reduces the creature and seems to bring us into the presence of our Maker. Lord grant that I may be more dedicated the coming month.

Fourth Month 5th.—Oh, if I could only keep as humble as I feel to-night. I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes. Oh! Lord, I cling only to thy mercy.

Fourth Month 4th.—Oh! the mountains of sorrow and opposition that seemed in my way during morning meeting. Satan insinuates that I may do just this and that, and so I am led into sorrow and horror. I do beg for mercy and strength. This afternoon more comfortable from feeling that his yoke was again upon my neck and in it, some rest upon his mercy and goodness. I am the chief of sinners, but my Saviour grants forgiveness and says my iniquities shall be cast into the depths of the sea.

19th.—This is the anniversary of my birthday and the beginning of the Yearly Meeting. I have searched myself again and again, and resolved to devote my coming years to Him who has in great and marvellous mercy condescended to blot out my transgressions and shortcomings with his precious blood. Oh! that I might hold on my way!

Fifth Month 3rd.—Much has passed since I last wrote here. Dear little Albert [a nephew] is taken to be an angel above. Last First-day morning, about ten o'clock, he breathed his last. I went on with R. Stokes but feel that I was not prayerful enough; was enabled to watch and be sober, but did not fast and pray all the time. Help me, dear Lord, to learn to pray and not to get too deeply engaged in work and forget my continual dependence on thee for heavenly feelings. I have poured out my heart before thee and feel forgiven. . . . Search me, oh! God, and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me and lead me in the way everlasting. . . .

Sixth Month 21st.—A day of great humiliation, and a great part of the week spent in the same way. Have mercy upon me, and help me to love thee, oh! Father, with all my heart, mind, strength and spirit and preserve me in thy fear all the time.

TO L. H. B.

"Sixth Month 23rd, 1863.

"Thy letter created, if possible, a still stronger interest in thy welfare, and I have borne thee on my heart again and again before Him, who knows how to influence all hearts; and petitioned that He would instruct thee and give thee light. Thy being willing to change again and try the fleece, wet and dry, is strong evidence of thy sincerity, which though I did not doubt, I hope dear L. in meeting thou tries to seek and beg and wait for his Holy Presence. Oh! it is very humbling to the creature. Nothing short of 'But ye are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God, dead to our own wishes, wills and ways, desiring like a little child to be fed with the heavenly manna, Christ himself, and to live in the garden of Eden which will come with the kingdom of heaven into our souls.

"I cannot answer for many in our poor, stripped, backsliding Society, only beg that the Great Master would turn the hearts of the people more unto himself.

"I have not said so very much against thy taking the step that has agitated thee so long, have I? because I felt thou would be an earnest Christian wherever situated, and would not rest thy hopes on these rites as some do, and think they may go on in sin, almost as ever. I love good Christians of whatever name, and I think that is the general feeling with true Friends.

"Do we really shut our doors in pride? Do we not say, 'Ho every one that thirsteth,' etc.? But we refuse to enter theirs because so many of their ways we cannot unite with, and because we can find Christ, the only Sovereign Teacher in our own. He will come to those who sincerely seek Him and comfort them without our having to think of outward ceremonies. This too, is all that is attained by any Christian, even after submitting to those rites, which cannot make the comers thereunto perfect. The war spirit encouraged by them generally, would go very much against my joining with any. How much better with the immediate successors of Christ to say, 'I am a Christian and cannot fight.'

"There was a person here, conversing with brother, and I heard him say that Friends doctrine of 'Inward Light,' was what first drew him to the Society from the Episcopalians. I do believe in immediate revelation of the Lord's will to his faithful followers. I think we are charitable, for we believe that 'Everyone who feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him,' and it is only these that make his universal church on earth. Every professor, merely as such, cannot be a member of this mystical Church; only the pure in heart.

"We believe that Christ is the only 'Word' of God, as illustrated in John i. Other societies are very apt to call the Bible the Word. Some of the words are his. This seems so argumentative, but I have not sought it, only it seemed to rise in answer to thy objections. Read Ephesians ii: 19, to the end. Is it not sweet? Let us try to attain to this building to Him. Now my dear friend, deeply, lovingly and prayerfully I desire to commend thee to God and the word of his grace, which is able to build thee up in Him and give thee an inheritance among the saints. Farewell, thy loving and interested friend,

"DEBORAH BROOKS."

In her diary she writes:—

Sixth Month 28th.—Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory. Salvation is of the Lord. I felt a degree of it this week, but to-day am so sad again, and this evening am holding on to the text, "I am the resurrection and the life," and believe I have tasted a little of the heavenly supper. Oh! for watchfulness and humiliation. Dearest Father, "direct my heart into the love of God, and the patient waiting for Christ."

Seventh Month 5th.—How shall I thank my Saviour enough for his merciful deliverance from the thralldom of some besetting sins this week. Oh! that I might walk with thee in white, without sin. Dear Lord, I press close to thy side this night and try to watch unto prayer. Condescend to take hold of my hand and lead me on surely. I spread out my whole life as a map before thee, do with me what thou wilt, only make me a living child.

Seventh Month 12th.—Here I am in Newark, N. J., a place where a Quaker is almost unknown. Sometimes I feel lonely, but I know in whom I have believed, and have tried this day to worship Him in the silence of my chamber. It is a privation not to be able to go to any meeting, but I hope it will ground me more deeply in the fear and dread of the Almighty. I thank thee for strength vouchsafed, grant me more strength, I humbly pray, to watch and obey.

The following is taken from a letter to her brother and sister:

"NEWARK, Seventh Month 16th, 1863.

"The wheat-fields readily reminded of a sermon some years ago, when the preacher remarked, before the wheat was ripe the heads usually stood erect, but when fit for reaping they were bowed and drooping.

"Temptations seem to weave such an iron chain around me sometimes, that it is very difficult for me to say, 'Thy will be done.'

"It is very pleasant and natural to be with sister (Sarah), and it seems almost a paradox still to call any other place home, sometimes, it is so, and I recall with pleasure my quiet retreat with you and often remember our sol-enn silence before meals, when it seems to me we have, at times, the hidden mamma to partake of, too. I humbly hope for your preservation and encouragement in all tribulations and that we may be safely united once again.

"Your affectionate sister, "D. B."

FROM "THE INDEPENDENT."

The Moral Questions of the Campaign.

[The following editorial from the New York Independent, we transfer to our columns because it brings so clearly to view the moral principles involved in the present political campaign. If the controversy had been confined to the simple question of silver or gold as a money standard, it is probable we should have deemed it best to have kept quiet, but we believe that it is righteousness which exalteth a nation.—Ed.]

"In the issues of the present political campaign there are questions of policy and questions of morality. Questions of policy have two sides, and men may take either without sin. Questions of morality have only one right side, and men may not knowingly take the other side without blame.

"When the railway strikers in Chicago stopped all trains and led in or incited to riotous demonstrations against life and property, they violated necessary law and committed crime. The Chicago platform condemns the Federal Government for enforcing the Federal laws concerning the United States mails and interstate commerce. It was the Federal troops which put an end to rioting and bloodshed and arson. Therefore the utterance of the Chicago Convention accuses law and order and excuses rioting and disorder. Intelligent men may not, without blame, support this plank. Mr. Bryan stands firmly upon it, approves and adopts it, and pledges himself, if elected, to govern his administration by it. This principle is not simply immoral; it involves the most serious consequences. If rioting is wrong it must be wrong to countenance it, and doubly wrong to encourage it.

"Mr. Bryan proposes to change our monetary standard, not moderately or gradually, but suddenly and violently. He proposes to coin dollars of metal worth only fifty-three cents, and compel men to take them as full dollars in payment of debts. He admits that it would hurt bankers and capitalists and corporations generally; but he contends that it would benefit other classes. This is a moral question. Government may not, without guilt, compel creditors to receive bad money or depreciated money for good money. It may not, without moral wrong, decree that deficient dollars shall be passed as full dollars, any more than it may decree that one thousand five hundred pounds shall be a ton, ten ounces a pound, thirty-two inches a yard, ten a dozen or fifty-three a hundred. Some say they do not consider this proposal dishonest. That does not change the fact. It is the duty of all men to get at the truth and be governed by it. Dishonesty lies on the very face of the proposition.

"Mr. Bryan proposes that obligations of the Government shall be paid in silver at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Government sold its bonds for gold, has hitherto paid them in gold, and given the holders of them to understand that it will continue so to do. Confidence in its intention and ability led men to buy these bonds. To pay them in silver would be to pay in depreciated money. That means partial repudiation. Repudiation is dishonesty, rank and inexcusable dishonesty, when full payment is possible. Men offer specious excuses and explanations; but these do not change the character of the proposal. It is dishonest, whether they perceive the dishonesty or not.

"It is not true that all employers, bankers, capitalists, corporations, are avaricious and grind the poor. It is not true that all employers are rogues and all employes honest men. It is not true that we have classes and masses in this country, as Mr. Bryan claims. Wealth, education, position are open to all, without distinction. The laws are meant to apply to all equally. Poor men, like Mr. Bryan, as well as rich men, like Mr. Sewall, may aspire to the highest positions. Mr. Bryan's utterances on this point are incendiary. They inflame the passions of wage earners and farmers, wrest the sacred cause of the poor to a vicious purpose, tend to divide citizens on new lines; to array part of them against the other part; to create bitterness and strife; to incite class legislation, and to divide and ultimately destroy the nation.

"There would be an end to the glory and strength, the unity and prosperity, the hope and security of this Republic, if such appeals to class hatred were successful. The thought which appears to inspire the later utterances of the Democratic and Populist candidate is a monstrous one. He may hold it in all sincerity; but it is monstrous, nevertheless. There is but one right and reasonable course respecting it, and that is to repudiate and reject it utterly.

"These, we say, are moral questions, and they are moral questions of transcendental importance. They overshadow all questions of mere policy. To recognize them as moral questions is to settle absolutely the matter of position upon them. No amount of reasoning, no splendor of rhetoric or eloquence of speech can make it right to support rioting and disorder, to oppose, even indirectly, the enforcement of law, to force depreciated money into circulation, to discharge honest debts with dishonest money, to repudiate in part solemn obligations, or to seek to divide the citizens of the country and provoke an internecine war.

The Sass-Wood Ordeal.

I induced a young man, a son of one of the women they had caught, who was sitting on the ground crying, to go with me to Zion village. I wished to see our Christian people, who would be able to explain their custom of administering the sass-wood. We woke them up, and they said:

"Well, we never saw our people give sass-wood at night. If they do it will be a new thing. They will keep the prisoners till morning. The women do not dare to give them sass-wood privately, or the people would say they had killed them. There will not be anything done till morning. But it is evident they mean to kill some person."

"They told me that in Fish Town, fifteen miles away, they had killed nine people with sass-wood in one day.

We all expected a serious time, and perhaps several deaths. We were very sad; but nothing could be done until morning. So I returned to the town, and found they had caught four more after I left, and that all the nine had been taken to other towns and put under guard till the next day. The women being gone out of the house where we stayed, I did not expect any breakfast there, so asked a neighbor to cook some cassava for me. Then we went back to bed.

We could not sleep and were all up very early. The poor babe had cried for its mother all night. After going through the town to see what was going on and what could be done, I was called to breakfast. The man—Hemie—whom I had asked to cook it for me, had a good meal ready of palm butter, fish and rice.

Our Christians all gathered together, and started for the place where the people were assembling to give the sass-wood. Upon entering the town where the victims were I went into a house, not knowing that the head women were assembled there to arrange for the palaver. They looked at me, and some said, "What shall we do now? Teacher has come and we don't want her to know." Another said, "O, she can't understand what we say; let us go on." Another said, "Yes, she does; let us go to another town." I said in their language, for the women cannot understand English, "Yes, I hear what you say, and that is just what I have come for; so you may as well talk away."

Then they all rose up in great confusion and said they would go to the next town, and they all started to run. I said, "All right. I will go there. That is all I have to do to-day—just to follow you around and see what you are doing." Soon they were out of sight. We gathered together and went to the town whither the women had now gone, and where the people were going to give the sass-wood. We walked along very slowly, feeling very sad and helpless, and expecting to have our hearts made still more sad by the death of one or more of the prisoners all of whom I knew, and some of whom were my special friends.

When we reached the ground the people were flocking in and seating themselves in companies. The victims were by themselves. The kings and the chiefs who had come to plead for the lives of the accused were in another group; and the relatives of the victims still in another, crying. The women who had the case in hand came from six different towns, and had divided themselves up into many companies, that those who came to plead for the victims might get tired going round to them all, and so give it up.

We went off under the shade of a tree by ourselves, and knelt down to ask God to help us in this time of great need; for we felt that we did not know where to begin or what to say that might have effect. We sat there a few minutes and watched them get ready to beat the sass-wood.

One of the kings arose and went to beg the women not to give the sass-wood, but they refused to hear and kept up a noise so that his voice could not be heard.

They then brought forth one of the victims—a woman—and poured out some of the sass-wood. One of the men got up and talked, but there was no listener. The women began, two by two, to come up to the victim who had the sass-wood before her, ring a bell in her ear, and order her to drink the sass-wood.

One of our men said, "I'll interpret anything you say to-day." So I got up and went forward among the rest. We went to one company of the accusers, and they said, "Go to the others." We went to all, and then to the victims, asking them not to drink the sass-wood, and assuring them that if they did not do it themselves the people could not make them. But waiting to have everything interpreted was too slow work for that day; so I broke out into the native lanuage, and the ridiculousness of it all came before me, and I began to laugh at it all. The kings begged, and the Zion men talked everybody that would listen. I went to the young men who were beating the sass-wood, and said, "Let me help you. We will give every-day sass-wood to-day. You have not got half enough sass-wood in the mortar. Let me put some more. Why, is this all the sass-wood you have brought? That won't be half enough, you must send some men to the bush to get more. Don't you see all these people?" The men stood up and laughed, and could not understand me.

I went to the victim, who was sitting over the basin of sass-wood, and, after having tasted it, said to her, "It is not nice. Don't drink it. It will kill you. We will not get tired of begging or you." Then, going to the women who were ringing the bells, I said, "I am sure you must be tired. Let me ring the bell awhile." The kings were weary from their efforts to save the victims, and declared that they would not permit the women to give the sass-wood to two of the prisoners, who belonged to another tribe, and whom they were going to take to town. So they took the two, saying that the women might to what they would with the rest.

We sang and preached Jesus, and told the people of the better way, begging them to choose that day which way was the best. A man in the company sent word to me to be strong and not to let the victims drink the sass-wood.

I asked the women if they themselves had drunk sass-wood in town that morning. "No," they said. I told them I knew they did not like it, and that it was for the same reason that the victims did not want it. They were amused at the mistakes I made in speaking their language, and some of them though vexed at me, could not help laughing, and talked quite sensibly to me.

The sun was very hot, and everybody began to get tired; but still the first woman sat with the basin of sass-wood untasted before her. They brought another woman and gave her a bowl of it. They began to urge the two women to drink it, as they were getting hungry and wished to go home and cook their meals. "So we said, "Go, and bring the pots and rice here and cook it. We are not going to town to-day. We are going to drink sass-wood, and you need not be in a hurry. Look, Garroway people have stopped 'cutting farm.' See them all here to-day. They do not intend to have a rice farm this year. If they drink sass-wood and kill all the witches they want be sorry if they don't see any rice and palm butter."

At this point I was called aside by one of the men, who said that a boat had just come from the Cape bringing our supplies for the year, and word that brother Nichols, the teacher in the seminary, who had been very ill and had left a few weeks ago to go to the island for his health, had died on board the ship and been buried at sea near Sierra Leone; also, that brother Garwood, on the Cavalla River, had been drowned. I stopped for a minute, then said to the man; "God has taken them, and he will soon be here for me. Let me do what I can while I live. They are gone now."

I went into the midst of the people and told them what I had heard, saying, "Nobody will think of drinking sass-wood for them. All kinds of people die, and we who are here will soon die too." Then I said, "This sass-wood is hot. These people cannot drink it. Let us give them some water." Everybody was becoming quiet.

So I poured out the sass-wood, washed out the bowl, put some water in it, and said, "Perhaps they will drink that."

A man in the crowd, fearing that I might get the prisoners to drink the water, sent me word not to let them. I went back and said: "This water is not fresh. It has been here all day. Let us pour it out, and go to town and get fresh water." I emptied the water out of the bowl and pot, and put the bowl on top of the pot and the pestle on top of the mortar—the people looking on, glad, I presume, to see an end of it all.

I said: "Somebody can carry these things. Come to town. We are all hungry." I took the victims by the hand, raised them up, and we all started for the town. On the way we met some of the older women, and they were angry and scolded; but we all crowded on into the town. Some of the people thanked us as we walked along, some laughed and some scolded. We passed on to the second town, the men taking several of the victims to Zion. The rest, lost in the crowd, found their way to their own homes.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The late S. R. Brown, a missionary to China and Japan, thus wrote of the good influence of his mother: "If I have accomplished anything for the cause of God and man, I attribute it mainly to the mother who bore me, so far as human instrumentality is concerned. She who loved to steal away

From little ones and care,
And spend the hours of setting day
In humble, grateful prayer;

has always seemed to be holding me by the hand and bidding me go forward in the path of duty with her own courageous and cheerful spirit."

Of this mother, Phebe H. Brown, the Wesleyan Methodist says, that she was accustomed to retire at sunset into a grove near her home (at Munson, Mass.) for meditation and prayer. A neighbor criticised her, supposing that she must be neglecting her household duties. This being mentioned to Phebe elicited the following hymn:

I love to steal awhile away
From little ones and care,
And spend the hours of setting day
In humble, grateful prayer.

I love in solitude to shiel
The penitential tear,
And all His promises to plead
Where none but God can hear.

I love to think on mercies past,
And future good implore,
And all my cares and sorrows cast
On Him whom I adore.

I love by faith to take a view
Of brightest scenes in heaven,
The prospect doth my strength renew
While here by tempter driven.

Thus when life's toilsome day is o'er,
May its departing ray
Be calm as this impressive hour,
And lead to endless day.

Dr. H. A. Nelson, editor of The Church at Home and Abroad, some years ago lived near Owasso, New York, to which place the then venerable Phebe H. Brown had removed, to reside with the son who has been referred to. He thus speaks of one of the interviews he was privileged to make this "mother in Israel."

* Afterwards changed to "From every cumbering care."

"I was then a father of little children, and hers of whom she had so sweetly sang, were in their maturity. Learning from her that three thousand survivors, one of whom resided in Calcutta and one in New Orleans, while the one in those homes she then sojourned had already spent some years at the antipodes and would probably return thither after a year or two, I could not help uttering some words of condolence for such separation from her children. The look on her aged face was one of heavenly serenity and cheerfulness as she replied: 'I have learned to enjoy my children at a distance.' Never was sweet-er lesson set me by gentler or wiser teacher. No other words have recurred to my memory more often or more helpfully in recent years. I commend them to all parents whose daily thoughts and prayers are for children beyond seas."

A People Transformed.

The Society of Friends in its integrity stands for a movement to revive primitive Christianity, and to revive it in its fulness—not merely a part here or a part there. It had its origin, we believe, not in any human plan, but in the working of God through the instrumentality of men and women who had received directly from the Head of the Church himself, their qualification and commission to labor. Like the great apostle, the first Friends—and the same is true of every real Friend to-day—knew of the things pertaining to their calling not from man nor by the will of man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. Having the eye, therefore, single unto Him who had brought each one of them by the power of his Spirit out of the darkness of the first nature into his own marvellous light, and so made them free-men indeed—knowing no Lord but Him, and drawing their lives immediately from Him, the fountain of life—the early Friends found themselves, from the very nature of the case, distinct from all other denominations of their day; for their faith was no graft upon an old trunk, but in very truth a fresh shoot from the root of life. To this, early Quakerism owed its vigor, and in this lay its power to draw men.

Yet there is abroad to-day, in many quarters, a disposition in one way and another to wipe out much that has made this people a people distinct from the rest of the world; to magnify those points in which there is a resemblance to other bodies, and to depreciate those differences in practice which have given us a distinguishing character in the world. There can, of course, be no service in insisting upon differences for difference sake; but on the other hand there is no grave danger lest in the desire not to seem different from others, there may be overlooked, underlying the practices, those principles, faithfulness to which makes the Friend?

When Israel, desiring that they might be "like all the other nations," demanded a king, they had regard more to man than to the Lord, who was their real strength and deliverer, and they were retrograding from the purity of their faith. So to-day the desire to live in the world as not to come into conflict with it—though the desire may cloak itself under the name of love and of harmony, is less a sign of spiritual advancement than of spiritual degeneracy—less a token of progress in the love of Christ than of entanglement in the love of ease. "Be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God." "And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth forever."—The United Friend.

A Visit to Valley Forge.

The morning of the ninth of Tenth Month showed a heavy white frost in the low-lying grounds of our vicinity, forboding the speedy disappearance of most of the flowers which had adorned the roadsides and fields. The day was cool and pleasant, and well adapted for an excursion into the country; so in accordance with a previous arrangement, I joined a friend in an outing to Valley Forge, on the Schuylkill. It is a place of historic interest, for it was for a time during the war of the Revolution the winter quarters of the American army, where the soldiers were partially sheltered in huts constructed on the steep hillsides, and where they suffered much from cold and exposure.

It is interesting also geologically—for here the Valley Creek enters the Schuylkill through a gap in the range of hills, probably washed out in a former geologic period. This range, lying on the north side of the great Chester Valley, is composed of quartz, while the valley itself is underlain with limestone, which is supposed to have been derived from the corals and shells of sea animals deposited there in former ages, when it was occupied with an arm of the sea.

The valley of the Schuylkill is an interesting field of study to the geologist. For some distance above Philadelphia, one passes through a district where the rocks are composed of gneiss or its stratified form of schist. Near Norristown we enter the red sandstone, and observe the red color of the soil on the freshly ploughed fields. Then comes a country of limestone, where the railroad excavations along the precipitous banks disclose the stone lying in regular layers, almost as if artificially constructed, except that instead of being placed horizontally, as they must originally have been, the beds are steeply inclined; thus revealing the fact that great changes have been effected, under the influence of mighty forces, since the myriads of sea-animals contributed their shells to form these great masses of rock.

A beautiful piece of level road lies along the east side of Valley Creek, skirting the foot of a steep, wooded hill. Although so late in the season, there were many interesting plants on the roadside, some in flower and others in fruit—among the latter were two species of Dog-wood described in the visit to the lime deposits of South Jersey, the Cornus paniculata and the Cornus stolonifera. The bright red fruit of the Burning Bush (Elaeagnus atropurpurea) was a conspicuous object. The flowers mostly belonged to the three genera of compound flowers, Aster, Solidago and Prenanthes, and included sixteen species of these kinds. Perhaps the most abundant and beautiful of the Golden rods was the X. coccinea, in which the clusters of bright yellow flowers are interspersed with the green leaves on the slender stems, furnishing a very pleasant contrast in color.

We found the Dittany (Cunila Maritima), an attractive little, much-branched plant, with a pleasant aromatic odor. An infusion of it is sometimes used as a beverage in fevers. Dr. Darlington mentions that in the beginning of winter, after a rain, very curious and fantastic ribbands of ice may often be observed, attached to the base of the stems of this plant, produced, he supposes, by the mixture of the earth rising in the dead stems by capillary attraction, and then being gradually forced out horizontally, through a slit, in the process of freezing. The same phenomena has been observed in the Rock Rose (Helianthemum Canadense), and in one or two other plants. Perhaps the most showy among the Asters was the New England Aster (Aster Noce Anglica), which has unusually large flowers of a deep rich purple color, and is often cultivated in gardens as an ornamental plant.

I was quite pleased to meet with a patch of the Indian current or Coral-berry (Symphoricarpos vulgaris). The flowers grow in groups in the axils of the leaves, and are succeeded by clusters of small red berries which hang to the stems quite into the winter. I have seen them quite conspicuous in North Carolina—but it is not a very common plant in our part of the country. Its habit of growth is very similar to that of the common garden Snowberry, to which it is closely allied.

As we were walking along the edge of the woods, our attention was arrested by a bush with rather large, coarse leaves, which were apparently ready to fall. One of the stalks had no leaves on it, but there were a number of curious yellow flowers with very narrow and rather long petals. It was the Witch Hazel (Hamamelis Virginica), one of the latest of our plants to put forth its bloom—indeed, the cold weather comes so soon after, that the plant has to wait for the next summer to mature its fruit! Dr. Darlington suggests that this peculiarity may have given rise to the popular notion of its possessing certain magical properties, such as pointing out the position of underground streams of water. Of latter times it is used as one of the Homeopathic remedies. Whether it possesses any medicinal virtues or not we cannot say.

Perhaps fifty years ago we visited some rocks on the banks of Valley Creek, where grew some small ferns, rather rare in this section of country, and to find this locality was one of the objects of our excursion. But after following the stream for some three miles, we learned that the spot we were hunting was still about four miles further on. As this required a longer walk than we were inclined to take, we retraced our steps. The road which we travelled ran along the side of the North Valley hill or ridge, and its undulations showed the wearing effect of the rains, in making depressions, so that our path alternately ascended and descended.

Near the railroad station there grew some rather large trees of White Elm (Ulmus Americana). After plucking a twig I was much interested in an examination of the leaves. The central stem of the leaf is furnished (as in many other leaves), with a double row of ribs branching from it, which with their minute ramifications support the green tissue in which the vital functions of the leaf are performed. But in the elm leaf one or more of these ribs or nerves are wanting on the edge of the leaf nearest to the trunk of the tree, so that the leaves are quite unequal at the base.

"At another place I heard some of the magistrates said among themselves. If they had money enough, they would hire me to be their minister. This was when they did not well understand me, or our principles. When I heard of it, I said it was time for me to be gone, for if their eye was so much to me, or any of us, they would not come to their own teacher. Hiring ministers had spoiled many, by hindering them from improving their own talents; whereas our labor is to bring every one to their own Teacher in themselves.—George Fox.

NO PLACE FOR BOYS.

What can a boy do, and where can a boy stay, if he is always told to get out of the way? He cannot sit here and he must not stand there; The children that cover that fine rocking-chair; Were put there, of course, to be seen and admired. A boy has no business to ever be tired. The beautiful roses and flowers that bloom On the floor of the darkened and delicate room Are not made to walk on—at least, not by boys; The house is no place, anyway, for their noise.

Yet boys must walk somewhere; and what if their feet, Sent out of our houses, sent into the street, Should step around the corner and pause at the door Where other boys' feet have paused often before? Should pass through the gateway of glittering light, Where jokes that are merry and songs that are bright Ring out a warm welcome with flattering voice, And tempting say, "Here's a place for the boys."

Ah, what if they should? What if your boy or mine Should cross o'er the threshold which marks out the line 'Twixt virtue and vice, 'twixt pureness and sin. And leave all his innocent boyhood within? O, what if they should, because you and I, While the days and the months and the years hurry by, Are too busy with cares and with life's fleeting joys To make our round hearthstone a place for the boys?

There's a place for the boys. They will find it somewhere; And if our own homes are too daintily fair For the touch of their fingers, the tread of their feet, They'll find it, and find it, alas! in the street, 'Mid the gibblings of sin and the glitter of vice; And with heartaches and longings we pay a dear price

For the getting of gain that our lifetime employs, If we fail to provide a place for the boys.

A place for the boys—dear mother, I pray, As cars settle down round our short earthly way, Don't let us forget, by our kind, loving deeds, To show we remember their pleasures and needs. Though our souls may be vexed with problems of life, And worn with besetments and toilings and strife, Our hearts will keep younger—your tired heart and mine—

If we give them a place in their innermost shrine; And to our life's latest hour 'twill be one of our joys That we kept a small corner—an inner place for the boys.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Which is the More Profitable?

Chalmers, the well-known Presbyterian clergyman, enjoyed the friendship of a professor in Edinburgh University, who in the manners of the world was counted a gentleman, but who, while devotedly attached to his favorite studies, wholly neglected more serious things, leaving the care of his soul to others. Did Chalmers mention these, he seemed to be ill at ease, declined to discuss on them, turning the conversation into another channel. Chalmers loved his friend, and in prayerful solicitude for his best welfare, sought means to reach him, but found none. One day he saw him approaching, deeply absorbed in his thoughts, nor did he notice Chalmers, till their eyes met. "I have," said Chalmers, "a question to solve in profit and loss." "Indeed! what is it?" said his friend in cheerful expectancy. "What shall it profit a man if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" said Chalmers. Courteously acknowledging the question, he hastily gave Chalmers a parting word and passed on. It was a word blessed by the Holy Spirit. The arrow of conviction struck home. The question would arise unbidden and unsought in his mind nd diverted his rest in unconcernedness. Nor did he stop short until he had solved it aright, and found pardon, peace and rest in believing.

And the Lord has left the same problem on record, that each one of us may solve it, and his can only rightly be done in the light of eternity. "God makes his sun to shine on the just and on the good; He sends rain on the just and on the unjust," and what is true in nature is also so in grace, "for the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, hath appeared to all men." "God pours out of his spirit upon all flesh." And whilst an adventitious wind may seem to fill the sails of those who are forgetful of God, so as to favor them with temporal prosperity, others who love and desire to serve God, may be at times sorely tried in fulfilling their obligations to others, and even to those depending on their efforts; sickness and misfortune may seem to nullify their best efforts. Is God unmindful of these? Surely not. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord evereth him out of them all." Misfortune, sickness, even death itself, if rightly borne in the spirit of resignation to the Divine will, may prove to be to the glory of God, and to the everlasting comfort of the sufferer. Such was Jesus said, the death of those loved sisters' mother, under whose roof He loved to dwell.

"These as seen in the light of time may appear to be the broken-hearted, the poor, the unfortunate, and yet such may be rich towards God, and the Great Physician of souls is always near, for the angel of the Lord encampeth about them that fear Him. Such a one was Lazarus, whose portion in this world was poverty and sickness, having no friends and few to pity. But in eternity riches and glory awaited him. Dives having had and enjoyed his portion in this world, living to self, and oblivious of his obligations to God, who gave him all, as a faithless steward forgot his duty to his Maker and to his fellow-man. The very dogs beneath his table were more compassionate than Dives toward Lazarus, not begrudging him a share of their portion, the crumbs that fell, and licking his sores to heal them. But oh, how sad, how dreadful the sequel! Dives' portion in eternity is one of bitterness and of woe.

Can time alone then solve this query? What of the rich, covetous man, whose land brought forth so plentifully that he had no room to store it? Mark the query he puts to himself, "What shall I do?" Not "What would my Lord who gave me all, have me to do?" And having self in view as he propounds the question, self answers it accordingly, "This will I do. I will pull down my barns, and build greater, and there will I bestow all my goods. And I will say to my soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; take thee hence, eat, drink and be merry." But God said unto him, "Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, then whose shall those things be which thou hast provided." "So is every one that layeth up treasure to himself, and is not rich toward God." (Luke xii: 13-21).

The uncertainty of life is then a consideration of the first importance, and a constant factor in the correct solution of this problem. For every man shall be judged according to his works, and each one must give an account of his stewardship concerning all trusts and endowments, whether of houses, lands, riches, friends, gifts—mental or spiritual—and whatsoever might be profitable in its use, either for time or eternity. For all should be used for the good of our fellow-man and to the glory of Him who bestows them all. For the time is nigh, when it shall be said to each one of us, "Steward, give an account of thy stewardship, for thou shalt no longer be steward."

What a distrust of God's watchful and bountiful care, what an irreparable and eternal loss to any one, who in his over-anxiety to provide things temporal, that he may appear as his neighbors, that he may lay up provision for his latter days, or for that of his children, neglects to use of the increase to the good of his fellow-man, and would rather bestow it all on self. This is covetousness, of which we are warned to beware, as being idolatry.

If the heart be right toward God, and things of this world, so necessary in their own sphere, are delegated to their proper place, riches may increase, but the heart will not wander from the Lord and his service, for He will not permit a rival. And on those who hold and rightly use them a blessing rests. For truly, such as the Lord favors with gifts have it in their power to be doubly blessed, enjoying them themselves, and as Jesus said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." For the words of Jesus are, "Whosoever shall give to drink unto one of these little ones, a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you, he shall in no wise lose his reward." (Matt. x: 42).

Let then each day see its every duty done, just such as are given thee to do. None other need thy care employ, for thy allotted work is only there. In doing this well lies thy reward. For He himself thy Friend and Counsellor, will direct thy way and give thee peace. Who knows but ere another rising sun, thy sun may never set. Then, whether He come and call thee in the early watch, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, may thy answer ever be, "Ready, Lord, aye ready." And if thy accounts have daily been kept with care, thy balance will be true, and they will prove an eternal gain when the Master says, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

A Notice to Quit.

Persons who sit under their own vine and fig-tree, having homes of their own, however humble they may be, can hardly realize the condition of tenants liable to be dispossessed at any time, and who with all their love for the place where they and their children were born have no tenure by which they can retain it. But even in such circumstances the Christian is a safe refuge, and can say, "Lord, thou hast been our home in all generations" (Ps. xc: 1). And He has ways to protect and care for his people when they are oppressed and straitened and troubled.

An instance is related in the experience of Hodgson Casson, a Wesleyan preacher in England, who was once journeying with his colleague Waddy, when Casson suddenly stopped, and said, "We must turn aside here, and call on brother Blank." Waddy the colleague thought the request a strange one, but complied. On arriving at the house, they found the farmer in great trouble, and wondering why the ministers should call upon him at that hour. Casson said,

"First tell us what's the matter with you, brother: that's what we want to know." The farmer handed Casson a document which he held in his hand. It was a notice to quit the farm, signed by the steward of the Duke of —, his landlord, in the Duke's name.

"This looks like a serious business," said Casson. The poor man replied,

"It is bad enough for me who have lived on the farm all my life, and will have great difficulty to find another farm, but what's to become of the cause here? When I go down there will be no one to take the preachers or hold the class. But who told you there was anything the matter here? I only got the notice this morning, and have not mentioned it to any one."

"The same good Being," answered Casson, "whom we must now ask what's to be done next." So the ministers prayed. When they rose they inquired if any one had bidden a higher rental for the farm than he was paying.

"No," said he; "no one would who was not tied to it as I am. It's the house where I was born, and born again, and the little cause lies near my heart."

On further inquiry Casson found out that the steward and the parish minister had taken the whole thing upon themselves.

"Now then," said Casson, "we must appeal to the Duke himself. Now, brother Waddy, you're the man to write the letter to the Duke. Draw it up, and brother Blank will copy it and send it off by the next post."

The letter was written asking why the farmer was dismis-ed, and intimating that he was born there, his father had always paid the rent, and he had done so, and he was at a loss to know why he had received such notice. An answer was received. The Duke intimated that he had made an investigation and found matters to be just what the farmer had said, and the notice to quit was hereby cancelled, the farmer remained, and the cause was saved. Was not this an answer to prayer?—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Letter from Germany.

Thou wilt be glad to know that I have at last been able to carry out my wish of getting a little better acquainted with the life in a regular German "Dorf." You know that "common people" interest me greatly, especially as it is among them that one finds out the real characteristics of the nation to which they belong. The educated class of people, as well as the cities, are more or less alike the world over.

Yesterday afternoon, A—, a small friend of hers and myself, spent at Mingershausen, a small village or "Dorf" about four miles out of Göttingen; but I can assure you that I shall not do such a thing again soon, from purely hygienic reasons, because as a result of this one afternoon, I was tormented all night by dreams, not of my great grandmother to be sure, but much more uncomfortable than those that presented this worthy personage to the troubled mind of the small boy who ate the mince pie too late at night. But I must explain: Since I have been keeping house during the absence of Fräulein F—, with whom I live, I have had a "Frau," who lives next door, to come in two or three times a day, to do the work for me. She belongs to the class of rich peasants, who does not need to work out, and comes simply to accommodate. Yesterday she told me that as Fräulein F— returns in a few days she must go to the village and tell the new servant who is to come this winter, the day on which she must appear. It is a cousin of the "Frau," who is engaged, and though the family is rich, as rich peasants go, she has taken the position so as to learn house-keeping, as it is carried on in the city, and also to see a little of life. When I heard she was going, I begged of her, "Oh, take me along!" and she was very pleased and proud to do so. We left here about two p. m., and were in Mingerhausen by half-past three.

I have told you before that there is no such thing, in this part of Germany, at least, as a farm-house situated by itself. The peasants live in houses huddled close together, and go away in the morning to work, coming back at night. They own the land surrounding the Dorf—more or less, according to the wealth of the individual, and there is no apparent boundary of any kind separating the lots. Every day for an hour or two, all the cows are brought out to a small pasture field held in common by the community, and so get a little fresh air and grass, the rest of the time they are shut up in the stable. This accounts for the total absence of cattle that one notices in travelling through the country. I was going to say before, that the reason of this living together of the peasants in villages comes down from the days when for protection the people kept close together, and generally near some fortification, within whose walls they could flee in case of attack. It so happened that yesterday was the first of the autumn "Dankfest," which is held after all the harvest is safely stored away. Like all thank-givings, it consists mainly in feasting from all the good things that their land offers, and lasts several days. Dancing, testing of strength in various ways, shooting, etc., belong with it, customs also handed down from the old, old days. The sound of the music to which they danced, greeted our ears long before we reached the village, and as we entered, the streets were full of the young men and women in their "best clothes" (the colors were by no means sober), going to the grounds where the festivities were in progress. In front of one of the largest so-called "Höfs," we turned to enter. It was an immense pile of wooden buildings, arranged around three sides of an oblong, one corner of which being the residence of the family. We were ushered at once into the "gute stube" (good room), which was low, with very little furniture, and the well-scrubbed board floor was sprinkled with sand. In one corner was a large table with benches against the wall, where one sat at meal-time. Another table was in front of the sofa. After entering and laying aside our wraps, I, as the chief guest, was given the seat of honor on the sofa, and then the coffee was brought along with the "Schwetchen and Butter Kuchen"—immense plates full. (Schwetchers are prunes.) After the repast, the "Frau" with whom we went, offered to conduct me over the place, and I gladly accepted. On the other side of the hallway, which by the way was paved with stone, from the "gute Stube" was the horse-stable. As from time immemorial the horse has been the most honored animal, it had its residence directly by that of its master; and I noticed as we looked in on the handsome creatures, that an open door at the other end admitted a view into a sleeping room, probably of one of the sons of the family. The cows had stalls a little farther removed, and then there were any amount of places set apart for pigs and goats, while great droves of geese gabbled about the "hof" or yard. Back of this was the orchard, with apple, pear, prune and English walnut trees, from which we were invited to help ourselves. Beyond the orchard stretched the fields belonging to the family.

On returning to the house the "Frau," said, "Now we must go to my other cousins," so we started off up the village and stopped before the still larger and better kept "hof" than the first we had seen. In fact the "gute stube," with its clean sanded floor and the polished table and white walls was very attractive, and here there was none of the marvellous stable odor that is the pride and delight of the peasants—their pride, because their wealth consists in cattle and horses, and they are glad to give evidence of their possessions.

As soon as we had taken our seats upon the sofa, the cousin disappeared and returned presently with plates piled with the two kinds of cakes. I protested, but the "Frau," whispered to me that the cousin would be hurt if I refused, so I was forced to yield. I must confess that it was excellent. Here I was taken into the kitchen, which was spotlessly clean, and possessed no furniture besides an immense "herd" which is a particular sort of stove built of bricks, so that a fire can be made in two places, and there is a cavity over each into which fits an immense brass pot, in which the most of the cooking is done. But my chief desire was to see the "back oven," that is to say, the place where the baking is done. It was in a separate building, a large oval structure of clay and bricks, with an iron door, inside of which a large fire is made, and after about two hours' burning, the coals and ashes are removed, the floor thoroughly brushed out, and then the huge loaves of bread set on the hot stones and left there for about two hours. The "kuchen" is baked in the same way, but for shorter time.

I have become very fond of the German "schwartz brod" or black bread, as they call it, although it is of a brown color, but I had often heard that the real article as baked in the "Dorf" was much better. Later in the day I discovered that this was true.

From this "hof" we went and looked on while at the merry-making on the green, but soon returned to the village, as I wished to see the old woman from whom I have my eggs fresh every week. Her "hof" lay at the other end of the village, and there was very little stable to the house, because she is poor. She comes three times a week to market, carrying her heavy kirk on her back all the way. As we came in the house the "Frau" went before, and putting her head in the door, said, "Frau M—, sie kriegen besuch!" (you have company). At the word she appeared on the scene and in great surprise raised her hands and exclaimed "If it isn't the Fraulein," and then we were ushered into the "gute stube," and again appeared the "schwetchen kuchen," and again we were forced to partake. She was delighted to be so honored, and began to tell how I had had her help me put her "kiepe," the large baskets which the peasants carry strapped to their backs, on, and how I could really walk with it, and she added "ja, das Fraulein hat wirklich Beschied dazu!" that is to say, I carried it as though I were used to it, and that seemed to have raised me immensely in her estimation. But we did not tarry long, for we were told we must come back to the second "hof" we had visited. As we were about to enter, A— asked in a complaining way, "mus-en wir wieder kuchen essen" (must we eat cake again?) We were scarcely seated when in came the cousin with a plate of enormous slices of bread, buttered and with slices of "wurst" (sausage). With one or two exceptions I have resisted all temptations in the way of eating more than one of the innumerable species of "wurst" which abound in Germany—the one that I occasionally indulge in I know to be thoroughly cooked—all others are safer to let alone, I think. Well, on this occasion my heart failed me to resist too far, for as I refused the poor woman looked so distressed and said she was so sorry to have nothing better for the Fraulein. "I found the bread excellent and the "wurst," which was of the smoked species, really very palatable. She apologized that she had no wine, and I comforted her by saying that I did not indulge in the article, but she said in a minute she could have some warm milk fresh from the cow, and though I pleaded it was all in vain; she vanished out of the door and returned with a pail of the aforesaid article from which she served us. Before returning home it was necessary to stop at the house we first visited, as we had left our wraps there. As I proceeded to possess myself with my belongings, I found them being taken away from me, and I was told it was impossible to be allowed to go until we had eaten something. I cast an imploring look at the "Frau," who, by the way, is a very interesting, animated young woman, who had been in a continual state of laughter the whole afternoon at my continual consternation. But there was no help for me. Again we were seated, and again came the "wurst"—this time enormous. I don't know what to call them, but we were supposed to select from the variety offered, and cut off slices to suit ourselves. This at least was better, and I managed to appear to be eating, without really doing very much in that line.

It was after dark as we set off on the road home. The "Frau" said we should come again to some of the winter festivities, and I replied that it would please me greatly. I shall however be wiser next time and omit one or two meals before I go. E. S. KIRK.

Protective Mimicry in Africa.—It is among the insects that cases of protective resemblance are most abundant. Insects shaped like seed-pods and leaf-buds, like lichen and dried sticks, or colored like leaves and rocks, were met with nearly every day. They are too well known to need description, but two cases may be mentioned.

One case was met with during our return from the first expedition. Strolling one evening out of the camp at Kurawa, I was startled by a hissing noise like that of a snake, coming from a clump of grass. As I was wearing knickerbockers and tennis shoes, I sprang back and pelted the grass with handfuls of sand. As this did not drive out the supposed snake, I cautiously approached, peering into the clump. I could just detect a small green head among the stalks, and behind this appeared, whenever the noise was repeated, an expansion like the head of a cobra. I tried to kill the animal by a few sharp blows with my stick behind the head, and one of these knocked it over. I then found that I had been frightened by a big grass-hopper, which, by puffing out its wings, assumed a resemblance to the shape of the head of a hooded snake, while its noise was a good imitation of the dull, jerky hiss of some species of snakes.

The second case was more remarkable. I was working through the woods, beside the Kibwezi River, with —, Watson, one of the missionaries at the station there, when my attention was attracted by a large brightly-colored flower, like a Fox-glove. It had been raining savily, and the vegetation was so sodden with moisture that collecting was useless. I should have passed the specimen by had not I noticed one small, white, fluffy patches below the cover. They appeared to be lichen, of a kind which does not usually grow on flower-stems; therefore pushed my stick through the bush & pull the flower towards me. As soon as my ick touched it, to my great surprise, the flowers and buds jumped off in all directions.

There were several similar clusters close by, and when — Watson came up, I pointed one out to him and asked him if he had determined what genus it belonged. He said he had not one so, but that he had seen it before growing on these woods. He attempted to pick it, and was as surprised as I had been at the result.

The arrangement of the colony, with the green, ink-like form at the top of the stem, and the ink flower-like insects below, looked so much like an inflorescence that it deceived both of us, although — Watson is an enthusiastic botanist.

Whether the insects can resume this arrangement on the stem if they are once disturbed, I cannot tell. Though we sat and watched beside them for an hour, they made no attempt to return to the stem. The insects were very sluggish, and simply clung to the leaves on which they first alighted. As a rule the members of this genus can fly well, but these seemed only able to hop for a few inches at a time, and could not move if they could help it. It may be that the insects were only sluggish by the old and rain, but it appears not unlikely that the members of this species have very limited powers of flight, and secured protection from birds by this ingenious mimicry of a cluster of flowers.—J. W. Gregory.

Mangroves.—After the palms, the mangroves form the most striking feature in the coast lands. They grow in dense, jungly masses, bordering the estuaries and tidal creeks. The trees usually grow in the water, but the whole of the trunk is raised above it by a series of adventitious roots; it therefore appears as if the tree were supported on a many-legged stand. The most interesting point about the plant is the method by which it prevents its seeds falling by the wayside, and restricts them within the narrow belt in which alone they can grow. If the seeds were scattered on the surface of the estuary, the currents would either cast them ashore or wash them into water too deep for them to root in. The seeds therefore germinate while attached to the tree. The radicle grows into a thick solid spike, eight or ten inches in length, which, when released from its attachment to the parent, falls with sufficient force to drive the spike firmly into the mud beneath. The seeds therefore secure a suitable soil, and grow into dense thickets along the shore between the tide lines.—J. W. Gregory.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Priesthood of Believers.

Under the old dispensation the tenth was called for, for the support of the priesthood, under the new all is called for, or should be held as if it was the Lord's, for the gold and the silver are his, the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. The prophet Malachi told God's people that they were robbing Him "even this whole nation," in tithes and offerings.

"Bring me all the tithes and offerings into my storehouse that there may be meat in my house, and I will open the windows of heaven and pour out a blessing that there will not be room enough to receive it." We may draw a strong spiritual lesson from this, while we are not under the tithing system, yet it is the duty of the living Church of Christ not to allow his cause to suffer for the want of means, remembering that we are stewards and have to give an account of how we use the means God has trusted us with.

The tribe of Levi was to exercise the duties of the priesthood under the law; all are priests under the Gospel. The Society of Friends perhaps have recognized this in its fulness more than most other branches of the Church, while they believe that some who are called to stand as mouth-pieces in the Church should be acknowledged as ministers; yet such have no more liberty than other members. It is fitting that believers should meet together to wait upon the Lord, and let Him have his way with them, and if anything is revealed to another that sitteth by to let the first hold his peace, drawing no line of distinction between ministers and lay members.

Those that are rightly called to the ministry of the Word, are commissioned to feed the flock of God, taking the oversight thereof, not for filthy lucre but of a ready mind, being examples of the flock. There is no Scripture that teaches a one-man arrangement, for this destroys the priesthood of believers.

We are living under the new covenant, in which the law was to be written upon the tablet of the heart instead of upon stone, that no man shall teach his brother or neighbor saying "know ye the Lord," for all shall know Him from the least to the greatest, while it is a part of God's plan to reach the world by the preaching of the Gospel, yet it should be from Him who is head over all things to his Church.

Spanish Misery Through War.

The Echo remarks:—Three hundred years ago, Spain was the mightiest Power in the whole world. "The King of Spain," wrote one of the English swash-bucklers and Jingoes of the period to King James, urging that pacific monarch to an offensive war, "means to found a Fifth Monarchy;" and there was a world-wide fear that unless Spain were arrested in its universal aggrandizements, she would quickly become more powerful than Babylon, Persia, Macedonia, or Rome had ever been. The successive blows struck at this monster by Holland, by Elizabeth, by the alliance of Mazarin and Cromwell, and by Napoleon, had shorn her of nearly all her might and glory at the opening of our century. It appears, however, as if the last fatal stroke would be delivered from that New World of which she was once the predominant mistress. In its criticisms upon the excited Cuban debates in the Spanish Parliament, the Madrid El Imparcial, the most independent of Spanish papers, treats its readers not to blind themselves to the true condition of things. The prospects of Spain in Cuba are far worse than the Parliament men dare to own. Spain once possessed the greatest part of all the gold and silver in the world; but now she is utterly incapable of finding money to pay her soldiers. Her troops in Cuba have been fighting for four months without pay. This may be exemplarily patriotic, but it cannot be expected to last very long. Even the enthusiastic volunteers, who boast that they are not mercenaries, are hard put to it to get food. The want of money is so urgent, the credit is so low, that there is the greatest difficulty to obtain the most rudimentary needs of life. It has become impossible to keep up the supply of horses, mules, and other necessities for carrying out the military enterprise of Spain against her rebels. The dearth of money in Cuba is naturally telling painfully upon the Spaniards at home. Thousands of families are in the direst need, and they will lose the last shred of patience when they come to realize that their fathers, husbands, brothers, and sweethearts, who are fighting on the other side of the globe, if they come home again, will come without wages. The Spanish Government has been called upon to deny the assertions made by El Imparcial; but as it still hesitates to do so, they may be taken as confessed facts. The incessant wars of Spain, if we except her noble resistance to the aggression of Napoleon, have been wars of offence. And of no other State is the saying more evidently true, than that it is of the once great land of artists, poets, and thinkers: She has taken the sword, and is perishing by the sword. If Spain is saved from disaster she will have to thank her women. The women of Saragosa determined to set an example to their sisters throughout the nation, by getting up a public demonstration of their own against sending any more troops to Cuba. The greatest misery has spread through the province of Arragon by drafting-off so many adults into the army for service in Cuba. As soon as the Governor of the Province heard of this projected demonstration of wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters on behalf of peace, he ordered that it should be stopped. A deputation of women were admitted to an interview with the Governor, however, and he was so touched by their plaintive story that he permitted a public meeting to be held, under the condition that the resolutions to be proposed were first submitted to him for approval. This news is said to have created great concern amongst the ministers in Madrid, as it is almost certain from the character of the Spaniards that the example of Saragosa will be followed by the women in other provinces.—Herald of Peace.

THE TOTAL ECLIPSE OF THE SUN.—Suddenly I became aware that the darkness is coming from neither west nor south, but from above. It is literally falling. A star flashes into view near the zenith, and then seems to be covered a moment as by a veil. It is only an optical illusion, for again it twinkles brightly. The shadow approaches the horizon like a swift-descending curtain let down from the blue dome above. It is strangely fascinating, and even the sun is forgotten for the moment as we watch the shadow of the moon.

"But a repressed yet universal cry bursts from the observers clustered on the bridge. The supreme moment has come—the hour for which all have hoped, and for which the devout have prayed. The moon has covered the sun's disc and hangs like a dead, black ball in the heavens, while instantaneously from every side flashes the glorious, indecipherable corona.

"Never have I seen its like on earth. No painter ever wielded brush that could reproduce that lovely, matchless, silvery glow. One could gaze entranced for hours, but we must count our precious time by seconds. A bright planet beams near the corona, a little below and to the left. It is Jupiter. Below and to the left of it is Venus, and close at hand those who have glasses easily distinguish Mercury. Many see it for the first time in their lives. Those who know just where to look can even see it with the naked eye. The glass brings out clearly the constellation Leo, with its bright star Regulus.

"But we can study all the planets, save Mercury, at our leisure during the coming year; the corona draws our eyes from planet and from star. All at once on the upper limb of the black ball and to the right there gleams a brilliant point like burning phosphorus or burning steel in a jar of oxygen. The corona fades quicker than thought. The totality is past."—Exchange.

Is the life of John Alcock, formerly Archdeacon of Waterford, are related some incidents which show the superstitious ideas that prevailed among some of the ignorant people of Ireland. One of these is a story told of a strong-minded farmer, who determined to vote in the interests of the landlord against the bidding of the priest, though the latter threatened that if he disobeyed him, he "would turn him into a rat."

"It's all nonsense," said he to his wife, before going to the poll. "He can't do anything of the kind. But I say, Biddy," he added in a low tone, "I think you may as well put the cat out of the way."

A very intelligent young girl, a convert, was argued with in vain for some time by the priest. He then told those around her, all Roman Catholics, to leave the room, saying, "I am going to make an example of her and tie her to the ground." When he put on his stole, took out his book, and began to read; the poor girl acknowledged afterwards that she was terribly frightened. "I offered one prayer to the Lord for strength and courage," said she; "and for fear of the worst, I kept my feet going."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 7, 1896.

The cruel treatment which the Armenians in Asia Minor have received from the Turkish Government has naturally awakened a warm feeling of pity towards the sufferers, and of indignation and resentment directed against those who inflicted it. There is need of care lest this latter feeling should be indulged to such an extent as to awaken emotions or lead to actions inconsistent with the zealous spirit of the Gospel of Christ. Some zealous persons seem ready to proclaim war with the Turk without delay, not sufficiently considering that such a war would be attended with far greater loss of life and human misery than have as yet been experienced by the poor Armenians.

It is a favorable circumstance that in different nations, those who hold the reins of government seem to be alive to the sense of the responsibility which rests upon them, and are exercising a care not to enter upon rash and dangerous measures.

Benjamin V. Stanley has been appointed agent for THE FRIEND in place of Samuel W. Stanley, deceased. Address, Springville, Linn Co., Iowa.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

FINANCIAL STATE.—The United States debt statement shows a net increase in the public debt, last cash in the Treasury during the month amounting to $1,359,725. Total cash in the Treasury, $89,676,221.

The United States Treasury gold reserves at the close of business on the 31st ultimo declined to $117,116,269, and on Second-day, the day before the Presidential election, the withdrawals of gold from the Treasury at New York aggregated $1,359,725, the largest amount on any day except one since the movement of gold to America began.

It is estimated that the two chief political parties have sent out from Washington during this campaign at least 40,000,000 pieces of literature under the Congressional frank, thus evading postage to the amount of $2,400,000.

Respecting the overriding importance of the liquor traffic from a political-economic standpoint, Ex-Governor Hughes of Arizona says: "The United States has little to fear from England on account of her factories or gold standard of finance. What we have to fear is the demoralizing ruin, morally and financially, she is visiting on our people by the traffic of which she is the fountain, for nearly all of the breweries and stilleries in this country are controlled by English money, from which England is drawing annually millions of dollars. Her annual dividends from American breweries alone being over $6,000,000, and probably nearly as much or more from her interests in our distilleries. Think of this! more than $10,000,000 annually contributed to the gold coffers of England, through her breweries and distilleries, to keep Americans drunk, which destroys the American home, paralyzes the American mechanic, demoralizes American labor, and impoverishes the people."

The National Congress of Mothers, which is to be held in Washington in Second Month, is attracting much attention by reason of its novel character. Among the subjects to be considered are the moral, mental and physical training of the young, kindergarten work, love of country and love of humanity, evils of some present educational methods in the schools, the development of the best traits of childhood, the over-education of the child, and the mother's duty.

The experiment of introducing reindeer in Alaska has been a complete success. The animals are increasing at the rate of 60 per cent a year and will soon supply the natives with excellent and abundant food in place of the now almost exterminated seal and other wild animals, besides serving other purposes at once.

Montana produced 21,530,033 pounds of wool this year, and leads all other States as a wool grower.

Cranberries are plentiful and cheap, and many Cape Cod growers are holding on for higher prices.

By an explosion of gas in the mine of the Lehigh and Wilkesbarre Coal Company, at Wilkesbarre, on the 29th ultimo, six men lost their lives, two of them being members of the rescue party, who were suffocated while attempting to reach the bodies of their comrades.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 362, which is 12 less than the previous week and 24 less than the corresponding date of 1895. Of the whole number 178 were males and 184 females. The chief causes of death were: 26 of pneumonia; 26 of heart disease; 18 of diphtheria; 16 of apoplexy; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of marasmus; 14 of old age; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 9 of inanition; 9 of uremia, and 9 of nephritis.

HOGS.—Good Western, 5 1/2 to 5 3/4; others, 5 to 5 1/2c.

FOREIGN.—J. J. Thompson, in a recent able address before one of the scientific societies of England, said that the experiment which he was making was a practical experiment that would show that the X rays were a species of light, but that there is no property which the X rays possess which is not possessed by some kind of light. This is a very important statement.

Most of the rivers in France are out of their banks and many villages are inundated. There is great alarm in Paris. The Seine is rising and much damage has been done along and below the city. The river is so full of floating debris that traffic upon it has been stopped.

An official cablegram received in Madrid from Manila, the capital of the Philippine Islands lately says that a conspiracy against the government has been discovered in the Sooloo Islands. Eight Spanish soldiers were found to be connected with the revolt. At Sooloo, the capital of the Sooloo Archipelago, no troops have been sent there by the Governor of the Philippines, who has also armed a local force at Sooloo.

The drought continues in India, and the crop situation is daily becoming more serious. Advances from Simla were the prospect of rain, but it will occur in India are increasing and that the outlook is very serious. In the North-west, Punjab and Central Provinces there is a scarcity of food products, extending as far as Belar and Bombay, and prices have risen materially. The Government, the advices state, have announced that they have decided to issue a note of circulation of the rupee which has been begun, and relief work have been established elsewhere.

Anthracite coal of high quality is said to have been discovered in Arizona, in British North America.

Dr. G. enfell, Superintendent of the British Mission to the deep sea fishermen, now operating in Labrador, sends appealing accounts of the destitution which prevails on the coast. Owing to the failure of the season, hundreds of persons are on the verge of starvation living only upon the flour which Doctor Grenfell and other philanthropists are able to dole out to them and most perish within a couple of months unless the Government sends prompt relief. This is likely to be done, though it will tax the Government's resources to the fullest capacity. The Government has stated relief work at St. John's to assist the unemployed.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

TO L. H. B.

PHILADELPHIA, Eighth Month 6th, 1863.

"The tide of our affections seems to have been so deep, so true and so pure, that I cannot bear to think of entering deeply into argumentative intercourse now. It is so apt to lead away from the pure search for Truth, into a desire to uphold one's own opinions, that I always shrink from it. We have not been guilty of this yet, I think, and now I only humbly wish to tell thee my secret feelings on these two points and then leave thee in the arms of Him who gently leadeth those that are young. May He bless thee and give thee rest still more and more.

"When I draw nigh in spirit to my Saviour I seem to be near the Father too, and feel his approbation; and when I ask anything in his name it seems to me that my Saviour smiles the answer, they are so united in one. And when I beg the aid of the Holy Spirit it draws me nearer to the favor of the Father and Son. They are one; I feel it, I know it—the blessed One.

"But outward water seems as far from the inward purifying Spirit, as the outward sun is from the glorious Sun of righteousness. They may do for illustration, but the answer of a good conscience before God, requires deep searching of spirit, the baptism of fire against all our evil inclinations and dispositions. Saved from all sin and raised to the communion of Father and Son, this is the communion with the body and blood of Christ, that I want. He laid down his body and shed his precious blood to purchase this redemption for me. This is our communion.

"Yes, dear Laura, the same quiet love and sympathy with nature rests with me, and all its virtues seem to breathe a melody into my soul and raise it in silent aspirations. How precious to have thee say, thou had such a rest and confidence in thy Saviour and such a disapprobation too of all war and warlike spirit. It is so much more noble and Christ-like to be willing to suffer persecution, than to prepare for taking the life of another who, perchance, was ungodly and would go to eternal punishment. I hope thy brother will not be drafted.

"Thou wilt see by the date of this, that I have returned from my Newark home, for it always seems like home where sister S. is. I would like to show thee some of the grand old elm trees of that place. They are so graceful and beautiful. Newark is mostly spread over a great extent of land, so there are plenty of garden spots with trees and shrubbery, giving it quite a country-like air. I scarcely realize being in so large a city.

"Is it not a favor the riots were checked? We were threatened there two or three nights, but all has become quiet. At such times it is not a favor to remember afresh the words, 'Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee.' 'Whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from the fear of evil.' Think of me for the next week and a half right out in the country, sometimes watching the ships on the river, sometimes picking huckleberries, and sometimes watching the sky enlivened with the most beautiful sunsets. These last are such a treat. My little niece and nephew will occupy a large portion of time too, and afford much enjoyment.

"Dear L., sometimes I fear I write too much as though I had attained, I only am passing on 'to apprehend those things for which I am apprehended.' I often feel so poor in spirit, so low, so mean, and magnify the mercy that can stoop to hear my cry. Think of me, dearest L., three weeks from now, for I may have a close trial and in my heart would love thy sympathy and prayers. Pray that I may have strength, if thou canst.

"Farewell, in love and sweet communion of spirit.

"DEBORAH BROOKS."

Resuming her diary she says:

1863.—Eighth Month 7th.—To-morrow I go, if nothing prevents, to sister Mary's, and being in some measure preserved from some sins, I humbly crave heavenly help for the coming week and a half. Thy favors have been very great and I so utterly unworthy. Raise me into newness of life before thee. Help me to fast and pray.

Ninth Month 6th.—Made a change this day in my dress, after much doubt and fear. May it be sanctified to me. "Baptise me with thy baptism more and more, oh Lord."

In reference to this change in her dress she thus writes to her brother and sister:

"I have had no letters, neither have written any, for it has been one of my anxious weeks. It has seemed the longest one I ever passed in my life, but I hope to be quiet now, for to-day found me in my plainer dress. I took tea in it to night and so broke the ice, and intend it shall be my every day costume. I can feel now that my motive is accepted, and oh, saith my soul, that the 'Words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart may always be acceptable too.'"

16th.—Dearest Lord and Master thou saidst thy grace was sufficient, when Paul had the thorn in the flesh, oh! grant that I may feel it so now. Oh! grant that I may rise superior to temptation! Oh! God of peace, bridle Satan under my feet shortly. I have felt a little overcoming this day and a little of the lifting up of thy countenance this night. Oh, for thy blessing.

27th.—"Woman thou art loosed from thine infirmity," came to me this afternoon, while I was beseeching strength to watch and fast and pray, to put my mouth as in the dust, that He might be exalted over me and over all my will and ways. Oh! that it may prove so, after these eighteen years bondage, and that made pure, I may glorify Him for his goodness and long-suffering mercy.

Tenth Month 3rd.—Notwithstanding all thy mercies, my garments are stained somewhat. I hope in thy mercy and that thou wilt cleanse me from all unrighteousness. When shall I walk with thee in white? When shall I worship thee in the beauty of holiness.

11th.—I felt this morning that it was indeed of the Lord's mercies that I was not consumed, because his compassions fail not. They are new every morning.

TO L. H. B.

PHILADELPHIA, Tenth Month 20th, 1863.

"Thou art indeed very frequently the companion of my thoughts, sometimes at the lovely twilight hour. Does it not seem a fit emblem of the quietude of soul of those in whom Christ governs? Oh! holy calm for all our doubts and fears! how I long daily to experience more of it, to feel as if my will and mouth were in the dust, and He exalted over all. 'Glorious is He in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders!' His power, might and mercy seem so great that I often feel, 'Who would not fear thee, thou King of saints!'

"Thy dear little note seemed to disclose much to me. If by patiently performing the part at home, with cheerfulness and loving kindness thou art glorifying Him, the reward will be sure and perhaps by thy sweetness and gentleness thou canst win other dear ones to Him. I think that a very lovely character of which we read, were all in the household can nestle their joys and sorrows with confidence. But methinks that one's cup must often be replenished at the pure Fountain or it would fail. . . .

"Didst thou think of me in my trial? Well it is over now, and when thou comes, perhaps my outward apparel may appear a little different, and oh, that I could say that the inward adorning was more settled and deep in character.

"While with Anne Sheppard, during the last week of vacation, we did something at collecting flowers for bleaching and skeletonizing and I want to go out on my next holiday, to assist her a little. . . . Didst thou ever think of those flowers being a type of the resurrection of the soul, clothed in pure white before its Creator? They have to pass through so much cleansing and finally become so white and beautiful that they remind me of it.

"Now dearest, in a portion of this pure and loving Spirit, my heart salutes thee and says farewell.

"Thine, truly as ever,
"D. B."

25th.—Through adorable mercy have been enabled to walk almost entirely in the strait and narrow way during the past week. Glory and honor, thanksgiving and praise be unto this little seed of life made manifest in my soul. Oh! help me to put my mouth in the dust, that thou may be exalted, God over all.

31st.—Thou Lord 'ost condescend to teach me thyself and I come unto thee like a little child. Have mercy upon me! Hold my hand lest I slip! Show me, oh Lord, of thy spirit and power! Teach me the revelation of unutterable truth and acceptance of a wonder-working power, which can change the heart, humble the lofty spirit and produce a holy frame of mind, rejoicing in the fruits of the Spirit, righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.

(To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Saul—Paul.

Perhaps there is no more notable example of the power of God to save and the Holy Spirit to transform a life than we get in the change of Saul, of Tarsus, to Paul, the great disciple to the Gentile world.

Saul the persecutor, making havoc in the church, hauling to prison men and women who were of the "Way."

Paul, preaching that Christ fearlessly, whom he had aforetime blasphemed so vehemently.

How blessedly Christ can save those who come to Him and submit to the Holy Spirit to do his way. But one may say, "Of course, Saul was a bad man, persecuting the Church, and by his actions showing an evil heart. I am not like him, he needed a change to be wrought. I have never done any real bad thing. I believe in doing the best I can, and I think I am all right." Listen! Saul, of Tarsus thought he did God service, and my dear soul, hear this, "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God."

"Except a man be born again he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." Cannot even see it—simply cannot, the same as I cannot see the Yosemite Valley if I do not seek it. But listen again, "To as many as received Him to them gave He power to become the children of God." So He will do now. As many as open their hearts and admit this Lord of life, He becomes their life in deed and truth.

Dear heart, He will transform thy life. Let no one think a mere head knowledge and belief will avail. If thy love and loyalty to thy Lord, does not show in thy life, I question very much whether thou hast seen or hast the kingdom of God, for that kingdom is peace. If a man has been ill-natured and unkind in his family, unlovable and unlovely, and still shows the same unyielding spirit, no matter what he may say as to himself, people read the life, and we are said to be "epistles read and known." How useful then that they who profess to be of God's people, should in their life and conduct show forth the fruits of the Spirit! A man is not an example of Christ-serving if he is proud and over-bearing, carrying a high head. He does not show a changed life if he thinks only of self, and cares little how anyone else fares. No, the loving, Christ-like spirit is self-sacrificing, gentle, teachable, kind. If Christ be in us we will show forth the Christ-life and likeness. "Ye must be born again," and the new birth is a changed life, the old man cast out, and the new man, the holy one, taking possession. "All things become new," because "the old things are passed away." If Christ be formed in you, then ye are new creatures—a new creation—and this is "a life hid with Christ in God." Oh! blessed life, how different from the old.

Dear reader, seek to know thou hast truly passed from death unto life, then wilt thou indeed be a light in the world. Do not rest then in an easy indifference, uncertain how it may be with thee, but listen to the voice of the Holy Spirit. He will tell thee where thou standest. He will show thee thy heart, and if thou art not already his, let Him now transform thy nature, and thy life will show forth his praise, peace shall be thy portion in this life, and in the life to come eternal rest. Delay not, for no man knoweth when he will be called hence to render an account to God. Oh! may we be ready to enter into the gates of the City.

The Plain Language.

One day, when reading in the Scriptures, which were become more sweet to me, the fourth chapter of John, where the account is given of the conversation the Saviour had with the woman of Samaria, it is said she told her neighbors she had seen a man who had told her all things that ever she did. Then did they come also to hear Him, and said unto her, "Now we believe—not because of thy saying, for we have heard Him ourselves." Although I had admired the Scripture language, which was spoken by the Quakers, and thought there was great simplicity in it, yet I had never felt that any part of it belonged to me until that moment; neither was I then thinking anything about the language, either how it was written or spoken, but as I was reading the words, "Now we believe—not because of thy saying." As soon as I had pronounced in my heart the single word thy, it was as fire in my bones, or as a sharp two edged sword. I could not proceed. I trembled, and it was made known to me that that was the simple, the pure, the uncorrupted manner in which God had instructed his creatures to have communication one with another. Oh! the purity and beauty that was opened to my mind respecting it.

The first conversation that God had with man was thus begun, "Adam, where art thou?" And all the communication between God and man—with all the prophets, and the blessed Jesus, and the apostles, they were all in the same manner. That I may truly say they were as so many voices calling aloud to me and saying, "This is the way, walk thou in it." But all these things I hid in my heart.

The requiring of the Lord, increased from day to day, to be obedient unto Him, and to use the Scripture language—this was indeed to try as by fire. Many were the times I have sat in my work-room, the girls at work around, when the power of the Lord has arrested me as an armed man, calling aloud for obedience, and I have said in my sore trouble, "Lord, if thou wilt strengthen me, I will be obedient to Thee before I rise from this seat." But alas! alas! when the girls have spoken to me, I have answered in my former manner, and again been much in sorrow. I may say, for many months my soul was very sorrowful, even almost unto death; for had my Holy Father required my life at my hand, I would gladly have given up this instead of saying thee and thou to a single person. Often, when walking in the fields, which I was obliged to do almost daily, my health being very feeble, I have poured out my soul before God, begging for strength to take up this great cross, and often saying in my heart, "There are many good people who do not use this language; why may I not please Thee without speaking thus?" but my reasonings were all in vain, for I was made truly sensible that "obedience is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." I have said, "If Thou wilt strengthen me, I will never again rebel against Thee in this;" but the first person that has addressed me, I have fallen again into condemnation—like poor Samson, shorn of his strength. Oh! wretched creature that I am, who shall deliver me from this bondage—the fear of man.

I had been instructed by the Lord that I was not to do his work partially, neither was I to respect persons, so I could no more speak to my apprentice in this language than I could to a lady. At last my bodily strength began again to fail, and my health sunk under such a pressure of continual condemnation. As sensibly as Paul ever felt, that a woe would be unto him if he preached not the Gospel, so sensibly did I feel, that except I gave up to use the whole Scripture language, I should be a castaway. I, tremblingly, gave up and said, "My Father! my Father! if I perish I will be obedient." The trial was long, and the fire exceedingly fierce; but my adorable Saviour, who said to his immediate followers, "Take no thought beforehand what ye shall answer, for it shall be given you in that same hour," was near to help in every time of need.

Those who employed me in my business were generally the great and rich of this world, in consequence of which my cross was much greater. When attending some ladies, I have been arrested by Divine power, so that I have felt constrained to tell them what was required of me. On these occasions, some have said I was a very good creature, quite good enough, there was no reason whatever for me to change; but they believed what I did was from principle. Others said, I was beside myself; it was all nonsense; others were dreadfully enraged, saying it was too much equality, it was not showing proper respect to my superiors.

The Lord, in mercy, gave me power to declare his truth, and the opposing spirit was bound down at those times. One day, a lady, a well-wisher of mine, said, "My dear Loveday, I would advise you to take care what you are about, for I heard some ladies say they should not employ you again." I felt this as a dart to my heart; but was strengthened to answer with these words, "He who feeds the ravens when they cry unto Him, has taught me to look to Him for my daily bread." My soul was strengthened, for power was given from on high, yet I oftentimes shunned the cross. Very many times I have not spoken half what I wanted to speak, because the cross was so great. I believe had I been more faithful to the instructions of my Allwise Teacher, this fiery trial would not have lasted so long. I was led daily to see the pride of the human heart, in its unrenewed state, looking for the honor that cometh from man; but these things drove me more and more to the fountain head of all happiness, for from Him cometh my help.—From the Memoir of Loveday Henwood.

A Letter from Germany.

GÖTTINGEN, Tenth Month 10th, '96.

This week my friend Ida came to Göttingen to be treated. She is in a hospital for a week, and I go to see her every afternoon, and it is so pleasant for both of us. I am not allowed to see her mornings. If I had not been here, her mother would have come, although it did not suit her, so I am very glad that I can be a little bit of use to some one.

Andreasberg is only a little over an hour and a half from here by railroad, and I shall probably go to see her sometime in the winter. I should love to be there when there is snow everywhere.

To-day Fraulein F—— and the two children and I took a long walk to a most picturesque village—situated on the top of a high hill that looks down upon the valley in which Göttingen lays. People who have been there say that the village called Nicolausberg is situated exactly like the holy city, Jerusalem. They often call it, therefore, "Klein Jerusalem," and have named the various elevations about "Mount of Olives," "Zion," and so on. The way up was very interesting, a delightful path wound up the hills that extend along the north side of our valley, giving a charming view.

We are having now the "Alter Wiber Summer" (old wives summer)—really perfect to-day, warm and sunny, such as we have had very few of for several months. The harvests are all in, or at least nearly so, for at present they are at work taking out the last potatoes from the ground, and also the sugar-beets, of which an immense amount are raised in this section of the country. The trees are all changing their foliage, and many stand already bare. The colors are fine, though not to compare with what we have very often with us. After reaching the top of the range of hills, we descended a steep slope, to again climb a yet higher and steeper one, upon the top of which we could now see the body of the old church, whose tower is a landmark over the entire surrounding country.

We had brought "butter-brot," along, and at a very uninviting looking "Gasthouse" (village hotel), we could get milk and beer. A—and I took a glass each of the former, while the other two preferred the German beverage.

While it was being brought and the others were resting, I took the time to wander about the old graveyard surrounding the "kirche," whose tower is so conspicuous a feature of the landscape. It is one of the finest buildings of the kind in this part of the country, and dates from some time in the tenth or eleventh century. I found no very old tombstones, but I imagine the oldest graves are entirely obliterated. A rambling wall encloses it from the orchards and barn yards of the neighboring houses, and from its steep sloping position one has a charming view of the distant towers of Göttingen, seen through a V-shaped opening in the distance, and of the hills beyond, as well as of the picturesque red tiled roofs embosomed in verdure, of the houses of the village that cluster in romantic confusion along the sides of the hills.

On our way down we met a remarkable team drawing a cart loaded with sugar-beets. It was composed of an old horse and a cow harnessed together.

At the foot of the hill we noticed as we came up a field that was a perfect mass of gorgeous red poppies and what the Germans call "korn-blumen," they are really beautiful together. We sent the children on ahead to gather a bouquet, and when we came along the temptation was too great—we too waded in amongst them, although it was already late, and we all came home laden with handsome bouquets. If this weather continues we will soon take another trip to a beautiful old ruin not far away, and then there are a host of villages that I want to visit. It is a pity that the days are so short, but the sunshine we must make use of while it lasts.

Scarcely a day passes that I do not feel thankful for the quiet and comfortable home that I have here. This immense garden is my constant retreat. Often mornings before the others are stirring, I am out with my book, getting the fresh air and early sunshine, and when it rains I put on my waterproof and an old hat and overshoes, and go just the same. E. S. K.

A Nearer View of the Jasmine Tower.

Many of the readers of thy paper will recall the visit to Philadelphia, several years ago, of that well educated benevolently inquisitive Hindu lady, the Pandita Ramabai, upon the occasion of which visit she was the guest of Dr. Rachel L. Bodley, since deceased, Dean of the Women's Medical College. Soon after her return to India she was enabled to inaugurate, at her native city of Poona, the institution which she had had so much at heart for the instruction and care of that much despised and oppressed class, the young widows of her race. A very interesting letter, which she has lately written to her American friends comes as a quite pertinent comment upon the remark that was made the other day by our eminent visitor, Li Hung Chang, concerning the near approach, in his estimation, of the religion of Christ to that of Confucius. (I think that we should find the religious beliefs of China and India much more nearly allied: Buddhism prevails in both countries). Those who, with myself, have read thrilling rhapsodies upon the wondrously exquisite architecture of the Taj Mahal, may be especially instructed by what the pandita says in her recent letter.

Opening with the remark that "a superficial knowledge of the philosophies and religious books of India has been misleading many Western people to think that the Hindus are the sole possessors of superior spirituality," so that she is not at all surprised that the good men and women of the West, who only see the outside of the grand structures of Oriental philosophy, are charmed with them," she continues:

"This reminds me of the sight I saw at Agra, while I visited that city, about 1894. One day we went into the fort to see the grand palaces of the Mogul Emperors. There we saw the great Khas Mahal, or the Emperor's private palace, where he used to keep hundreds of beautiful women shut up for life. The guide showed us the Rani's private rooms, the gardens and grand marble buildings once occupied by the kings and queens. He also showed us the beautiful pleasure tower, called Saman Burj. Visitors are shown all that is beautiful there, and they go away carrying very pleasant impressions of Agra with them."

Not content with seeing the charming exterior of those "poems in marble," Ramabai asked to be shown the dungeons where those queens who unhappily incurred the king's displeasure were put away. Although the guide at first denied the existence of such places, his denial and reluctance were overcome. A trap door on one side the palace was opened, letting the visitor into the underground apartments: then, a big torch lighted, they proceeded to the furthest end of the great building to a room beneath the Saman Burj, or Jasmine Tower. The room was very dark, octagonal, with a deep, dark pit in the centre, and a big beam placed on the walls right over that pit. This beam, beautifully carved, served for hanging the unfortunate women who once occupied the throne of the king as his queens, but had by some unknown cause fallen under his displeasure, and had to suffer such a cruel and ignoble death. Their lifeless bodies were let down into that dark pit, whence a stream carried them to the waters of the Jumna, to be eaten by crocodiles.

It would be interesting to transcribe all the letter, but an additional sentence or two must suffice. Ramabai would have her Western sisters not to be satisfied "with looking on the outside beauty of the grand philosophies, and not to be charmed with hearing the long and interesting discourses of our educated men, but to open the trap-door of the great monuments of Hindu intellect and enter into the dark cellars, where they will see the real workings of the philosophies which they admire so much." "I have gone," she says, "to many of the so-called sacred places, lived among the people, and seen enough of these learned philosophers and possessors of superior Hindu spirituality who oppress the widows and trample the poor, ignorant, low-caste people under their heels. They send out hundreds of emissaries to look for young widows, and bring them by hundreds and thousands to the sacred cities to rob them of their money and their virtue. . . . If anything has been done for the fatherless and widow by anybody at all, it has been done by those people who have come under the direct influence of Christianity."

It was in grateful recognition of the fact that when the wife of Earl Li was critically ill, her doctors having declared they could do no more for her and she "must die," yet the subsequent efforts of missionary physicians—one of them a woman doctor of the American Methodist Mission, were, nevertheless, successful, that the Viceroys entered heartily into the project to establish "a great hospital plant and efficient service for men and a second hospital for women," himself the chief patron of the one, his restored wife that of the other.

Earl Li does not believe that the opium production and the use of the drug are good things for "the celestial empire." It was about thirty-five years ago that the Earl of Shaftesbury—a good, practical exponent of Christianity—introduced into the British Parliament a motion of inquiry (1) into the lawfulness of the revenue derived in India from the cultivation of the poppy, and (2) whether it was lawful to prepare the drug for the purpose of smuggling it into China. Although neither of these queries has yet been satisfactorily answered by the Government to which they were addressed, it may meanwhile be said that the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ neither fosters nor defends the baneful traffic. It sufficeth not to draw the world's admiring attention to the exquisitely sculptured exterior of the Temple. "The King's daughter," said the Psalmist, "is all glorious within."—Joshua W. Leeds in the Public Ledger.

NOTHING should be reckoned bad, or called an evil, if God sent it; whatever He sends is good.

For "THE FRIEND."

Lines in memory of Jane H. Sears, of Coal Creek, Iowa, who passed away Seventh Mo. 21st, 1890, after a sickness of less than twenty-four hours, a large part of which time she was unconscious.

On a quiet summer evening,
When the sun was sinking low,
O'er the wires came solemn tidings,
Which it grieved our hearts to know;

That a cousin we had cherished
Ever since our childhood days,
For her heart so true and loving,
For her kind and gentle ways,

Had been called by Death's bright angel—
Ere we knew it she was gone,—
But we feel her lamp was burning
And her Christian armor on.

Well we knew that there were dear ones
Gathered round her dying bed,
Who to every need were faithful,
Who kind words of pity said.

Though our frail and finite reason Cannot understand or see
Why her call should be so sudden,
And so wrapt in mystery,

Why, when came to her the summons,
Those by kindred ties most near Might not gather round her bedside,
Shed o'er her the parting tear,

Might not see the look so peaceful
Telling us of Heavenly bliss,
As we bent above her coffin
For a last, long loving kiss.

Why no word of sweet assurance
To her dear ones she might give,
That she heard her Heavenly Father
Calling her with Him to live,

That she felt his power, sustaining
In the solemn hour of death,
And his arms of love and mercy
Round about and underneath.

Yet we dare not doubt or question,
For we feel that all is well;
That our dear one with the angels
Safe forevermore will dwell;

For this precious consolation
To our saddened hearts is given:
She had loved the dear Redeemer,
She had lived her life for Heaven.

And truly we may say of her
"She hath done what she could,"
For, all-forgotten of herself,
She lived for others' good.

On tender ministries she came
And went with willing feet,
And round our daily lives she cast
An influence, pure and sweet.

And, although our hearts are longing
For her presence as of yore,
And though tears of love are flowing
For our dear one gone before,

Though we miss her far too deeply
To be told by tongue or pen,
Yet we would not wish to call her
Back to earth, to life again;

But would long in meek submission
To our Heavenly Father's will,
And, in humble, deep contrition,
Would be found abiding still.

For "THE FRIEND."

WE ALL DO FADE AS A LEAF.
Is. lxxiv. 6.

The mild Autumnal days have come, in all their wondrous glow,
When million leaves of varied forms their magic beauty show—
Nor rainbow hues nor sunset skies can'en with them compare.

When, clustering on every bough, their gorgeous robes they wear.

The crimson of the maple and the poplar's golden hue,

In richest tints, we note beneath their canopy of blue,
And darksome pines the many shades of color interweave,
By contrast strong, to beautify the bright and pleasing scene.

And is there not a lesson in the lovely changing leaf,
To warn the thoughtless worldly one, his life is surely brief;

That, as he hears the solemn close, his soul the mark should bear
That he is ripening peacefully while leaving earthly care?

May glories of the unseen world then gild his latest day,

As if reflected from above, in pure celestial ray,
And, when in death his faded form, mute and unconscious lies,

The Saviour's smile illuminate his pathway to the skies.

The Plain Pathway of Salvation.

The Lord Jesus Christ is the only Saviour.
Grace and Truth comes by Jesus Christ.
The Lord Jesus Christ saves by the grace and Truth which comes by Him.

For, it is the grace of God that brings salvation, and it is the Truth, as it is in Jesus, which makes free indeed.

He, therefore, that would be saved from sin and condemnation, must wait for the inward manifesting and revealing of the grace and Truth in his heart; and must receive it, and be subject to it, learning of the grace to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts in every kind; and he must learn of the Truth as it is in Jesus, to deny whatever is contrary to the life, nature and Spirit of Jesus. He must likewise learn of the grace and Truth, to fear God; to turn from all false, invented worship and ways of men, and to worship God, the Father of Spirits, in spirit and in truth; and, as he learns and practices this, he will also learn of the grace and Truth, to live soberly and righteously in this present world, yea, and godly also, even as the holy God would have him; for, God would have men live no otherwise than as his grace and Truth teaches them. Now, God's grace and Truth, and the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which is written in the inward parts, do not only teach that which is good, and to deny and depart from that which is evil, but give ability so to do. "My grace is sufficient for thee," said God to Paul. And the Truth of Jesus, revealed inwardly, hath virtue and power in it; inasmuch, that they who receive the grace and Truth which comes by Jesus Christ, receive power to become sons of God. For the grace, the Truth, is not a notional thing, but hath the virtue and power of life, and mortification in it; and they that truly receive it, partake of its virtue and power in operation and exercise of it in their hearts, and are thereby really made dead unto sin and alive unto God.

So, then, he that knows the grace and Truth which comes by Jesus Christ, receives it, learns of it, is subject to it, and partakes of its virtue and power, he knows Christ unto salvation; but he that knows not, receives not, is not subject to the grace, doth not experience the sufficiency of the grace, nor witness ability and power through it to become a son to God, and to do the will of God,—he doth not yet at all know the Lord Jesus Christ unto the salvation of his soul, notwithstanding whatsoever he may profess or believe concerning Him.—I. ## Curious Lamps.

Nearly all the jelly-fishes are luminous, and on dark nights the sight as one gazes into the water is a marvellous one. Instead of darkness and gloom, the water appears to be filled with lights which move in every direction, with long tails like comets, others like mimic snags and mounds. These remarkable creatures are so delicate that many can be seen, but not felt and nearly all are ninety-five per cent water, so that when exposed to the sun they soon disappear, evaporating like water itself. They range in size from specimens just visible to moon stars almost capable of stopping a boat, and with a maze of tentacles sufficient to drown a man or seriously poison him by the discharge of their batteries of lasso cells.

One of the largest jelly-fishes ever seen in American waters was observed by Mrs. Loui Agassiz, who found it floating on the surface in Massachusetts Bay. An oar was used to near it, and across the disc it was seven feet while the mass of tentacles as they stretched away, was over one hundred feet in length. Imagine this monster, this mass of solidified water luminous, a gigantic comet moving through the depths of the ocean, each individual tentacle standing out in high relief against the dark water, and some conception may be had of the sights to be seen beneath the sea.

The light emitted by these jelly-fishes is called phosphorescence, but what it is or how it is produced is more or less a mystery. In some it invests the entire animal, in others the umbrella of the jelly is the light-giving organ, while in others it is confined to certain portions of the body. The light varies in color. The common tint is yellow or white, while blue, green and red are seen, so that the jellies appear like gem in the sea, scintillating with all the tints of the diamonds.

By stirring small jellies violently the write has produced a light by which the time was told at night by a watch; and one luminous jelly-fish placed in twenty-seven ounces of mill produced a light so vivid that ordinary newspaper print could be read several feet away. More remarkable yet was the experience of a naturalist in the equatorial Pacific, who stood on the shore of an island and read a book by the light of the breaking waves, which were grinding up the fragile fire-bodies and making a line of fire or light that reached away for miles.

The writer has witnessed a similar phenomenon in extreme southern Florida, where the waves broke on a coral reef, at night making a gradual curve of white light that could be distinguished a long distance on the darkest night. The water here was filled with jellyfishes and other minute jelly-like forms, so that the slight disturbance in the water created a blaze of light.

The light of jelly-fishes has a practical value. On the New England coast the mackerel fisherman take advantage of it by following the school at night, relying on the tell-tale jellies and other minute light-givers to expose the position of the fish, which they really do by a simple process. The mackerel, by swimming along in vast body, disturb the jellies, irritating them so that the entire school looks like a patch of fire on the water, which can be seen from the top-mast of the mackerel-men a long distance off. Toward it the vessel is directed, the large net thrown about the fiery spot, and enormous loads of fish made.

If a single school of fish can change the water er acres into a mass of seething fire, we can imagine the appearance of the ocean in a storm where phosphorescent animals abound. The effect in such cases is often remarkable. Ahead of the ship will be a mass of foam blazing like fire, and so brilliant that the sails, masts and rigging are illumined by it. In such a sea one of the most remarkable of all phenomena was observed—a luminous waterspout. The spout was large and seemed lost in the clouds, a literal pillar of fire travelling by night, and so appalling a spectacle that it terrified mariners; yet the simple phosphorescent jellyfishes, diatoms, noctiluca, and others, were the cause; whirled about, torn apart by the rushing waters, the light was augmented until the entire monster column appeared to blaze with light and stand out against the sky like a pillar of fire. Such a sight might well excite the superstitious fears of the sailors and augment the terrors of the sea.

One of the most remarkable of the jelly-like luminous animals is known as the pyrosoma, or "fire-body." It resembles a cylinder, open at one end, from six inches to four or five feet in length, and is in reality a community of animals, better known as an ascidian. A ship once sailed through a sea of these creatures, with a result that was awe-inspiring. The water had a milky appearance, and looked, upon examination, as though it were filled with red-hot cylinders. The sea when it broke gave a spectral glare to everything, so that the sails and rigging cast dark shadows on the deck.

Some of these fire-bodies were nearly five feet in length, and presented a most great spectacle when brought on deck, great waves of fire sweeping over the surface, which seemed to be studded with bolts, or to have the appearance of hammered brass. The naturalist Bibrà took one of these fire-bodies and placed it in a jar of water which he suspended from the ceiling, when it emitted so brilliant a light that he actually wrote a description of the animal by its own light.

The animals which constitute these cylinders each draw in water from the outside and eject it into the interior, and the volume rushing out or forced out of the larger end, forces the animal along, after the manner of some of the steamers used in canals, in which water is simply forced out of a pipe in the stern, thus pushing them along.

These lights have their uses in the economy of nature; they are signals and warnings, and undoubtedly aid the illumination of the submarine world. The light is well known in every sea, familiar to everyone who has crossed the ocean or sailed upon it, and there is hardly a branch of the animal kingdom that does not contain a light-giver; yet no one, so far, has given a satisfactory explanation of the cause of the light—the same light, apparently, that is seen in living animals, in decayed wood and animal matter, in minerals, and under conditions in which ordinary light cannot exist or combustion continue.—C. F. Holder in The Outlook.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The time is near to come and the days shall not be prolonged. Let not buyer rejoice, nor the seller mourn; for wrath shall be upon the whole people. And it behooves us to humble ourselves as the King of Nineveh did when he laid aside his royal robes and clothed himself in sackcloth and sat in ashes, and proclaimed a fast, saying, Let not man nor beast take anything. But let us cry mightily to the Lord. It may be that He may repent, that we perish not. Let us acknowledge our sins. We have all sinned and fallen short of the glory of God. Let us lift up our hearts to the Lord, that He may have mercy on the workmanship of his holy hand, for his names sake, and for his sake who died for us, and ever liveth to make intercession for us, that He may not spare till He has humbled us, and we turn from the evil of our ways. And the day dawn when righteousness shall cover the earth as waters do the sea.

Leopards in Africa.—G. Scott Elliot, in his journey to Mount Ruwenzori in Northeastern Africa says: "This part of the mountain was a very bad place for leopards. One very dark night a porter went outside the camp and was seized by one. On hearing the noise I rushed out, and, after some trouble and much expenditure of powder, found the man with part of his cheek bitten out and severe wounds on the neck. As soon as I had attended to him the leopard leaped into the camp amongst the fires and seized another man. When I got to him I found a bad cut in his breast and blood spurting from a wound in the neck; he was breathing through the breast and part of the lung was visible. With much trouble we got his wounds sewn up by means of an ordinary needle and thread. I spent the rest of the night in a chair, with a rifle across my knee, and though the animal tried twice to get into the camp, we saw it in time.

"These creatures never used to prey on man, according to native report; but since all the goats and fowls had been driven off by Kabbarega they had become a great nuisance. The natives build high fences of branches and elephant grass, and retire within them at three P. M. every day. Leopards in this part hunt in perfect silence, never coughing as they do in West Africa.

"I am glad to say both these men reached the coast safely in spite of my surgery."

The Bamboo Zone.—The mountain forest zone passes upward into that of the bamboo, which on Kenya occupies the slopes from the height of eight thousand to nine thousand eight hundred feet. The bamboos are packed together so closely that, except where the elephants have forced a way through them, a path has to be cut step by step. The bamboos rise to the height of over forty feet, and the stems are often from three to four inches in diameter at the base. Above they branch repeatedly, and the foliage interlocks with an imperfect thatch, which is always sodden with moisture.

Bishop Whipple of Minnesota and his Horse Bashaw.

Here is what he says of his noble horse "Bashaw," that served him in all the long wild journeys over that then new country.

"When I was appointed there was not one mile of railway in Minnesota. I could only travel on horseback or in a buggy or sleigh.

"Bashaw" was a kindly fellow, and had every sign of noble birth, a slim, delicate head, prominent eyes, small, active ears, large nostrils, full chest, thin gambrels, heavy cords, neat fetlocks, and black as a coal. He was my friend and companion in nearly forty thousand miles' travel, always full of spirit yet gentle as a girl. I never struck him but once, and that was to save his life and mine on the brink of a precipice; and when saved, the tears filled my eyes. He knew how I loved him and he loved me as well as horse ever loved his master. He never forgot any place where he had ever been, and many a time he has saved our lives when lost on the prairie. In summer heat and winter storm he kept every appointment, and it was done by heroic effort. It was no easy task to travel in winter over prairies without a house for twenty miles.

I recall time after time when we were lost. In 1861 I left New Elm for the lower Sioux agency, when the thermometer was thirty-six degrees below zero at noon; there was an ugly flecked sky, and long rifts of clouds. For seven miles there were houses in the distance, and then twenty miles across the prairie without a house. We were in it; our motto was, "No step backward." In about an hour we came to a place where the snow had been blown away; it was stubble and no sign of a road. I was lost! I turned the horses back to follow my sleigh tracks; the wind had obliterated them. We started in the direction of the agency. The country was full of little coolies, and soon I had both horses down in snow-drifts. After great efforts we got back on the prairie. Night had come on; not a star, the wind howling like wolves. I knelt down and said my prayers, wrapped myself in buffalo robes, threw the reins on the dash-board, and then prepared to let the horses walk where they would until daylight. About midnight old Bashaw stopped so suddenly that it threw me on to the dash-board. I jumped from the sleigh, and found an Indian trail which looked like a snake under the snow. I knew that one end of it was at the agency, but which, I knew not. We followed the trail until we saw a light. Never did a horse neigh more joyously as he sprang towards it; we were saved. "Dear old fellow! As I put him in his stall he dipped me with his lips with a marvellous look out of those grand eyes, as much as to say, 'Master, all's well!'"

"So many have asked me to tell them about Dear Bashaw. I am sure you will not blame me for telling you again about this brave creature of God."—Our Dumb Animals.

POTENTIALLY INFLUENCED.—A singular example of the way in which human lives, separated by space and time, are inextricably woven together is given by the Congregationalist.

A young man who was born in the Sandwich Islands became a missionary, and in course of time found his way to a station in China. He was not only a zealous Christian, but a naturalist, and made in odd moments a special study of snails, and sent one or two papers on them to an English scientific journal.

The close observation, clearness and inexorable logic shown in these papers attracted the attention of the late Professor George James Romanes, of the Royal Institution, London, who opened a correspondence with the missionary.

Professor Romanes was a prominent scientific man, a Darwinian and an atheist. After exchanging letters upon snails for several years with him, the missionary received from the London scientist a startling appeal.

Professor Romanes stated that the manner in which his unknown correspondent had written on natural subjects had convinced him of his high logical faculty, his keenness of mental vision and his conscientiousness. He had resolved to ask him, rather than any other man, why he believed in Christianity.

The missionary replied at length. A year or two later the great scientist died, but he proclaimed some time before his illness that he had returned to the faith of his childhood. The humble missionary was, it is probable, the chief agent in restoring this leader of modern thought to the ranks of religious truth.

It really appears to be a matter of small importance whether a poor clergyman, amusing his leisure moments with the snails in his garden, should be sternly faithful to the work; but if he had been less minute, less reasonable or less conscientious to the snails, he never would have gained the power to influence this other man on the other side of the world, and through him to a degree the progress of thought itself in England.

Each act of ours goes out into the world as on an electric wire. You may never know who stands at the other end of the line, but some one is influenced thereby.—The Presbyterian.

Demand for India Rubber.

The cycle boom, which has given such an impetus to the rubber trade, may wax or it may wane—the former is the more likely—but the demand for India rubber will in all probability go on forever, like Tennyson's "Brook," only more so. Already every up-to-date caddy has his rubber-tired hansom, and in the silent time coming, when Jehu will manipulate a handle instead of driving a "gee," the motor cars and brakes and broughams will all be tired with rubber—if the supply holds out. For aught we know, the twentieth century oyster will hawk his vegetables from a rubber-tired motor barrow, and the trains roll along on rubber wheels. There isn't much doubt about the demand, but will the supply be equal to it? At present the bulk of imported rubber may be called "wild." It is collected in the forests and jungles. The cultivated plantations may almost be counted on one's fingers. In Chontales, Nicaragua, there is a small one, visited by the writer in Third Month last year. Mexico can boast of two or three, worked by American and English companies. A species of rubber tree (Manihot) has been introduced into India and Ceylon from its South American home, but it is not being cultivated, except on a small scale. In Brazil there are said to be a few plantations, but the produce from these is a mere drop in the ocean.

The outer tube of a cycle may be "Mbungu" rubber, from East, Central or West Africa; "Hulk," from Central America or Mexico; "Mangabeira" from Pernambuco; or it may have come from Madagascar or Borneo or Perak. But the inner tube is almost invariably made of the best Para rubber, obtained from various species of Hevea in the great forests which border the river Amazon and its many branches. Brazilian rubber gatherers go into the wood with proper utensils, comprising axes, bows, paddles, and a small stove. When a tree is discovered, circular incisions, extending from the branches to the ground, are made in the bark, and the white milk runs down the channels into a bowl at the bottom of the trunk. It is then poured over the blade of a paddle, held in the smoke of the stove, when the milk coagulates and forms the black rubber of commerce. The Huleros, or rubber gatherers of Nicaragua, generally Indians or Caribs, aim at getting rubber with as little trouble as possible. Instead of using bows they dig holes for the milk at the foot of the tree, and, in the happy-go-lucky Nicaraguan way, leave the necessary evaporation of water for nature to perform. Consequently rubber derived from the Castillona elastica in Central America is commonly mixed with grit, and is worth from sixpence to eightpence a pound less than Para rubber from Brazil.

It is in the systematic cultivation of rubber trees, however, that huge fortunes are to be made. The Mexican Minister to the United States calculates that each six-year old tree will have cost four-pence for land and cultivation, and will produce in its sixth year four pounds of rubber, worth two shillings fourpence per pound. Every year, for an indefinite time, the yield increases. In Nicaragua, where the writer has made a special study of the subject, a bounty of ten cents, native currency, is paid by the government for every tree planted, and land may be purchased at five shillings an acre. Each acre will bear one hundred and ninety-three trees, planted fifteen feet apart. But the trees should not be tapped until the eighth year, by which time, according to the writer's calculations, they will have cost nine-pence each, and will yield five pounds of rubber, worth eleven shillings eightpence, or fourteen shillings if the milk is gathered and coagulated as in Brazil. For the sake of convenience, let us value the rubber at two shillings per pound, and see what will be the profit on a plantation of one hundred acres. The land will cost £25; surveying, £20; clearing, £200; collecting seed and planting, £100; eight yearly weeding, at £40 each, £320; implements, £60; cost of living for eight years, at £50 per annum—ample in Nicaragua—£400; gathering the eighth year's crop, £300; total, £1,125.

Now for the profit. Government bounty on nineteen thousand three hundred trees, £252; produce at two shillings per pound, £9,550. Deduct the capital invested, and the net profit is £8,477. The average increase is one pound of rubber for each year of the tree's life, so that the ninth year's profit would be roughly, £9,870 the tenth, £11,500; the eleventh, £13,160; the twelfth, £14,800, and so on.

It is pretty clear that if the demand for rubber should continue to increase, and the area in cultivation were judiciously extended, the planter would soon be able to write himself down millionaire! At present the demand shows no sign of falling off. Quite the contrary. During 1895 the imports of rubber into the United Kingdom aggregated seventeen thousand and seventy-seven tons, of the value of £3,766,643. In the first five months of 1896 the imports increased by thirteen hundred tons, owing doubtless to the cycle boom.—London Evening Standard.

SLAVERY is a necessity of Mohammedan Arab life. The Zanzibar Arabs of Muscat, as well as the Egyptians and Turks, cannot exist without slaves. Family and social life is impossible without it in all Arabian countries.

Now, both slave boys and girls are hopelessly depraved. The immorality is such that probably not one quarter of those who die are replaced by slaves brought up in the household. Hence a perpetual supply of slaves is necessary, and that is the root of the slave trade.

We in England are attempting an impossibility. On the one hand, we uphold the state of Zanzibar, which is based on slavery. On the other, we attempt to put slavery down by our cruisers, and by perfectly futile legislation at Zanzibar and along the coast.

Slavery, in fact, is a minor department of the Arab question.—A Naturalist in Mid-Africa.

INDIA PAPER.—There are secrets in all trades and sometimes results are attained by barbarous peoples which the most civilized people can hardly imitate. The Book Review relates the following story of the India paper upon which some of the Oxford Bibles are printed:

"The marvelous Oxford India paper was first introduced in 1875. Since then it has revolutionized the Bible and prayer-book trade, and it is now used for all the more popular devotional books throughout the world. In the year 1841 an Oxford graduate is said to have brought home from the far East a small fold of extremely thin paper, which was manifestly more opaque and tough for its substance than any paper then manufactured in Europe. He presented it to the Clarendon press. The late Thomas Come, who had only recently been appointed printer to the university, found it to be just sufficient for twenty-four copies of the smallest Bible then in existence—diamond twenty-four mo.—and printed an edition of that number, which bore the date of 1842. The books were barely a third of the usual thickness, and although as much as one hundred dollars apiece was offered for them, no copies were sold, and they were presented to the queen and other distinguished persons.

All efforts to trace the paper to its sources were futile, and as years rolled on the circumstance was forgotten. But early in 1874 a copy fell into the hands of Arthur E. Miles, who showed it to Mr. Frowde, and experiments were at once set on foot at the Oxford university paper-mills, with the object of producing a similar paper. The first attempts were failures, but success was achieved, and Aug. 24th, 1875, an edition of diamond twenty-four mo. Bible, similar in all respects to the twenty-four copies printed in 1842, were placed on sale. This was the first Oxford Bible published by Mr. Frowde. The feat of compression was looked upon as astounding, the demand was enormous, and before long two hundred and fifty thousand copies had been sold. The paper when subjected to severe rubbing, instead of breaking into holes, assumed a texture resembling chamois leather, and a strip only three inches wide was found able to support a quarter of a hundredweight without yielding. The secret of its manufacture, it may be said, is known only to three living persons."

Assyriology and the Higher Criticism of the Pentateuch.

BY DUNLOP MOORE.

One of the grandest intellectual triumphs of the century now closing has been the deciphering of the cuneiform or arrow-headed characters, of which a few specimens were formerly known, but of which a vast literature has lately been discovered in the ruins of Nineveh and Babylon. At the opening of our century no one knew the value of a single cuneiform letter. How all the letters came to be deciphered is related in a very interesting chapter in Kauley's "Assyrian and Babylonian." One stands astonished at the labor and ingenuity which were at last crowned with complete success in the discovery of the significance of a long-forgotten alphabet. After the vowels and consonants had been found out, and the words could be spelled, what a task remained in endeavoring to understand the unknown language thus brought to light, and in translating its literature! This study is still in its youth. Yet it has yielded certain and valuable results.

There are, indeed, persons who refuse to believe that we dare put any confidence in the translations which Assyriologists have published. But a decisive proof can be furnished at such scepticism is not warranted. I give a proof as related in the admirable book of which I have already made mention. In the beginning of the year 1857, the well-known Assyrian scholars, Rawlinson, Hincks, Oppert and Talbot, happened all to be in London. At the suggestion of the last named the directors of the British Museum supplied each of the four with a lithographic copy of a long inscription of the Assyrian King, Tiglath-Pileser, of which they requested each to make an independent translation, in order by the result of this test to demonstrate the state of Assyrian investigation. After a month four sealed translations were put in the hands of the directors. These were opened at the regular session on the twenty-fifth of Fifth Month. They proved to be, in the main, in complete agreement. In details they varied in such a way as independent translations must do. Here was convincing evidence that Assyrian scholars were not altogether groping in the dark, but had reached substantial and trustworthy results.

Since 1857 Assyriology has made wonderful progress. And a comparison of the translations set forth by even the best Assyrian scholars makes it clear that there is still much play-room given to conjecture. There can, however, be no reasonable doubt that we have now much of the old Assyrian literature given to us in reliable versions. The Old Testament has received from it important illustrations and confirmations. It serves to confute effectually the assertion of a man like Sir F. Max Mueller, who in his recent Gifford lectures ventured to say that "there was no alphabetic writing before the seventh century B. C." and urged this alleged fact as a sufficient reason for holding that the Pentateuch could not have been written until many hundred years after Moses, specialists in the study of ancient Assyrian literature treat statements of this nature with contempt. They can point to written Assyrian documents, of which they are certain that they existed long before the age of Moses.

But we will not now attempt to show in detail the manifold apologetic use that can be made of the old Assyrian records that have been rescued from oblivion. I would here notice only a single point in which they are available or the vindication of the truth of Scripture.

Dr. A. H. Sayce, Professor of Assyriology in the University of Oxford, is a scholar who is remarkably free in criticising the Old Testament. His views of its inspirations are very far removed from orthodoxy. He has no hesitation about charging the sacred text with error when he thinks he sees any reason for doing so, though the reason may be of the flimsiest character. In his own way he does much to undermine the authority of sacred Scripture; and, therefore, what he writes ought to be read with caution. But Professor Sayce has become very decided in refusing to follow the now fashionable school of Graf and Wellhausen in making the Book of Genesis a patchwork of different documents that often contradict one another. In the Expository Times for Ninth Month he shows how his Assyriological studies compel him to reject the divisive hypothesis that the Jehovistic and Elohist portions of Genesis come from distinct sources. He has a conclusive argument against such an analysis of its contents. He calls attention to the resemblances between the Biblical account of the Deluge and the Babylonian story of the same catastrophe contained in the Epic of Gilgames which goes back to the age of Abraham.

In the July number of the Expository Times Dr. Sayce furnished a translation of this Babylonian story of the Flood. The resemblances between it and Genesis (vi. 8), are so close and numerous that they cannot be regarded as altogether independent accounts. Sayce would make the writer of the biblical narrative to have been acquainted with the Babylonian story, and to have intentionally purged it of its mythological elements, and to have made other alterations. But it is far better to consider both accounts dependent on a common tradition current among the descendants of Noah in early times. The one gives this original tradition in its purity; the other gives it blended with Babylonian mythology. The differences between the two accounts of the Deluge are still more marked than their resemblances. The Babylonian account is grossly polytheistic. Gods "like flies" are represented as surrounding the hero Xisuthros, when he, like Noah, offered sacrifice after his wonderful preservation from the Flood that destroyed the world, and the great gods of Babylonia are pictured as contending with each other. But I will not stop to note here in detail all the striking points of agreement and difference between Genesis and the Epic of Gilgames in the description of the Deluge. Suffice it to say that Sayce reckons twenty distinct resemblances between the Babylonian Epic and what the divisive critics call the Elohist narrative of the Flood in Genesis. He indicates also seven points common to the same Epic and the portions of the account of the Deluge assigned by the same critics to the Jehovistic writer in Genesis. What formed one continuous story in the patriarchal age could not have had this unity first given to it, as the critics allege, by a compiling editor in the fifth century B. C. This, in brief, is his contention against the divisive critics.

But let me content myself with quoting here the summing up of Prof. Sayce: "We have seen that the resemblances between the Babylonian and the Biblical accounts are not confined to the so-called Elohist or Jehovistic parts of the Biblical narrative, but extend to the whole of it. We cannot suppose, however, that two Hebrew writers sat down to copy the same Babylonian original, the one agreeing to select what the other omitted, and that their versions were afterwards dovetailed together; nor can we assume that the author of the Babylonian Epic who flourished in the time of Abraham, had the Biblical version before him in its present shape. The only other alternative seems to be that the division of the Biblical text into an Elohist and a Jehovistic document is a philological mirage. And if it is a mirage in the account of the Deluge, where the marks of separate authorship appear to be clearer than anywhere else in the Pentateuch, it must be still more a mirage elsewhere. With the collapse of the literary analysis of the narrative of the Deluge, the whole fabric of the literary analysis of the Pentateuch falls to the ground. And yet there seems no escape from the archeological conclusion." For his plain speaking Sayce has drawn on himself the fierce wrath of the radical critics.

I understand that the celebrated Assyriologist, Prof. Fr. Hommel, agrees with Prof. Sayce in regarding the ancient Assyrian literature as utterly antagonistic to the principles of the school of Wellhausen, and that he is now engaged in preparing an attack from this side on the Copy-plains of the destructive criticism of the Pentateuch.—The Presbyterian.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 14, 1896.

The subscription list of a periodical like THE FRIEND, which is continued from year to year, must, naturally, experience many changes. Its older subscribers, who have for years derived information, instruction and encouragement from its columns, and thus learned to value its weekly visits, gradually pass away from earth. Others, through business changes, feel no longer able to pay the annual subscription, and desire their names to be taken from the list. It is evident, therefore, that if such a paper is to be successfully continued, there must be new subscribers in place of those who drop out.

The main object in the publication of THE FRIEND is the religious welfare of the Society of Friends, and especially of its own subscribers. We feel, therefore, that we may properly appeal to Friends in different localities to interest themselves in the task of increasing the number of its subscribers. There is one class of persons who ought especially to be looked after, and that is young married people, who, on entering into housekeeping, might be much benefited by having THE FRIEND for a regular visitor, calling their attention from week to week, to the most important of all subjects—their religious interests—and at the same time giving such an amount of general information as may keep the intellect profitably employed.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 3rd inst. the McKim and Hobart electors obtained a majority of votes in probably 25 States (Wyoming being in some doubt), which have 250 electoral votes out of a total of 447. The popular majority for the successful candidates is thought to be a million.

The United States Treasury gold reserve at the close of business on the 7th instant had increased to $120,340,586. The net increase at New York for the day was $872,000. The withdrawals were $35,700.

A Washington despatch says that more gold is being poured into several of the Sub-Treasuries than the offices have storage capacity for or have legal tender currency to give in exchange.

The Sub-Treasury refuses to take back the gold withdrawn before election, the directors forcing it into the banks and facilitating its general use. The Treasury's gold reserve, however, is likely to show marked increase from this time on. Depositors in savings banks are rushing to put back the money withdrawn in the pre-election scare.

President Tilden, on the 7th inst. the New York Savings Bank, says that between Seventh, Ninth, 1st and Tenth Mo. 31st, the savings-banks of New York city net $58,000,000 and received $26,000,000. The excess of withdrawals was $12,000,000. Since the election the deposits have exceeded the withdrawals.

General Fitzhugh Lee, Consul General, stationed in Havana, arrived in Washington on the 5th inst. with a budget of important information for the Government.

J. Sterling Morton, Secretary of Agriculture, in an interview, says: "What we want is a Commission, non-partisan, composed of business men and scholars, to go over the whole question of currency, and make an annual report for our use, and that would take the question of currency and tariff out of politics, and the country would be much better off."

The Woman Suffrage amendment in Idaho seems to have secured a majority of votes cast on the question. The State Board has held that a man is not a participant in the election if he is not a citizen, and the Supreme Court will probably be appealed to to decide the matter.

A despatch from The Dalles, Oregon, says that the Government locks around the Cascades, in Columbia River, have been opened. The locks have been under construction for about three years and cost over $3,500,000.

A Charleston, S. C., despatch says that arrangements have been perfected between the William Johnson & Co. (Limited), Steamship Co., of Liverpool, and the South Carolina and Georgia Railway Co., to establish a line of steamers between Charleston, Liverpool and London for the purpose.

The American Grocer says: "It is estimated that twenty-two acres of land are necessary to sustain one man on fresh meat. The same space of land, if devoted to wheat culture, would feed 42 people; if to oats, 88; potatoes, Indian corn and rice, 176, and if to the plantain or bread rice, over 600 people." The Galveston says that Galveston is fertilizing itself on its change from a shallow water to deep water port. The painful and expensive lighterage business is now falling into disuse and great ships are loading at the wharves. The Galveston News says the ship Apogee, the largest of her class all at, recently took the largest cargo ever taken from an American port. The Apogee's cargo consisted of 104,000 bushels of grain, 200 tons of cottonseed oil cake, several cars of logs and lumber, 300 tons of pig lead and an splitter, and 18,200 bales of cotton. "The cotton alone exceeded any cargo ever taken from Galveston."

The Atlanta (Ga.) Journal says: "The Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute has become one of the most famous schools for the education of the negro, and its President, Dr. P. Washington, is recognized by the school head of the ablest leaders of the negro race. The school had a very busy beginning fifteen years ago. Today the Institute owns 2300 acres of fine land, 27 buildings, some of which represent large expenditure, 265 head of live stock, an abundant supply of wagons, locomotives, &c. The total value of the property is nearly $1,000,000. For the year ended May 31, 1896, the income of the Institute was $27,716, donations from various sources making up $62,835 of the amount. The number of students in attendance was 867. Besides the academic department, there are twenty-five industrial departments, where practical instruction is given in carpentry, brick-making, agriculture, shoemaking in Vermont. The rest of books given by the State, also the expenses of the Library Commission, is placed at only about $6,000.

The Peabody Museum, at Yale, has recently secured a specimen of high geological value. It shows vermiculate footprints in the Devonian formation less than 100 years, or even less, than the Devonian, higher than that of fishes. The footprint best preserved is about 4 inches in length and 2 1/2 in width, and was apparently made by the left hind foot. It was found in Warren County, Pennsylvania, by Dr. Charles E. Beecher, of the Peabody Museum, who has presented it to the Institute.

FOREIGN.—The new Lord Mayor of London, George Fandel Phillips, was formally installed on the 9th instant. The procession was more gorgeous than usual. At the banquet in the Guild Hall in the evening, Lord Salisbury, replying to a speech by Ambassador Bayard, said that he believed that the controversy between Great Britain and America on the Venezuelan question was at an end.

The London Spectator remarks: "Some Victoria has not only outreigned all the sovereigns of Europe who were on the throne when she succeeded, but she has also outreigned all the emperors and kings of the world. She has been contemporary with five sovereigns in Prussia four in Russia, and two in Austria. In the case of France she has seen the reign of Louis Philippe, the Republic of 1848, the Empire and the Republic of 1870. In the internal affairs of England she has witnessed little less than a revolution. When she was first proclaimed she was virtually no ways. Now there is hardly a village without a station within three or four miles of it. But perhaps the greatest change of all is in the condition of the people. Sixty years ago the man with £1 a week was exceptionally fortunate. Now £1 a week is getting to be regarded as the normal rate of wages. And yet sixty years ago the purchasing power of £1 for a man who drank tea and smoked was about half what it is now.

Consul Muth, of Magdeburg, reports to the State Department an abnormal sugar beet crop, almost equaling the unprecedented yield of 1894. In Austria and France, as well as other European countries, the crop even this year has been very good. In some districts the quality is inferior. This is apt to offset the falling off in Utah to some extent.

The ancient copper mines of Sinai have been re-explored. These were worked by the Egyptians, or their slaves, thousands of years ago, and are believed to have been abandoned about 3,000 years ago. A great deal of the best copper is now in England. The Birmingham Mint recently received a large order from the Russian Government for copper coins. The total number of coins required is over seventy millions. The coins, which consist of three, two, one, half, and quarter kopeck pieces, are already being struck.

These are they which come out of the great tribulation, and they washed their robes, and made them white, in the blood of the Lamb." On the twenty-fifth day of Tenth Month, 1896, in his seventy-sixth year, MILTON CARTER, a member of Spring River Monthly Meeting, Kansas. The deceased was born in Guilford County, N. He removed with his parents in 1829, to Hendricks Co., Ind. where he married and lived until 1868, when he removed with his family to Cherokee Co., Kans., where he was a useful member in society during the early setting of that State. He was from his boyhood a lover of the truth, and always endeavored to live a Christian life wholly acceptable unto God. He has been declining in strength for several months, but realized his true end, and resigned to God, on the 25th of the present month. He was a true man, and he felt that his work on earth was ended. He was conscious to the last, and although weak, talked little and gently as his life was passing away. As his relative and friends gathered round his bed to watch him in his passing moments, a heavenly covering came over the company as if, apparently, without a pain or a struggle, quietly passed away, and his spirit returned to God who gave him.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1863.—Eleventh Month 8th.—My Lord and my God, if I could only bathe thy feet with my ears this night it would be some relief. Much of the past week has been spent in a feeling of umble dedication, but yesterday afternoon I awoke up to one thing almost thoughtlessly, then another and another, till sin had dominion over me. I repented and have a sense of pardon. Yet in this morning's meeting my soul was exceedingly sorrowful. This afternoon the love of my Saviour returned, and I have commenced my dedication anew. Thou, oh Lord, knowest how to strengthen me; be merciful yet longer, shall I ever be made pure? My heart would all did I not believe to see thy goodness "in the end of the living."

15th.—I can thankfully acknowledge to being enabled to overcome to a considerable degree during the past week, but oh! for a more thorough abandonment to all the Lord's will. Reason urges that if I keep too quiet I cannot accomplish so much in school, and I shall fall in disgrace and the children not learn so much; but the voice of the Lord says, "Bow down and obey me." I can prosper, or blast by endeavors. Thou O Lord givest strength, and my soul is prostrate before thee, desiring to out all things as loss that I may win thee. Fold my hand and help me to be faithful and allow thee.

22nd.—Oh! that I could keep quiet enough to feel the power of God all the time. Oh! burn up my chaff, dearest Father, with thy unquenchable fire. Samuel Dyer says, "As for me Divine Life, I have this remark to make, that I should grow more in it, were I but more in the stillness, even until the whole birth of me Son of God was brought forth in my soul. Be still therefore, O all that is within me and know the Lord's strength and power to arise." Is not this what I want? I cannot be free until I pay the uttermost farthing.

30th.—I feel, oh my Lord, that thou art the true vine, and that I am a branch. How I long to bow down continually and feel the living sap from thee on and in my spirit.

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Twelfth Month 23rd, 1861.

"I have been particularly comforted this day by the text, 'The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ and the love of God and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all.' This heart full of love to God and this communion and acceptance and presence of good, is sweeter than 'honey and the honeycomb.'

"And dearest L., thou dost not know how my heart goes out to thee always when I taste these comforts and I find myself saying in thought: Oh! if Laura could only feel this; and a silent aspiration does arise for thy instruction, comfort and encouragement. I have sympathized so much with thee since receiving thy last letter, it is very sweet and pleasant to hear some of thy assertions, but not surprising, for I seemed to think they were thine before. Those 'minor' testimonies thou mentions, may not be binding on all, or may not be necessary to salvation for some. Thou mayest know that Friends' dress was the fashionable one at one time and the world left us, and we followed not! It has often been instructive to me, while thinking on this subject to see how many of our former powerful and divinely favored ministers have been led into this particular dress before obtaining entire peace to their souls. Come out from among them and be ye separate, etc., doubtless sounded in their (spiritual) ears.

"E. W.'s case came before our meeting yesterday; it did make me feel sad, but why should I? if she has the true spiritual communion and union with the Eternal Blessed One? I feel much love for her. How sweet it is to think we have the one All-seeing Judge.

"Dear K. W.! How it makes us want to extend the hand of love and fellowship to any new babe in Christ. My heart often enlarges in secret prayer for a blessing on some of you, and how I feel the need of watching my own steps. Oh! that I might scatter some good seed and none bad. I am so frail, but Christ is our all-sufficiency.

"May the 'God of all peace, comfort, establishment, strengthen, settle thee' in his own good time and way, which is best and must be waited for cheerfully is my soul's wish for thee.

"D. B."

Twelfth Mo. 27th.—Have I prepared myself to do thy whole will? I pray thee, oh Father, to take away the least remains of hesitation. Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for sacrifice? Thou knowest my whole heart and how I walk before thee, and how much I need to humble me.

1864.—First Month 10th.—Dearest Father, what a mercy that thou hast brought me thus far. Show me plainly what I need more to dedicate myself entirely to thee. Thou hast indeed thrown "the horse and his rider" these three days past, and O Lord is it thyself I truly worship or is it my own honor? is it thy presence I feel or am I deceived when I try to feel communion with thee. Help me to seek thine honor in everything I do. Grant, oh Lord, what I sigh and cry for so much, even that I may become thy living child.

Second Month 7th.—"Thou that trust in the Lord, shall be as Mount Zion, which can never be removed, but abideth forever," etc., was quoted this afternoon. Oh! I have this trust, but have I pure obedience in all things, a constant and faithful watching to be without any sin? Lord, hold thou me up or I shall altogether sink into discouragement. Strengthen me and save me or I fall forever. I did not always walk uprightly before Him this week, and to-day I am so very sad. Thy mercy does indeed endure forever, for I feel a little pardoned.

14th.—Some stains upon my garment this week. When shall I be so changed that I would rather suffer than put forth my hand to take one forbidden indulgence, even just a little of it. Gird me with strength and with a girdle of faithfulness. How happy should I then be in thee O Lord, my Redeemer.

21st.—I am not much better, but trying to bind myself with cords of love to his holy altar whatever He may require. Empty me of myself and fill me with thy Spirit.

28th.—Oh Lord! what shall I say. Thou knowest my struggling, my turning away from temptation and my falls also. I come humbly to thee for strength to overcome.

Third Month 6th.—Been almost sick much of the week and have not kept to the cross strictly, but thought I felt such light, joy, peace and communion this morning, as my soul had desired so long, when a Friend arose with the words, "Brethren my heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is that they might be saved." Could it be that I was deceived in my joy? It was so sweet. Still I feel that I have not wholly submitted to all of God's commands. I will try to be silent and put my mouth in the dust with thy help, oh Lord.

12th.—I have not continually felt that deep contrition of soul which I so long for. Oh! for greater humility and dedication. Help me, oh Lord, in school to remember thee. Wash and dip me in Jordan more and more.

TO L. H. B.

"Third Month 24th, 1864.

"M. A. Loyd was at our meeting on Thursday, and in her communication quoted that beautiful portion of Revelation, chap. vii. v. 14. It never seemed so sweet to me before. Through all the love of God has always seemed so great to me, and his mercy marvellous, which I esteem a favor. It has been a favor to realize that my nature needed so much purification and not to be left hard-hearted. Still there is much more wanted to make me a living child of God—my heart's desire and prayer and cry for years.

"How much I desire to be more watchful, dwelling in spirit with Him continually, for as the apostle says, 'Absent in the body, but present with the Lord. This is not easily attained; we cannot do it ourselves and last night's prayers and cries on this point seemed answered, for to-night cheerfulness covers my soul, for his merciful help. How useless it seems to think we can do anything of ourselves, it is only as we rest continually in Him. Oh! to be able to put my mouth in the dust before Him, always to dwell low in spirit.

"Sometimes thy poor friend has been enabled to feel Him in his holy temple, and could almost join the seraphim in saying, 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts; the whole earth is full of his glory.'

"No wonder thou has enjoyed thy country home so much. To the heart attuned aright these scenes are full of melody; they always speak thus to me when alone in silence with them and my God. Thy communiings at the evening hour by the window must at times be very sweet, and I hope thou art often strengthened and refreshed by his living presence." He is our "balm of Gilead." May we seek for it more ardently, and may it be poured forth as ointment upon us.

"Thine truly,

"D. B."

Fourth Month 3rd.—Dwelt in a good degree under the cross and in silence this week, and am thankful to feel so little condemnation to-night. Thou knowest all my sorrows, oh Lord, lead me in a plain path.

JUDGING MEN AND JUDGING ACTS.—There is a difference between right and wrong, and guilt and innocence. The standards of right and wrong are permanent; the standards of personal guilt and innocence are relative, dependent on one's knowledge and circumstances. We are to bear this in mind in forming our judgment of men who have been prominent in political and literary history. Just now the literary world is paying a tribute to Robert Burns, the centennial of whose death recently occurred. That Burns was a man of generous instincts, with many fine impulses, with a hearty indignation at falsehood and wrong, with many temptations, with a poetic genius that has rarely been surpassed, and that, in our estimate of him, there should be mingled a large element of pity and sympathy, no one will deny. On the other hand, that he had no governing and guiding principles to restrain him from wrong-doing, that the tendency of his life and writings, as a whole, was to lower the standard of morality, that his genius was used to make passion and drunkenness more attractive, that his life was a warning rather than an example, can as little be denied. In one of his letters he says, "I knoved down before the Father of mercies, and said, 'Father, I have sinned, and am no more worthy to be called thy son.'" This gives ground for the hope that he was a sincere penitent, but we should see to it that our hope and the depth and tenderness of our pity do not prevent us from cautioning the young to avoid the follies and vices which made his life a wreck. As to a sinner's guilt or innocence, as God sees his spirit and purpose, we should refrain from judging. As to the conformity of his conduct to our standards of right and wrong, we are entitled to judge and to speak.—N. S. Times.

Of all the great comforts and causes of happiness among the rich, the greatest are those which they have to share with the poor. Rail-roads, street cars, pavements, sewerage, well-lighted streets, and pure water must be for all or for none.—S. Lect.

The Rest That Remaineth to the People of God.

We are come to the fold of eternal rest, where Christ Jesus is the chief shepherd; He is the shepherd and bishop of our souls, that feedeth his flock with living bread that nourishes us to life eternal. He hath called us by his name and put us forth; He feedeth us in green pastures and we are fed with hidden manna, and lie down at noon with his gathered flock. Out of nations, kindreds, multitudes and people we are redeemed to God, and are come out of the world, out of the great Babylon, and out of spiritual Sodom and Egypt, where the Lord Christ was and is crucified, and lieth slain to this day. Atop of the world has the Lord set us, on the mountain of his own house and dwelling, where we behold and feel the life and glory and crown of the world that hath no end; and the world that hath an end is seen over, and its crown and glory are his footstool that reigns among us.

As for all that which this perishing world brings forth, which men seek after only, it is reckoned our temptation, though all the sons of Adam are seeking its glory, its riches, its crowns, its contentments. But of that birth are we which hath no crown, no glory, no rest under the sun; a birth is brought forth [in] us which is heir to another kingdom, and possessor of another crown, whose glorying is in the Lord all the day long, and He is our refuge, our rock and our fortress against all our enemies.

What though the wicked arm themselves, and the ungodly bend their bow? What though all sorts of people * * * exalt themselves against the despised people of the Lord's inheritance, who, for his name's sake are killed all the day long? What though the wise men bring forth their arguments, and the rulers bring forth unrighteous judgments against the seed that God hath blessed? What though the revilers and scorners open their mouths, and reproachers and revilers cast out bitter words as a flood against the remnant of the woman's seed that hath long been fled into the wilderness? And what if the teachers, the prophets, and the elders, and the heads and wise men of the world, set themselves to pray and preach and print against the chosen seed of Jacob? Notwithstanding all this—though this is to come to pass, and hell open her mouth and her floods break forth to overflow and be much more increased—yet shall the King of righteousness rule among his people, and his presence will not forsake his chosen ones.

The Lord is with us, a mighty and a terrible one, and the shout of a king is amongst us; the dread of the Almighty covereth us, and it goeth before us, and compasseth us about, and the Lord is working a work in the earth, mighty and wonderful. He is gathering the scattered and binding up the broken-hearted; his people shall dwell in safety, and none shall make them afraid; no weapon that is formed against them shall prosper, nor any hand that is lifted up shall prevail. For Zion shall arise out of the dust, her beautiful garments shall be put on, and mourning and sorrow shall flee away. Her light is risen that is everlasting, and the sun shall never go down; but his day shall remain forever, and the night shall not again cover her brightness nor the sun set upon her habitations.—E. Burrough.

Look well to your motives.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Divine Revelation.

The Psalmist writes, "I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made; marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well" (Ps. cxxxix, 14).

Of all God's works, known to man, none is more marvellous than man himself. Possessed of a body, mind and spirit, each in its sphere is beyond compare. Man submeth all things to himself, for God his Maker has put all earthly things beneath his feet. His body, formed of the dust of the earth, and apparently so defenceless, becomes under the control of the mind's power, a marvel of strength and might. His mind expanding with years, investigates not only things perceptible to the senses, but the laws that govern both matter and mind, and exploring the depths of science, marks the relations and affinities of all things to each other. But what shall we say of man's spirit? It links him, though mortal, with the world of spirits eternity, and Him who dwells and reigns there. There is a law written on man's heart which is none other than the law of God. Sin is the transgression of that law, and as all have sinned, God not alone makes manifest what is sin to men, but all men have partaken of that sin, by that law are guilty, and God makes this guilt also to be felt and seen of men. This is without doubt a revelation of the Divine will to man, and it will be soon enough for any man to deny that God either reveals himself or his Divine will to man, when such a one feels within himself that he neither knows of such a law within himself, nor that he did ever experience condemnation for sin. But if thou, dear reader art a sincere seeker after God and his truth thou must acknowledge having felt these smitings for sin in thy conscience, nor does man confine this judgment to his own thoughts or deeds, but places those of others in the same balance, weighing relative right and wrong.

The judgments of this law read aright we call truth, of which one truth is that nothing is made without a maker. Now, a law implies a higher power outside of that wherein that law is, it implies a kingdom wherein some ruler reigns, and to observe and to obey that law is to love and serve that ruler. This law then, of right or wrong, found in every heart, has a maker, and that Maker is none other but God who made man and all things.

Since God then, by his law, does thus manifest his will and displeasure against sin in man's heart, and thus reveals his own will to man wherefore, O man, wilt thou refuse to believe that He still further reveals his omnipotent will to such men as sincerely desire to come into harmony with the will of their King, and so come into possession of a pure and good conscience before God?

It is all of God's unmerited mercy, that since man died, God again made known to man, concerning his former happy estate and hope, and again so far revealed to man this Divine purpose and will, as to hold out to man a promise by which man might hope again to come into that life, immortality and image of God, which through transgression of the law, man lost though through sin, far removed from the royal throne, yet having that law still written on the heart, it becomes to us an evidence that we are yet amenable to the law of his kingdom. It beyond doubt also makes plain that as God revealed to our first parents the consequence which must inevitably follow the breaking of that Divine law, so also since He even yet manifests his displeasure against sin in the heart, but therefore God does not reveal his will and himself to man, and this is Divine revelation. This law all men have, and every man shall be judged according to that law. As Eve stood in stricken and condemned, God in his love and compassion to man, gave to her, as the representative of the church of God, a promised deliverer in her seed, which Seed is Christ, the first born of the Church, who should bruise the head of the seed of the serpent. And from the beginning, even to this day, that church has existed, composed of poor sinners, washed and redeemed from sin, in whom God is pleased to manifest his will, his power, and his glory. In her early ages men saw these things from afar, and distant as it were, but with the dawning of the light came power, and through faith and power did they overcome sin, and obtain the promise of that eternal life, the gift of God to man, through his Son. For as the first dawn of day dispels the darkness, so did this appearance of God in the hearts of men dispel the power of the kingdom of darkness and of death; and long ere the sun is risen is there light sufficient to do our daily work, so God demands obedience according to the measure of his grace given, and graciously rewards man according to that obedience. Yet is it all of grace, the work is God's, and "we are his workmanship created in Christ Jesus, unto good works which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them."

To us then in these latter days hath the Sun of Righteousness arisen in its full glory, for God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face (i. e., the appearance), of Jesus Christ "2 Cor. iv: 6).

We then have now entered into thatfulness of blessing, which the Lord, by prophets, by his son and by apostles, promised, this glorious dispensation of the Gospel of Christ, wherein "all shall be taught of God" as Adam was before his fall, wherein all may become sons and daughters of God, taught, led and guided by the spirit of God, coming into the spirit, life and power of God's blessed Son, and through Him drinking of the well of life, and eating of Him the tree of life planted in the paradise of God.

For this the Apostle Paul prayed on behalf of the Ephesians, "that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of Him" (Eph. i: 17). And as, believing, any come to Jesus, and through the power of faith, walk in the light of Christ, which comes from Him, their eyes shall be enlightened, their hearts and understanding opened, and they shall know "what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints" (eighteenth verse.)

This is Divine revelation, and it becomes us to patiently wait upon and watch for the revealings of God's will, that we may be doers of that will, and so enter into and hold our inheritance in the kingdom of God, "which is righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost."

Lost in Settle Mountain Wilds.

For six days four-year-old Emma Nelson, of Susunville, wandred alone on a mountain where the roar of the bear and screams of the panther are heard nightly. On six evenings, as the sun disappeared in the west, she made a couch beneath some giant oak and lay down to sleep, the awful noises of the forest sounding in her ears a wild lullaby.

The little one is safe at home now, found and returned after a weary search by scores of men in the mountains; and that she was spared from death is regarded by the simple mountain folk as miraculous. Verily, there is One who watches over the weakest of his flock.

Little Emma is a rosy-cheeked miss, with bright blue eyes and dimpled hands and chin. She lives with her parents at Susunville. Her papa is the village postmaster.

Not far from the little one's humble home are the stately, snow-capped Blue Mountains. From the summits of snow of the highest peaks the view is enchanting and extends into three States. Off to the North is Washington, to the east Idaho, and all around Oregon. Away to the north the great Columbia River winds itself like a silvery thread, now through fertile valleys and now through sandy wastes, where sandstorms strong enough to interfere with railroad traffic sometimes occur.

The country is of wild aspect, and the mountain fastnesses hold many a secret of the doings of Indians in days long passed, of prospectors who never returned to their homes, and of cattle thieves who were dealt with according to the primitive law of the land.

The people of Susunville gave a picnic over a week ago in a grove in the foothills of the Blue Mountains. It did not differ from other picnics. There were sports for the children and lots of good things to eat, and the simple mountain people had a merry day of it. When the people were ready to start for home little Emma was nowhere to be found. There was no trace of her from early in the afternoon, when her six year-old brother saw her going in the direction of Settle Mountain, gathering the wild flowers as she went. "Settle Mountain!" exclaimed the country folk in horror. It is the most dangerous peak in the entire range, and is the stamping ground of bears and cougars.

"She'll never be found alive," was the verdict of the hardy mountaineers, as they shook their heads doubtfully.

All that night and for several days and nights afterward men searched the mountain fastnesses for the lost one. Their hearts failed within them when the stillness of the night was broken by the vicious growl of the cougar, and when in daytime they saw numerous bears feeding at the berry bushes. In the afternoon of the sixth day the searching party came upon a clump of weeping willows, by which passed a small stream. Not one of the searchers had the slightest idea of finding the little one alive. Little Willie was riding in front of his father on a horse, which was accustomed to rough travel in the mountains.

"Papa," said the boy, "if my little sister isn't dead, I think she is not far from that stream. She loves to sit near the river and make bouquets of the wild flowers that she gathers."

As the party neared the clump of brush —, Nelson was startled to hear a voice say: "Hello, papa; I have been looking for you ever so long."

Nelson clasped his child in his arms and hugged her as no father ever hugged a child before.

"I knew I was lost, papa," the little one said, "but I was so sure I would meet my papa that I kept on walking."

Emma told the searchers that she had made a complete circuit of Settle Mountain, having travelled nine miles. How she escaped the cougars and bears is a mystery. She slept wherever she could find a resting place and subsisted on berries and the flesh of a calf which had been killed by a coyote.

The little girl said she was frightened only once while in the mountains. That was on her third day out. She awoke that morning on the edge of a precipitous cliff. The big fir trees in the valley a thousand feet below looked like walking-canes. Had she made the slightest move during her sleep she would have rolled off the cliff.—Late Paper.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

[Isaac Hayes, to whom the supposed paper refers, was a valuable Elder in the Society of Friends, who belonged to the Western Quarterly Meeting. During the troubles growing out of the doctrines advanced by Elias Hicks, a large share of exercise and labor fell on his portion.]

SOME OBSERVATIONS MADE BY ISAAC HAYES OF FALLOWFIELD, NINTH MO. 27TH, 1844, ABOUT A WEEK BEFORE HIS DEATH.

The short time I was with him, in company with S. L., (whom I found there), he said much. His mind seemed wonderfully clothed with Heavenly raptures in contemplating that world of glory into which he felt a full assurance he would soon be permitted to enter.

He said, "I feel desirous to relate to you, if I can have strength to do so without being too much overcome, a circumstance which lately transpired, and which I look upon as a vision of Light, which in marvellous mercy has been permitted or sent to assure me that the prayers of my soul have been accepted; and that there is indeed a place prepared for my immortal part." He then proceeded, "While rolling to and fro, on this bed of pain, knowing not where to turn or what to do, for it seemed as if the very pains of death could not be harder to endure, when all at once I was perfectly at ease; not a pain, nor an uneasy thought; all seemed hushed into profound silence; and while in the most rapturous and heavenly condition I ever experienced; there appeared right before me a little bird like a dove, of the most beautiful plumage I ever beheld—indeed I never saw anything in my life at all fit to compare with it. It stood beautifully erect before me, perfectly straight, not a wrinkle, not a shade of anything but loveliness appearing, and while I viewed it, it became much larger and taller, but no less beautiful, and I followed it to the gate of a beautiful city. The Porter was there; he opened not the gate, but informed me I was not at present to enter, but that I might look and behold the beauty of that city, not one of whose inhabitants can say, I am sick; and that shortly I shall be joined to that innumerable company dwelling within its sacred enclosure, whose walls are salvation and her gates praise. I fully believe that the beautiful bird represented the Almighty, and the Porter, my Saviour Jesus-Christ. And I have faith to believe that shortly all will be realized which has been thus mercifully shown to me, as I feel no condemnation within, and my whole man seems almost entirely swallowed up in love to my Maker and to my fellow man—and why I should be thus detained here I know not, but no doubt it is for some wise purpose."

"On coming away, he bade me an affectionate farewell, and calmly added, "I shall never see thy face again."

Struggle for Life Among the Plants.

The vegetation of Eastern British East Africa consists of eight or nine floras, which are so different from one another that it is difficult to discover any features which characterize the flora as a whole. The severity of the struggle for existence in this region, however, is shown by a few plants that may be worthy of remark.

The first characteristic of the flora that impresses itself upon one—and it does so in a very pointed and unpleasant manner, is its prickliness. Some plants seem to consist of nothing but a collection of prickles; these are developed on every part of the plant, on the stem, stalks, flowers and seeds, while the leaves are often reduced to a few needles. The thorns and prickles help the plant in nearly every stage of life; for they scatter the seeds by clinging to the fur of passing animals, they protect the plant against animals that would devour it, and in some cases obtain for the plant the food it requires from the air. Some of the plants have the prickles arranged in a very ingenious way; thus the "wait-a-bit" thorn (the Wach-ein-but of the Dutch settlers of the Cape), has hooks pointing in opposite directions, so that a jerk backward to disentangle clothes caught by them, only impales them all the more firmly on another set. In some cases, as if thorns were not sufficiently formidable, ants burrow into their bases; the plant increases the growth of tissue to bury the invaders, and thus the base of the spine is enlarged into a woody bulb, capable of inflicting a nasty wound. Most of the succulent plants are protected by an abundant crop of thorns and spikes. Some of them have broad leaves with edges spiked like a saw; another species has bayonet-shaped leaves, which end in a point so hard and sharp that it goes through leather as easily as through paper.

The leaves in this "nkonge," as the Zanzibari call it, are placed opposite one another in a plane which, by a peculiarly malicious arrangement, is twisted into a spiral. Hence from whatever side these "chevaux de frise" be charged the unlucky traveller only plunges on to the prickles; and this happens with aggravating frequency when chasing wounded game through the scrub in the dim light of early dawn.

Another type of defence extensively adopted consists of circles of stout hairs pointing downwards, which prevent the more simple-minded of the ants from reaching and robbing the flowers. Nearly all the grasses are provided with these spiked collars, for their farinaceous seeds are especially attractive to ants. In many of the flowering plants the same purpose is effected by having the leaves placed in opposite pairs with their bases, "connate," or growing together to form a cup, as in the English teal; in the rainy sea-on, when alone the plant is in flower, this cup is filled with water, and this natural moat prevents crawling insects from reaching the coveted stores of honey and pollen.

The method of reducing the waste of seeds in a plant by their germination on the parent is not unknown among our English plants, and cases occur more frequently in the upper meadows or Alps of Switzerland. In Africa this "viviparity" is very extensively adopted. The case of the mangrove has already been quoted, but the method is used in the plants of the "Nyika" in an opposite manner; for in these the leaves act as a kind of parachute, and scatter the young plants broadcast before the wind, instead of restricting them to a narrow belt.

The action of the wind in moulding the forms of trees is well shown in the open plains of East Africa. The few timber trees that occur there are, like the baobab, fixed by trunks of enormous bulk, so that the wind acting on the leafless branches, has but little power over them.

In other cases the leaves are narrow and spiny, and the branches expand in flat horizontal sheets, which present only their narrow edges to the wind. In none of these cases does the upper portion of the tree give the wind much leverage by which to overthrow it. The smaller trees are also shaped by the same agency.

The acacias, which form most of the scrub, are low and flat-topped, expanding above like an umbrella. This form is apparently acquired as a protection against the tornadoes that sweep over them. The shape is not much used on an isolated tree, for the wind can then get underneath the branches and tend to wedge it up; but these trees usually grow packed together, and their flat tops form a surface over which the storms sweep with little effect.

It is no doubt also as a protection against the wind that, as if to atone for the leaflessness of the trees, the flowering plants are woody. Thus on the plateaux we have to look for the main masses of blossom, not to the turf on the meadows, but to the clumps of shrubs.—J. W. Gregory.

OUR BOSTON TEAMSTERS.—During the hot spell of Eighth Month, it was with a distinct feeling of pleasure that I noticed on Tremont Street a horse, drawing a heavy wagon, with a damp sponge fastened between his ears, as recommended by the M. S. P. C. A. Being on a car, I failed to see the name on the wagon, but I did notice the driver, a good-looking, brown-faced fellow, in a straw hat and checked shirt. After ten years of business experience in this country, in many cities, which has brought me into contact, with teamsters constantly, I feel bound to say, that nowhere but in Boston have I found men whose work it is to handle draught horses, who seemed to consider their horses' interests identical with their own. Whenever I see a team of four or six horses in Boston, I instinctively glance at the driver, and in every case find him to be a good-looking, temperate, clean fellow, to be classed with our firemen and policemen. A better representative class of men than our Boston teamsters could not be found in our country. It is a trifling piece of work to place a damp sponge or cloth on a horse's head in such weather as we have just experienced, but one's heart goes out to the driver of a horse so equipped.—Daily Evening Transcript.

POLL IS ALWAYS ON THE ALERT.—One of Uncle Sam's most faithful servants in Maine, but one that draws no salary, lives at the Portland Head Lighthouse. It is a large gray parrot, brought from Africa some time ago, and presented to the keeper of the light. The bird soon noticed that when the fog began to blow in from the ocean somebody would cry out: "Fog coming; blow the horn!" One day the fog suddenly began to come in thick, and the men did not notice it. But Poll did, and croaked out: "Fog coming; blow the horn!" Ever since then, whenever fog is perceptible, Poll never fails to give warning.—Selected.

SELECTIONS.

"Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him"
(Psalms xxxviii: 7.)

Since thy Father's arm sustains thee, Peaceful be;
When a chastening hand restrains thee,
It is His will.
Know His love in full completeness,
Feel the measure of thy weakness,
If He wound thy spirit sore,
Trust Him more.

Without murmur, uncomplaining,
In His hand,
Leave whatever things thou canst not Understand.
Though the world thy folly spurneth,
From thy faith in pity turneth,
Peace thy inmost soul shall fill
Lying still.

Like an infant, if thou thinkest
Thou canst stand—
Childlike, proudly pushing back
The proffered hand—
Courage soon is changed to fear,
Strength doth feebleness appear;
In His love if thou abide
He will guide.

Fearst sometimes that thy Father
Hath forgot?
Though the clouds around thee gather Doubt Him not.
Always hath the daylight broken,
Always hath He comfort spoken,
Better hath He been for years,
Than thy fears.

Therefore whoso'er betideth,
Night or day,
Know His love for thee provideth
Good always.
Crown of sorrows gladly take,
Grateful wear it for his sake;
Sweetly bending to his will,
Lying still.

To his own thy Saviour giveth
Daily strength;
To each troubled soul that liveth,
Peace at length.
Weakest lambs have largest share
Of the tender Shepherd's care;
Ask Him not, then, "when?" or "how?"
Only bow!

THE TWO WORDS.

One day a harsh word, rashly said,
Upon an evil journey sped,
And like a sharp and cruel dart
It pierced a fond and loving heart;
It turned a friend into a foe,
And everywhere brought pain and woe.

A kind word followed it one day,
Flew swiftly on its blessed way;
It healed the wound, it soothed the pain,
And friends of old were friends again.
It made the hate and anger cease,
And everywhere brought joy and peace.

But yet the harsh word left a trace
The kind word could not quite efface,
And though the heart its love regained,
It bore a scar that long remained;
Friends could forgive but not forget,
Or lose the sense of keen regret.

O if we could but learn to know
How swift and sure our words can go,
How would we weigh with utmost care
Each thought before it sought the air,
And only speak the words that move
Like white-winged messengers of love.

Pilgrimage to Mecca from the Soudan.

Charles Henry Robinson mentions the narrative given to him in Tripoli, by a man who had made the journey, of the difficulties connected with the pilgrimage.

He had started originally from Bida, a town about a hundred miles north of the junction of the rivers Niger and Binni, distant as the bird lies two hundred miles from Mecca, and had taken with him his wives and family, a party of seventeen in all. They travelled in the first instance to Kano, and thence to Kuka, the capital of Bornou, situated near to the western shore of Lake Tchad. The king being absent on a slave raid, he was detained here for some four months, after which he made his way into Wadai and thence to Darfur, in which latter province he and his party were seized as slaves and retained as such for a year. At the end of this time, having succeeded in regaining his liberty and that of his family, on the plea that being pilgrims en route for Mecca they could not lawfully be detained, he proceeded in safety as far as the Mahdi's camp at Omdurman, where he arrived just after the fall of Khartoum and the death of General Gordon. After a month's delay at Omdurman, and having with difficulty escaped from the hands of the Mahdi, who wished to retain him as a soldier, he made his way into Abyssinia. Here he got into trouble again, the result being that a whole year elapsed before he and his party succeeded in reaching the coast at Souakin, whence they travelled by steamer to Jeddah, the port of Mecca. After duly performing the rites of the pilgrimage, both at Mecca and Medina, he was prevented from resuming his homeward journey owing to the entire exhaustion of his resources. According to his account, it is customary for any pilgrim who has money wherewith to do so, to entertain his fellow-pilgrims at a banquet given in their honor, and, as there are sometimes as many as sixty thousand pilgrims to be found at a time in Mecca, it will easily be seen what unlimited opportunities for getting rid of money are here afforded. Having spent all that he possessed, he and his friends were forced to remain in Mecca for no less than four years, at the end of which time, having recruited their resources from those of the pilgrims who had come after him, they returned to Jeddah, and sailing thence to Suez, walked across Egypt to Alexandria, whence they came on by sea to Tripoli. The last that I heard of him was that he was about to start across the Great Sahara desert and that he hoped to reach his own town in about a year's time. As he had not apparently arrived at Bida at the time of my recent visit to it, it is to be feared that some further misfortunes have befallen him by the way. Should he succeed in reaching his destination within the year 1895, he will then have travelled a distance of nearly seven thousand miles, the time occupied being rather over ten years.—Hansa local.

LOOKING MORE WAYS THAN ONE.—Looking several ways is necessary to going one way safely. A man who attempts to cross a city street, in these days of electric cars and bicycles, would be in danger of being run over from a half-dozen directions while he was looking straight across the street to where he wanted to go. He must look forward and backward and sideways with both eyes, in order to see a clear path just ahead. It is much the same in all lines of business or study; looking several ways is essential to seeing clearly one way.—S. S. Times.

Italian War Misery.

The Daily Chronicle says:—"While the Italian Government has been spending the nation's money in a vain campaign in Abyssinia it is a matter of painful interest to inquire how some of the Italian people are themselves living. A special correspondent of the New York Evening Post, at Palermo, gives a terrible account of the condition of things in Sicily. As the Evening Post is very far from being a sensational organ, and its facts and figures are given in abundance, there is no reason to doubt the absolute accuracy of what must be regarded, in part at least, as a very formidable indictment against the Government of Italy. The people of Sicily have two sources of livelihood—agriculture and the sulphur mines. Now, while the land agent, who represents the absentee landowners, pays no tax on his cattle, each peasant has two pence six shilling on a single mule. He has to work sixteen hours a day under a semi-tropical sun, and to herd with others in open sheds at night. For this existence of slavery the peasant receives about a franc a day, and he is fortunate if he can earn four pence to keep his family through the season.

"The condition of the peasants, however, dreadful as it is, is not nearly so bad as that of the workers in the sulphur mines. In these abodes of horror the ore is carried through the long galleries on the backs of boys, who are sold for the purpose when eight or ten years old. The employer pays from two to twelve pounds for these wretched little lads, and they are his until death, or until they are wanted by the Government to be slaughtered in Abyssinia. More than one of these children has been deliberately beaten to death by his owner. For twelve hours' labor a day they are paid half a franc! Signor Rossi, of the staff of the Tribuna, visited one of these mines, which gave employment to thirteen hundred persons, and as he and his companion, Signor de Felice, the imprisoned Member of Parliament, came to the entrance of the mine, they were startled by the sight of what seemed a gathering of dwarfs. They were the child-workers in the mine, "stark naked, humpbacked, with twisted legs, and faces prematurely old—these were the little caristi." After passing through the galleries, the visitors stopped to examine the boys, and found the skin of their shoulders raw from the burdens they had to bear. Signor Rossi: "I heard one say, weeping, to a companion, 'I can go on no more, I must let the sack fall.' At a third turn there was another, with his burden on the ground. He wept as he crouched beside it. He had fair hair and blue eyes, but the eyes were reddened by weeping, and the tears fell over pale, hollow cheeks. In my career as a journalist I have seen horrors of every kind, but I have seen nothing which affected me like this."

Let it be remembered that it was for exposing and denouncing these vile and infamous facts that public men were silenced and imprisoned, under the heavy hand of Signor Crispi, while the Italians were urged to seek glory in Africa. Is this the kind of civilization which Signor Crispi wants to introduce into the realms of Emperor Menelik? Why the worst state of things in Abyssinia would seem a kind of paradise for these hapless little child-slaves in the Sicilian mines. Let it be noticed that while the Italian Government is playing its game of haute politique with the German Kaiser, the Italian immigration in America is assuming greater proportions than ever. Although it is early in the season, we already read of twenty-five hundred Italian immigrants landing at New York in one week. No wonder that all who can, fly from the crushing poverty which can be traced directly to the policy pursued by the Italian Government for years past. If the present state of things goes on indefinitely, Italy will be left with a barren waste land, and with a degraded population, ready for the wildest work of destruction, but powerless to create anything better.

Isaac Andrews'

ACCOUNT OF THE EARLY PART OF HIS LIFE, HIS RELIGIOUS EXERCISES, AND CALL TO THE MINISTRY.

Under an humbling sense of the great goodness and inexpressible mercies of Almighty God, manifested to me, a poor finite creature, even from my childhood, my heart has often been affected, in such a manner that I thought I should be most easy to commit a few hints thereof to writing.

When I was about six or seven years old, I was induced to believe there was a God, and that He loved good children, and was displeased with those who are naughty. This caused me to be afraid to tell lies, or be wicked. I likewise believed there was a devil, that had power to hurt bad children; and when I had done amiss, I was afraid of falling into his power. I loved to go to meetings; and when I sat still in them, I was easy in mind; but when I did otherwise, I was uneasy. I loved good men and women, especially ministers; and had a dislike to those who were wicked.

When I was between eight and nine years of age, I was put apprentice to Jonathan Wright, near Burlington, about fifty miles from my mother, and all my relations and acquaintances. Being entirely among strangers, the Lord was kind to me, making me sensible of his love in turning my mind to seek Him, alone, and to cry to Him for the influence of his Holy Spirit, that I might be preserved from evil; to which I found I was by nature inclined. And He did preserve me in his fear in a wonderful manner, until I was about sixteen or seventeen years old.

Oh! the strict government that I was kept under, at that time! My greatest delight was to be alone, to wait upon, worship, and praise the holy name of my God, for his goodness to my soul. I saw a necessity to use the plain language, as "thee" and "thou" to a single person, at all times, and in all companies; and whenever I did refuse or neglect this testimony for Truth, even to an animal, I was reproved for it. So that I firmly believe it is a testimony that Truth requires of all that make profession thereof; however light some may think of it.

About this time, my mistress died. She was a woman of piety and virtue, and showed great tenderness and care towards me. On her death-bed she warned me to beware of bad company, as though she saw the snare I was like to fall into. Notwithstanding her caution, I was caught in it; for I became acquainted with some young men and women, who took great delight in what the world calls innocent nirth, such as fiddling and dancing. But whatever some may think of such amusements, they did not prove innocent to me. I was thereby gradually drawn away into the wilderness of sin and transgression, where no light appeared.

Although at my first going into this company I was deeply distressed and condemned for it; so that I concluded I would go no more, yet upportunity and inopportunity prevailed. Then was I again followed by judgment, and sometimes made covenant to do better; but the temptations of the enemy, with my own inclination, and the enticements of others, prevailed, again and again. At length I began to flee from judgment, and endeavored to stifle the witness of God, in my own heart, which often arose and testified against the evil I was in the practice of. But I was tempted to make merry over this inward reprover, by tramping upon it, singing and dancing, whenever it arose. So, by degrees, I seemed to gain a victory over it, still presuming on the mercy of God, and adding sin to sin; until I was left to myself, so that I felt no reprover for anything I did.

Oh, what vanity and folly did I indulge in! My companions applauded and caressed me, for my activity, which prompted me to go on, and I soon became a proficient in the school of Satan, leaping and dancing and making merry. Yet was I mercifully preserved from what are called gross evils amongst men.

In this state I continued about two years, and although I went to meetings, yet the chant of the violin was so sounding in my ears, that I received no benefit thereby. In this state of darkness, the tempter persuaded me all was well; and I thought I was a clever fellow, being much esteemed by those my associates.

Being now free from my master, I thought to take my swing in the world. Yet, at times, I thought I should be brought back again through judgments; but I looked at such an event as at some great distance from me. However, through mercy it was nearer than I was aware of.

Having some cattle at Little Egg Harbor, I was obliged to go there, to provide hay for them. While I was there I thought of my father and mother, who were both dead, and I was left like a sparrow on the house-top, or like a sheep in the wilderness, without a shepherd. Thoughts like these caused a kind of melancholy to seize me, which I did not like. Being far from my jovial companions, I wanted to get back to them; and therefore thought to get my cattle wintered, but nobody appeared willing to undertake it; so I was obliged to procure hay for them myself, which seemed a cross to my own will. As I was working, my heart became sad. At length, on a clear day, I saw a little black cloud arise in the north, at a great distance; at which I was somewhat surprised. Looking at it again, I saw it arise fast and increased in blackness, which augmented my fears, and terror began to take hold of my mind, so that I durst not stay in the meadow any longer. In haste, I ran to the sea-shore; the cloud at the same time came swiftly over me, and I was smitten to the ground with thunder.

After some time, I got up and went to the house, where my sister Hannah dwelt. As I lay on a bed, my sight and sense, as to anything outward, were taken away; but I saw fearfully all my sins that I had committed. Death seemed to look me in the face, and there appeared no way to escape. I also saw, that if I died in that condition, nothing but misery would be my portion. Oh, the dread and terror that I was in; seeing, as to my apprehension, the very lake that burns with fire and brimstone, "where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched." This, I thought I saw to be the end of the wicked, who sin against knowledge, until their day is over.

Oh, if I had been in the possession of a thousand worlds, at that time, I would have given them all for a little more time. I longed for it, but could not ask it with any degree of faith, for my heart was hard. Thus, under inexplicable anguish, I remained for some time. No tongue can tell, nor heart conceive, to the full, without an experimental knowledge of it, which I sincerely desire may never be the case with any.

After being in this condition until all hope was gone, on a sudden my heart was tendered, accompanied with a flood of tears. Oh, then the cry was, for a little more time, which, at length, seemed to be granted, on condition that during the remainder of my life, I would give up my heart to serve Him, who hath the lives of all flesh at his disposal. This I now felt very desirous to do, crying for strength and mercy, and forgiveness of my sins, in such a manner as to be heard by those near me.

The first thing I remember, as to anything outward, was my sister, who held me by the hand, and thus expressed herself: "Ah! brother, He that hath all men's hearts in his hand, can change them in a moment." These being "words fitly spoken, were as apples of gold in pictures of silver," to which I could make no answer.

Thus, the Lord by his power, restored me immediately to perfect health, and to my senses in a few hours. I then returned to my labor, in deep thoughtfulness and fear. And when I had performed what I was engaged about, keeping all to myself that I had passed through, I returned to my brother's house at Mount Holly, where I made my home.

I soon met with many temptations; for, falling again into the company of some of my former companions, I found it very hard to take up the cross, and deny myself of old practices, which through long custom, seemed interwoven with my constitution. I had the same inclination to vanity and folly as before. The adversary strove hard to keep possession of my heart, and through weakness, I was several times prevailed upon to join in dancing and making merry, which brought distress and anguish upon my soul.

The last time Satan prevailed on this subject was as follows: as I was going along a street in Mount Holly, I heard a fiddle, and thought I would not go near it. Yet when I came opposite the house, it was suggested to my mind that I might stand still and hear what they were playing, for there could be no harm in that. Then, that I might go to the end of the house and listen; there being no harm in that, so I complied. Then it seemed as if it was said, thou mayst go into the house, but be sure not to dance; there is no harm in that. So the enemy prevailed by subtlety, and I lost my strength, and to dancing I went, as though I knew no better.—But this query came into my mind, Where art thou? Then I saw where I was, and abhorred myself. So I left the company abruptly, and went out, and wittly departed.

Oh! that night was a dreadful one to me. I thought the very terrors of hell took hold on me. I saw I had broken my covenant, from time to time, and how the Lord had forborne with me. I was now charged to break off my sins, or else I should go back where I was when He met with me before, and should be left to myself; and the pit I then had a prospect of should be the lot of my inheritance. Oh, the bitter cries and groans which those apprehensions then produced! I hope I may never forget them.

I then entered into a solemn covenant, that if the Lord would give me strength, I would never do the like again. This covenant I was enabled to keep, blessed be the Lord, for it was his power that preserved me from the jaws of the devourer. When this was over, I had faith to believe that the Lord, in his own time, would enable me to overcome all my sins. A prayer was raised in me daily, that He would pardon, and blot out my transgressions, and remember my iniquities no more.

(To be concluded.)

In the Far North.

At an early hour on First-day morning we were safely moored alongside Sorabster Pier (Cuthness), and after breakfast in the steamer's saloon at half-past eight, we went ashore and turned our steps towards the wild cliffs known as Holborn Head. The hill above them is a bare, bleak slope, in many places almost devoid of vegetation, being swept by the winter gales, and often drenched with spray from the wild Atlantic waves which break upon the rocks beneath. In this barren wilderness we came upon certain spots where the beautiful little Primula Scotica grew in profusion, and the exquisite flowers at once filled one with admiration, and seemed placed there as fitting emblems of the great Creator's love; and as we gazed upon them we were reminded of the words, "If God so clothe the flower of the field, will He not much more clothe you?"

We soon approached the "clett," a huge stack of rock, separated from the mainland by a yawning gulf, into which we gazed and wondered, as the innumerable fowl went about their avocations regardless of our presence. We must have appeared very small to them as compared with the huge rocks amongst which they lived and reared their young in safety. Thousands of guillemots were on the cliffs and flying in mid-air, whilst others, swimming, diving, far below, were hardly visible; black-backed and herring gulls wheeled overhead, and screamed as if in wild defiance as we stood upon the verge above their nests, now deserted by the well-fledged young, which ran among the ledges trying their wings, and longing to air their pinions in triumphant flight; the puffin, "tamie pion" as the Gaels call him, dwelt in holes high up amid those cliffs, and ever and anon went back and forward between the heights and depths below, "your Heavenly Father feedeth them," came home to longing hearts, and a little further on we sat and "waited."

Down in the hollow caves beneath boomed the huge breakers, now here, now there, then distant, and fittingly reminded us of one who, long ago, when sitting on his native hills, communed with God his Father, listening to the roar of mighty waters after rain, as floating on the breeze it came and went, then came again, then died in everlasting distance; and our thoughts, like his, were turned again,— "Deep calleth unto deep," and "What is man?" "midst all this chaos; and we worshipped there—truly a fitting place. How "marvellous God's works," and more still that He should care for us! And yet He does; we felt it, knew it, and we gave Him thanks, and asked Him for a blessing, and He blessed us there. A fitting house in which to worship. There, "on the rock," with vaulted arch of purest blue above, his loving presence with us, and his soothing words of peace as one by one they entered in and found a resting-place—"Take My yoke upon you," "Learn of Me;" and as the spirit was made willing, and the flesh was crucified, so we were filled, "the hungry with good things."—The London Friend.

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 21, 1896.

WITH AN AMBULANCE IN WARTIME.—Dr. Charles E. Ryan has written a painfully interesting work entitled, "With an Ambulance during the Franco-German War" (London, Murray). Of one of his experiences he records: "We were compelled by the French authorities to take out of the beds, as best we could, men and women, some even at the door of death, and all severely wounded. I could not recall without pain the details of the scenes which accompanied their transportation. As I have said, their wounds were all of the gravest character; some were mortal, the majority were amputations, and the remainder compound fractures, or severe lacerated shell-wounds. To make the bed of many of the patients, or even to move them gently, was to cause them acute suffering. One may imagine the agony of these brave fellows when they were hauled out of their mattresses and put, two or three together, onto a cart or wagon, which, no matter how carefully driven, had to jostle them along the very streets to the place of destination. I went successively into several of the wagons where some of the worst cases were, and did all in my power to mitigate their dreadful pains; but, in spite of everything I could do, they moaned most piteously as the wheels bumped over any roughness in the pavement. I thought a bullet through the heart was preferable to such agony as they endured."

The St. James Gazette remarks on this book, that Dr. Ryan has been as sparing as he well could be of the horrors of the military hospital; and, despite his restraint, his work has all the ascination of the terrible. "People talk very lightly," he remarks at the close, "of the great European war that is said to be inevitable. It can do no harm to measure as far as possible that such a war may mean." His book helps me to make that measure. "Give peace in our time, O Lord!" is a prayer to which the experience of an army surgeon should give an intensity of meaning it were impossible otherwise to attain.—Herald of Peace.

SAVE YOUR STRENGTH.—You will need it by and by. You may be young, strong, vigorous, lusty, and full of energy and fire; but the day may come when you will be weak, pale, feeble, and sick; and when the question of life or death will depend on the amount of strength you have to resist disease, and restore you to health and vigor. Then, when life hangs as in a balance, if you have strength you will rally, and if not you will go down.

The strength you waste in overwork, in useless sports, in needless exposure, violent exercise, nervous excitement, late hours, nights of debauchery, in intoxication, in tobacco using, in gluttony, and vice of every kind, will be just what you will need to carry you safely through, and add years to your term of life. But if your strength is gone you cannot regain it. You may dose and doctor, and stimulate, and search out all the hidden reserves of your vitality; but when you have found them and used them you are done! Neither money nor medicine can buy back life, or restore the wasted energies. Your strength is gone, uselessly squandered; dissipated in folly, sapped by lust, broken by indulgence,—and when you lie pale and feeble, racked, tortured, tormented, panting, gasping, dying, you may perhaps remember that the strength wasted in one single day or hour, would have been ample to have carried you safely through the crisis of disease, and given you long years of usefulness and enjoyment.

A high price to pay for an hour of pleasure and folly! It is better to save your strength when it is abundant, and so escape languor, sickness, and pain, and have the vigor that defies disease, overcomes infirmities, and lengthens out a life of usefulness to the full measure which God has granted us, and designed that we should enjoy.—The Christian.

In a treatise entitled "Truth's Principles," written by John Crook in 1663; the author makes a very clear distinction between the acts of righteousness done by man in his own will, and that free gift which is of God through his spirit, whereby Christ is made "unto the soul, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption. . . . It is not he that saith he is righteous by the imputation of Christ's righteousness, but 'he that doeth righteousness is righteous even as He [Christ] is righteous.'" (1 John iii: 7). This does not mean that it is good works "as done by us, nor as inherent in us, as acts, by which we are accepted of God, and justified before Him; but by Christ, the author and worker of those acts in us and for us, whereby we know that we are in Him and He in us, and we know Him as our Head, unto whom all things are gathered together in one." This is in harmony with that declaration of the apostle Paul, "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy He saved us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost; which He shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ, our Saviour; that, being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life" (Titus iii). As also with our Saviour's injunction, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness."—United Friend.

A SHIELD AND BUCKLER.—Charles Inglis, an evangelist, speaking at a meeting in London, related this remarkable incident:

"Twenty years ago I was at a convention in the city of Dublin, and after the meeting a gentleman put a Bible in my hand in which was a round hole in one of the covers. He said, 'I want you to look at it.' I took it up to look at it, and as I opened the Bible, I found lead after lead had this hole through it, and I said, 'What does it mean?'"

"He said, 'Five or six years ago, in a troubled part of the country where I was preaching, I had just finished a service in a farmhouse, and had got into my cart to ride home. Something said to me, 'Don't put your Bible into your coat pocket,' and I put it in my breast pocket. While riding I saw a flash, heard a report, and felt something had struck me."

"I said, 'Drive on, drive on quickly; I think I am shot, but I am not much hurt.'"

"The gentleman shortly afterwards found a hole in his overcoat, and he found the bullet embedded in that Bible, and it stopped at the seventeenth of St. John, where it says, 'Holy Father, keep through thine own name those whom thou hast given me.'"

"God unflinchingly watches over his children, and is never at a loss in devising means to effect their escape, even though they may have to pass through fire and water."—Selected.

No great movement springs altogether suddenly into existence. Years of preparation are often needed. Unseen forces are long tending to results which burst out at length as unexpectedly as streams burst out from under hillsides, and then flow down to gladden all the lower plains.—Exchange.

A concern for the spiritual growth of our younger members, and their preservation from evil influences, has from its rise, been one of the subjects which has engaged the attention of the Society of Friends. As an illustration of this, we quote the following extract from an epistle of the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, issued in 1746 to its Subordinate Meetings and members. After giving suitable counsel to the young, it expresses the desire that the Elders and others "show a disposition to admit them at times into their company and treat them with freedom and kindness which will very much make way for any advice or counsel they may give them in relation to their conduct."

We think this advice is as applicable now as it was one hundred and fifty years ago, and we trust there is a widespread concern among our older members to help their younger friends, as way may open for it, in their progress in the Christian path. This concern not only leads to desires and secret prayers for their growth in grace, but encourages to the social visiting them in their families, and to efforts to strengthen the bonds that unite all in a common interest in the promotion of the cause of Christ, and the welfare and progress of our own religious Society, and the spread of the principles it was raised up to bear testimony to.

When these concerned Friends meet with those who are evidently bending their necks to the yoke of Christ, and evincing by their conduct that they are being enrolled in the ranks of the Redeemer's army, the comfort and satisfaction they feel is such as to enable them to understand the language of the apostle, "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children walk in the Truth."

In manifesting this love and concern for the young, there is need of sound discretion, that we may not unwittingly defeat our own object. It would be a pity and an injury to the cause of righteousness, if our love and sympathy should have the effect of removing from the youthful mind that uneasiness with any part of their conduct which had been awakened by the visitation of their Saviour; and should tend to settle them at ease in practices inconsistent with their profession. It was probably a concern of this kind which one hundred years ago led to the introduction into our discipline of the following clause: "In some places there may have been a want of care, rightly to distinguish and seasonably to bring into action, the talents bestowed upon some in the early stage of life; and we believe that many who were evidently under the forming hand, have been suddenly laid hold of and introduced into service, before that preparation of heart hath been sufficiently experienced, which leads to a reliance upon Divine direction, and redeems from a confidence in the natural understanding; it is therefore desired that by a just discrimination of times and seasons, and of the qualifications bestowed, every gift may be rightly exercised, and a succession of useful members preserved in every work in the church." (p. 61—Ed. of 1893.)

We fear that there are among our younger members some who show by their dress, language and general course of life that they are unwilling to submit fully to the advice of their older and concerned Friends, and faithfully uphold those testimonies which true Friends from the beginning have felt it their duty to consistently support; and who yet in a general way are convinced of the truth of the doctrines we profess, and desire to see them prosper and spread. Their own unfaithfulness is a barrier to their usefulness in the church; rendering it improper for Friends to entrust to their hands the more important duties which devolve upon its faithful members; and fearing lest their appointment to official positions should have the effect of encouraging them to continue their inconsistent course, and thus prove of real injury to them.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Great credit is given to President Cleveland and Secretary Olney for their success in arranging an arbitration of the boundary line dispute between Venezuela and British Guiana. Great Britain at first declined to arbitrate, and next refused to submit to arbitration the territory inside the so-called Schomburgk line. According to reports, the whole territory in dispute is to be considered by the arbitrators, with the understanding that fifty years of actual possession is to far a counter-claim.

FRANCE.—The late Marquis de Dode, a French nobleman, has been declared bankrupt. Dode, in this question is a delicate one, and is saved from being embarrassing by Lord Salisbury's acceptance of Secretary Olney's proposition. It is believed that the dispute as to the boundary line must be settled without friction, which will indicate both a victory for the principle of arbitration and for the foundation of the United States as to not to intervene when a foreign Power attempts to extend its possessions upon the American Continent.

A statement was issued on the 10th instant by the Secretary of the Venezuelan Boundary Commission that in view of Lord Salisbury's announcement and the probable early settlement of the boundary of the arbitration, "the Commission, while continuing its deliberations in the preparation and orderly arrangement of many valuable maps, reports and documents which have been procured and used in the course of its labors, does not propose to formulate any decision for the present of the matters submitted for consideration. It will continue its sessions from time to time, with the hope and expectation that a friendly and just settlement of all pending differences between the nations interested will make any final decision on its part unnecessary."

The position of our Government in the arbitration with Venezuela will be that no protection over the South American Republics is assumed, but that we act in the role of best friend.

President Cleveland said last week, in speaking to a Senator about the rumors of war with Spain, that the position of our Government was, as stated in his last annual message to Congress, one of traditional sympathy with a people struggling for autonomy and freedom; but, nevertheless, this Government felt its plain duty to honestly fulfill every international obligation. Every precaution has been taken so that if a crisis should arise in Cuba the United States could assist itself with force, but he did not think the occasion would arise.

The official vote of Pennsylvania is given as follows: McKinley (Rep.) 726,995; Bryan and Swoell (Dem.) 422,654; Levering and Johnson (Pro.) 10,274; Bryan and Watson (Sec.) 6,103; Bryan and Swoell (Free Silver), 5073; Palmer and Buckner (Jeffersonian), 11,000; McKinley and Hobart (McKinley-Itzeng), 1302; Matchett and Maguire (Socialist-Labor), 3683; Rowley and Southgate (National), 870.

The official vote of Minnesota is given out. Over 310,000 votes were cast at the election. Eleventh Mo. 3rd, an increase of over 41,000 since last election. McKinley received 165,475 votes; Bryan, 129,477; Pro, 2204; Levering, 1002; and Mitchell, 734.

Wyoming's electoral vote will be given to Bryan, and one vote of Kentucky to the Democratic candidate, the other 12 to McKinley.

The Chief Justice of Arizona has given a decision sustaining the contract for leasing prison labor by ex. Atty. Gen. B. B. Howell, 4002, and Mitchell, 734. At seven o'clock, per. This means the prison will be self-supporting, and will construct a mammoth irrigation canal, reclaiming 100,000 acres to agriculture.

It is estimated that 75 per cent of the inmates of public institutions are aliens.

Sarah Malley, of Cheyenne, Wyoming, is the first woman to be chosen a Presidential Elector. She is a Republican, while her husband is a Democrat.

Following the lead of Chicago, a New York dry goods house is about to start a little school in its own premises where the cash girls can obtain instruction one or two hours every day. In one of the large dry goods stores of Chicago a day and a night school is maintained by competent teachers and all the modern accessories of a first-class school-room where the employees of the store are given free education.

The orange trees of Florida are rapidly recovering from the effects of the great freeze and the Florida Agriculturist says it will not be long before the State is sending as many oranges to market as ever before. The crop in this city last week numbered 384, which is 10 more than the previous week and 6 less than the corresponding week of 1895. Of the whole number 193 were males and 191 females; 49 died of pneumonia; 35 of heart disease; 28 of consumption; 20 of nephritis; 19 of diphtheria; 15 of old age; 15 of malarial; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 from casualties; 12 of cancer; 12 of apoplexy; 11 of inanition; 11 of convulsions, and 10 of Bright's disease.

COTTON.—Demand from spinners was light, but the market ruled steady on a basis of 8½c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Winter barn in bulk, quoted $10.00 a $11.00 and spring do., in sacks, at $7.50 a $10.50 per ton.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 89½ a 90c. No. 2 mixed corn, 29½ a 30c. No. 2 white oats, 24 a 24½.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 41 a 42c; good, 41 a 42½c; medium, 41 a 42c; common, 39½ a 41c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 34½ a 4c; good, 31 a 33½c; medium, 24 a 3c; common, 21 a 2½c; ewes, 1½ a 2c; lambs, 3½ a 5c.

HOGS.—Western, 31 a 35c; State, 34 a 4½c.

FOREIGN.—Members of the House of Commons are supplied with materials of the best quality possible quality, and a generous use is made of it. During the past session, 410,500 letters were posted at the House of Commons, which gives an average of over 600 per member.

London's population increases about 70,000 every year.

It is despatch of the 11th instant from Manila says: "The Spanish forces have won a brilliant victory over the insurgents at Novleta. The rebel positions were strongly fortified, and there was desperate fighting before they were taken. The insurgents lost 400, and the Spaniards 33 killed.

There was a large attendance of spectators at the opening of the Reichstag on the 16th instant, in anticipation of a warm debate over the neutrality treaty between Russia and Germany. The affair, however, proved to be a disappointment, the Government Ministers deprecating a continuance of the agitation as injurious to the Empire.

It is announced that a treaty of peace has been signed between Abyssinia and Italy. The new convention recognizes the complete independence of Ethiopia. King Menelik declares free all the Italian taken prisoners during the recent campaign.

Charles Hall Adams, United States Consul General in Liberia, now in this country on a visit, says that Liberia is fairly prosperous, and that industrious and intelligent people are able to make a good living in the country. The principal industry is the raising of coffee and palm oil, and a number of American negroes own good plantations and enjoy incomes of as much as $5,000 a year.

It is also announced that the claims from the British South Africa Company £1,000,000 indemnity to cover the damage sustained by the Jameson raid.

A feature of the population statistics of Western Australia is the large proportion of males to females. The disparity is maintained in the arrivals by sea. At present there are 45 females to every 100 males.

She was of a meek and quiet spirit, "which is the sign of God's will in her," and was a diligent attendant of meetings for long as health permitted. She endured a lingering illness with much patience and resignation, but often expressed a desire to go and be at rest. Her relatives and friends have a comforting hope that she is numbered with the just of all generations.

WILLIAM A. COOK, near Glenville, Md., Seventh Month 20th, 1891, in the sixty-second year of his age, after a long illness which he bore with Christian patience and resignation. We believe his end was peace and our loss is his eternal gain.

At his residence in Philadelphia, Eighth Mo. 9th, 1891, JOHN C. ALLAN, aged eighty-nine years, an esteemed member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. The long life of this dear Friend was an active and useful one, till prostrated by sickness, nearly three years before his decease. During the protracted illness which followed, his mental powers were at times clouded, but he often gave evidence of an earnest desire to be prepared for the solemn day, expressing "I have to die, entirely upon thy Almighty," and again, "Nothing but mercy, mercy!" We have the comforting belief that through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, he has exchanged the trial and sufferings of time for rest and peace in that Heavenly Home for which his spirit often longed.

1864.—Fourth Month 10th.—This morning yielded to what seemed a Divine intimation meeting—"He calleth his sheep by name, and leadeth them out"—encouraged me to see, if He would return with me and give me grace, which has mercifully been the case, and in afternoon He renewed the language in my ear, "If thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light." Oh, I will now try to be careful lest I deny my Lord and have to reap bitterly, as poor Peter did. Thou knowest the depth of my soul, oh Lord! how I want to see thee.

17th.—Yearly Meeting has commenced, and my God has dwelt mercifully with me. Oh, rant unto me clearness, that I may serve thee, not thee only, and have my imagination crucified. I feel as though I stood on a sea of glass. 'tw days more will bring me to the commencement of my thirty-fifth year. I give all my life to thee, my God and Saviour. Do with it what thou wilt, only let me not stray and ring dis grace upon thy Truth.

24th.—This has been an eventful week to me. In my birth-day I besought him to search me and know my way, etc., and to my surprise it was shown me. I had not been faithful to banished duty on First-day afternoon. I am afraid to express what gathers upon my mind out of meeting, and pleaded that as an excuse, but my answer came immediately—What God has cleansed this, call not thou common or unclean." How condemnation seized me that night and the next, and I was made willing to covenant to do anything, and was put to the trial on Fifth-day morning. Buff-tings were mine afterwards. It seemed as if I had one in my own will in rising so soon, but He ad brought to sight the case of putting off to a more convenient time. To-day I am ready to conclude it was like the whirlwind of which Elijah speaks. I did not wait long enough for he still, small voice. In thy marvellous mercy how hast forgiven it all, Oh, my dear Lord, and I feel to-day like the woman who ceased out to kiss his feet, from the time He came in. Keep me in the hour of temptation.

Fifth Month 3rd.—Oh, Lord, crucify my vain mind and imagination. Oh, crucify me, crucify me, crucify me, I pray thee. Take away all within me offensive in thy holy eye-sight, and help me to live only to thy glory and the benefit of my fellow-creatures.

Fifth Month 8th.—Oh, turn thy hand upon me, dearest Lord! "Search me, Oh, God, and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." Oh, how I want to be searched; I am so afraid of my own willings and runnings. Help me to turn inward, for that which may be known of God is manifest within. Help me to pray without ceasing. Oh, enable me to walk in and out before the children properly, bless my endeavors in school, I humbly pray thee.

15th.—Several times lately, when I first awoke to consciousness in the morning, some text of warning or encouragement comes to mind, which I esteem a great favor, believing it to emanate immediately from the Holy Spirit unmixt with any cogitations of my own. They always seem so true to my state, and help me through the day. This morning, entirely without previous expectation, the awakening impression was, that I must kneel and pray after morning reading. I greatly feared rebellion, so laid still and let matter gather on my mind, and all seemed so clear. I promised obedience if He opened the way, which He marvellously did, and I tremblingly obeyed. To-night I feel quiet peacefulness, but think there is so much danger of my falling. Help thy poor, unworthy child, Oh, Lord, and grant that I may be led only by thy Holy Spirit.

21st.—Oh, my dear Lord and Saviour, I want to know certainly, if I am serving thee? It seems almost impossible for me to believe, that the Holy Ghost can be in such a poor, unworthy creature as I am. First Corinthians, sixth chapter, nineteenth and twentieth verses comforts me.

22nd.—Sometimes it seems as though my heart and flesh would fail, with the conflicts of my soul. Oh! give to me that peace which thou gives to thy faithful children. Am I entirely faithful to the cross, every hour? Can I say with poor Peter, "Lo, we have left all and followed thee?" To-day I was tried again with doubts as to my duty, when the language came, "Rise, Peter, slay and eat," so unexpectedly that I remembered that I must not call what He gave me common or unclean. My fears were overpowered and slain, but I cannot eat with that joy and peace, that others say flows into them. Oh! I feel his presence, and He does not condemn me; but so many fears present for the future that I cannot rest. He knows what I need and I try to cast my burden on Him.

29th.—Marvellously preserved from falling into those sins which formerly harassed me so. Thanks be unto the great and all powerful One. I try to cast myself into his arms like a little child, and trust to his leadings for everything. O! my soul, "how much owest thou unto my Lord?"

31st.—Stephen Crisp could say, "Our simple view and desire is to die to ourselves and all the world, to know no man after the flesh, nor to be known by them; but only to know the Lord and to walk and act under his immediate notice." Is not this, dear Lord, what thou hast in measure led me into. O, enable me to walk only in thy counsel and fear. Thou knowest how I long to be thine only.

TO L. H. B.

PHILADELPHIA, Sixth Month 3rd, 1864.

"I do sympathize with thee very deeply, for my path has so often seemed alone, as to outward company, though at the same time favored with kind friends and nothing of which to complain. Let us remember our dear Saviour 'trod the wine press alone.'

"It is such a favor, too, to feel with the apostle, 'Absent from the body, but present with the Lord.' Shall we not try to keep our hearts awake to Him, while we join the outward life, 'I sleep, but my heart waketh,' saith Solomon, in his Songs. Though I remain so long silent, yet thou art not forgotten, for sometimes while in deep prostration of soul, I remember thee and have pleaded with Him to know why it is thou feelest thy path to lead from us, to know whether it is because thou art not willing to become as a fool for his sake. Not willing to come out from the world and be separate? But no answer comes. I try to cast the care of us both on Him, desiring He would search us both, through and through, and enable us to submit to all his chastenings. My path is still in the deep, and I pray to Him to keep me in the valley of humility, for Job Scott says, 'Where the grass is green and the flowers bloom.'

"One First-day evening, not long since, while pleading with Him to know how I should feel, I met with this passage, to my great comfort then and since, 'Thou wilt show me the path of life; in thy presence is fulness of joy, and at thy right hand are pleasures forevermore.' I dwell on this much; then came the passage, 'Thou wilt show me the pure river of water of life,' etc. Then the healing river seen by Ezekiel, which rose to the knees and onward till one could swim in it. Oh, it is very sweet to feel his presence as a 'river, the streams whereof make glad the whole heritage of God.' 'Oh, that thou hadst hearkened unto my commandments, then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea,' often seems a very serious consideration to me, and awakens to watchfulness. Dearest Laura, O let us try to walk continually as in his Holy sight. Thou didst not tell me, what made you all so sick? I was very sorry for thee. Shall I see thee before going East during vacation? It would be pleasant, but I feel very poor myself, that my letters are too, unless written with his holy approbation. This is why it is best not to have set times, but to write when our spirits seem seasoned for it.

"In dear love, farewell, thine truly,

"D. B."

Sixth Mo. 5th.—There was a passage passed through my mind again and again on Third-day, but I had no thought of its being intended for me to express, till towards the close of the meeting, when matter arose with such weight, it seemed as though it laid heavy upon me, as a debt to the Friends there assembled. I gave up to say it, and have felt quiet since. This was more like the openings I have read and heard that others had, and "Do ye now believe?" seemed queried of me, so plainly the next day. Oh, I want to serve thee, and thee only, oh Lord, save me from the deceitful workings of my own heart, and appoint me my dwelling in the low valley of humility.

TO L. B. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Sixth Month 12th, 1864.
 "I do not think thy name can ever pass my thoughts without a secret committal to his care, as has been the case for years. We are too deeply knit together now to Christ, to part. The wound would be too deep, though I feel myself so poor and unworthy of the love, care or notice of any being on earth. A poor worm of the dust, upheld, sustained, and at times raised up, by his Almighty power and great mercy. Yesterday I opened Thomas & Kempis to the words, 'Do not think that thou hast made any progress towards perfection,' till thou feelest that thou art less than the least of all human beings."

"Oh, my dear Laura little knows all I feel. I think still there will be a difference. Thou wilt look upon me as possessing Quaker peculiarities, and all my secret feelings cannot be as clearly expressed and understood. But hearts warmed by Christ's love are one, and the nearer I see thee conformed to his image, thy heart warmed with the desire to glorify our only Saviour and Redeemer continually, the more deeply shall I love thee under whatever name thou passest.

RELIGION AND CHILDHOOD.—I believe that little children by multitudes might be kept from ever departing from the sweet love of God revealed to these infant souls if it were not for the worldly pride and vanity fastened in them. Mothers plan more carefully for their children's dress than for their souls. Children learn soon that their clothes are for show; the dancing-school, costuming, pantomimes, theatricals, all sorts of entertainments, lead them from early and simple trust and love for Jesus, and force them in cruel vanity into worldly ways and the world. Such mothers will have the souls of their children to answer for. In the providence of God I was saved from all these things, and while during these later years I was not all I could have been by grace, yet I am deeply conscious that such surroundings might have led me from the way of the Lord and banished from my heart the ever recurring desire to know and do his will, by open confession and a devout life. I have been led to write of my early conviction and experience, that parents and teachers may, with holy care, guard their children from the snares that rob the Lord Jesus of his little ones.

WHAT had the life of Jesus been to us if we had only the record of his sermons without the record of his going about doing good? I think the every day life of Jesus touches the human heart as the great truth which He uttered.

Oh! the days and nights, the weeks and months of sorrow, I had to pass through! So that I had no comfort in any thing; bemourning my condition, and crying to the Lord for strength, that I might be enabled to please Him. When I was in company, I endeavored to hide my inward exercises from all mortals; and in so doing I felt a degree of peace to attend me, which was like healing oil to my wounded soul. This increased my love to God, and my hope of salvation, through Christ.

Afterwards I was tried another way. My former companions began to mock, and deride me, saying, I was grown proud, and would not speak to them; or, that I was in love; or, going melancholy. Sometimes one would say, "I suppose you will be a preacher, by and by." Another, "You used to be a good fellow, what ails you now, to be so churlish. You are afraid to spend your penny. Come, we will treat you, if you will go with us." I told them no; I had something else to do. Then would they leave me in a flouting manner; which I found I must bear, and keep to myself, conversing but little with any; and by this means I increased in strength.

Thus, the Lord was pleased, in mercy, to carry on his great work in me. My heart became daily more exercised on account of sinners, especially for my old companions, that as He had met with me, and shown me my condition,—so, that He would also be graciously pleased, in mercy, to awaken them to a sense of their wretchedness and misery, and that they might be made partakers of his mercy and forgiveness.

Thus, as I took up the cross, and was faithful to what was made known to me to be my duty, I found an increase of peace in myself; and to God, the author of it, thanksgiving and praise was raised in my soul to his worthy name, which was as a strong tower, unto which I fled in time of temptation and trial, and found safety. I saw it to be my duty to go to meeting, both on First and other days of the week; and I endeavored to have my mind retired inward, as much as possible, therein to wait upon, and to worship God, who is a spirit, in spirit and in truth. As I continued diligent in this exercise, I came more and more to experience the Lord's power to come over me, particularly in silent meetings; and as I bowed under a sense of his goodness, I was enabled to reverence and worship his Holy name, in fear and trembling.

Oh! the sweet peace and solid comfort that attended my mind after meetings. The remembrance of it made me long for meeting day to come again. Thus was I fed, like a child, with milk, from time to time; which encouraged me to keep to that duty, although the meeting was very small, and mostly held in silence. But after a time, I found it harder to get my mind still. Death, instead of life, seemed to attend me. This caused a query, why it should be so? which I could not resolve. I began to doubt and fear that I had been mistaken in time past, with respect to my sense of worship. This state continued for a time, until I was almost discouraged. But an hand-maid of the Lord, Hannah Hurford, came to visit us; and after sitting some time in silence, she stood up and said, "Friends, I perceive the living amongst you are scarcely able to bury the dead. And this is the reason some are so exercised." She further said, "Be not discouraged; but keep to thy exercises, and thou wilt know better times."

And so I found it, life spring up with her words and I was greatly refreshed and encouraged to persevere.

Soon after this, I was married to Elizabeth Elfreth, daughter of Jeremiah Elfreth, of the city of Philadelphia, on the twenty-first of the Ninth Month, 1758. We first settled at Mount Holly, for about five months; then removed to Haddonfield, where I entered into a great deal of business, considering my ability and experience. This brought a fresh exercise on my mind, for fear I should not conduct agreeably to the profession I made; which often engaged me to beg for wisdom and strength, that I might not hurt my inward condition.

I found it my duty to keep to meetings, notwithstanding my increase of business; believing all my endeavors would be fruitless, without blessing from above. I seldom went into public company, without begging for preservation, which seemed measurably to be granted. So I went on with my business, with cheerfulness and great peace of mind.

About this time, I saw, as I apprehended that I should be under a necessity to call to my fellow creatures, in public, to come to the Fountain, which in some measure had healed me. This brought to my remembrance how I was with me, when I followed the voice of thy stranger into the wilderness; and Oh! how I lament my lost time, from the age of sixteen to twenty-four, about which age I had the same apprehension. This exercise brought me very low in mind, in consideration of what a rebel had been; and I was made willing to say, No my will, but thy will be done. Be thou most and wisdom, tongue and utterance. So in great fear I went to meetings, dreading the time, an often crying, Oh! that thou wouldst make me what thou wouldst have me to be, even as thou art in the hands of the potter!

In the Seventh Month, 1740, at a meeting at Newtown, the Lord's power came upon me, and I was moved to speak to the people, and to exhort them to labor that they might know a profound silence. But Oh! the pleading and reasoning that attended me, until the meeting was over. So I went away under condemnation and in great distress, considering how I had disobeyed a merciful God, who had done so much for me, a poor unworthy creature, not deserving the least of his mercies. Thus I remained in a humbled, pensive state, until the twenty-eighth of the same month, when, being at a meeting from home, at which were many of my acquaintances, the Lord's power again came over me, and I was moved to kneel down, and supplicate his name; and although the cross we drag, the crown of peace was greater. Blessed be his name for ever and ever. Amen.

Thus, reaping the fruits of obedience, I was made willing to comply with what appeared to be required of me. My mouth, from time to time, was opened in testimony and prayer; and as a child, was I fed with milk, for a time. But afterward, a fresh exercise attended me. The Lord was pleased to withdraw the light of his countenance; and great darkness seemed to cover my mind. I sought Him daily, but to no purpose, as I thought; and the enemy was strong in temptation. So my sorrows increase. I examined my past conduct, but could not find the cause: my faith and hope were almost gone and I was ready to sink in despair.

But as my hands were employed in my labor on a sudden, I seemed to hear a voice, saying "Stand still, and see the salvation of God." A these words came, I stood still; and Oh! th ower with which my heart was filled; insuch that I was broken into great tenderness, and wept for joy. Then I took up a new resolution, to follow Him, whosoever He should be pleased to lead me. I was ready to slay as I were, on the banks of deliverance; hoping I could never be so tried again. But I was not permitted to remain long in this state; for, soon after, I was tried again with a senseless, light, fiery spirit; so that I could scarcely think of anything solid; and I was almost ready to condemn solid weight in others.

About this time, some women Friends came to my house from Pennsylvania, and appointed a meeting at Timothy Matlack's. I concluded to go with them, but though it looked very foolish, and they very despicable, for attempting such a thing. I went, and sat down with them, still being under the cloud, which continued till near the close of the meeting; when, unexpectedly, the Lord's power came upon me, and I was moved to supplicate his name. So I knelt down and prayed; but as soon as I was on my seat again, all was vanished away; and I could not believe I had felt his power, though it was a fiction. So went home in great trouble, and concluded all my hopes of a revival were gone, and that I was certainly under deception; and my sorrows increased day and night.

Oh! how did I lament and mourn, because my hope of a Saviour was gone! At length, I concluded to take a ride into the woods, to seek my Beloved, where I might be less interrupted. But there, I thought He fled from me, for a time. I then came to this resolution, that if I died, I would die seeking and crying after Him. Upon coming to this conclusion, my mind became more still; and in this stillness, came the blessedness of Him who is the resurrection and the life, and his living presence raised my drooping soul from death into life, by which I was enabled to praise his holy name.

When this exercise was over, I thought I had a prospect of the state the disciples were in when their Shepherd was snitten, and the sheep were scattered; and how the death of the cross looked to them as a despicable thing. And though He appeared to them, and vanished away, some of them could not believe that they had seen Him, but that it was a fiction;—yet when He appeared again, they were strengthened to believe it was He, without any doubt. This being confirmed, they had to strengthen others to follow Him, in the way of the cross, and self-denial, without which, no man can be his disciple.

This was my hope renewed, and my faith increased, to believe in Him, who is the way, the truth, and the life; and no man can come to the Father but by Him. This I had to declare to others, and was engaged to invite and persuade them to come to Christ, the hope of glory. I had also to go to and fro in the earth, that his knowledge might be increased; and it became my meat and drink to do the will of my Heavenly Father. I felt love to flow in my heart towards all mankind, and strong desires were raised in me that they might come to the knowledge of the Truth, and be saved. In this love, I visited most of the meetings in Pennsylvania and New Jersey.

Thus, when we are obedient to the manifestations of that Divine Light, which is placed in our hearts, we have to experience peace and tranquillity of mind. Oh! may it be my most earnest concern, to yield true obedience to its dictates in my own breast, to the close of my days.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Marble Quarry.

Baker's limestone quarry, in Chester County, Pa., is an extensive opening into a bed of rock, from which large quantities of stone have been taken out for building purposes. A few years ago, the owners of the quarry had a series of borings made with a diamond drill, which disclosed in one corner of the excavation, at a depth of many feet, a bed of pure white crystalline stone, which they determined to work as marble. Our limestones are mostly derived from the ocean, and are composed of shells and corals, ground up and deposited at the bottom of beds of water, and subsequently consolidated into strata of rock. In this process, the fossils, which previously existed, are mostly so destroyed as not to be recognizable. In stately marble the mass is composed of very fine crystalline grains, so that its structure has been compared to that of loaf sugar. But the term "marble" in a more general sense has been applied to any crystalline limestone capable of receiving a polish. Some of it is pure white, other varieties are colored, of many different hues by various impurities.

On approaching the scene of operations we found that they had removed about six layers of limestone, each three or four feet in thickness, with lines of stratification between them, so that the blocks were easily loosened when they had been detached from the layer to which they belonged, by being cut apart with long chisels. Below these limestone strata, the prevailing color of which was white, came a bed of dark, slaty rock, resembling gneiss or mica schist, about seventeen feet thick. Underneath this was the bed of marble which the workmen were excavating. It was beautifully white, and apparently composed of small crystalline scales. The method of quarrying pursued, of detaching the blocks without the use of powder, enabled the workmen to procure noble slabs of the stone. We saw one slab over thirty feet long, six or seven feet wide and between one and two feet thick. The magnificent derrick used to lift them out of place is said to be one of the largest in the world and capable of raising a weight of about one hundred tons.

The interposition of such a mass of dark rock between the upper and lower deposits of limestone is a very interesting geological fact. It is probable that on the shores of the ancient ocean, when the materials of the marble were deposited, some change had taken place which had permitted the inflow of an enormous mass of mud, that had buried deeply the lime deposits which were, before being made, without mixture of any foreign element. In process of time further changes allowed the sea-water to flow in, and the formation of lime deposits again commenced, and formed the beds of limestone which now lie above the dark rock. The slaty structure of this is not due to its deposition in layers, but has been caused by the pressure of the masses above, as is the case also with slates. If a mass of soft material is subjected to heavy pressure in a vertical direction, the effect is to spread it out horizontally, and thus to give it a slaty structure. True gneiss rock contains mica, quartz and feldspar. In the rock from Baker's Quarry I could not trace these three ingredients.

The change of form, by which layers of lime mud are transformed into crystalline marble—said into rock, etc.—is a phenomenon of great interest and importance. It has probably been a process that has required thousands of years to accomplish, and been aided by the pressure of crystallizing material and the mysterious force of crystallization, and in some cases by a tremendous heat and moisture. J. W.

Anecdotes of Edison.

In Edison's earlier life he was employed in a telegraph office which was overrun with a numerous army of cockroaches, against whom the telegraph clerks had long waged an unsuccessful war. The insects seemed to be increasing, and no place on the premises was secure from them. Edison fastened some shining strips of tin-foil on the wall. He smeared these with such food as beetles love, and connected the strips with a powerful battery. The strong electrical current destroyed the roaches.

The electric lamp which Edison invented consists essentially of a glass bulb, which is made as nearly a perfect vacuum as can be procured. It contains a fine filament of carbon, which becomes intensely heated by the passage through it of a strong electrical current, and thus becomes the source of the light. There was much difficulty in obtaining a suitable filament, which should be free from all volatile matter, and yet, after calcining, should have tenacity enough to be used. While experimenting on this point, he remembered a passage in Humboldt's writings which described the properties of a certain kind of bamboo that grew on the banks of the Amazon. As he more closely examined the description he became convinced that in vegetable fibre alone could be found the exact material for which he had been looking. After that, he sent out, from time to time, chosen emissaries to far distant lands, to find the particular kind of bamboo which would best suit his purpose. One person travelled in China and Japan and found a fine fibre, which is still in use. Another explored the shores of the Amazon for twenty-three hundred miles and found many varieties of bamboo. Still later an explorer was sent out to Ceylon, the Indian Peninsula and adjacent countries.

AMID the multiplicity of calls at this day to enter into "practical work," and espouse this or that benevolent cause, as though the prime requisite were that the hands be kept busy, there is danger of overlooking one essential part of the Gospel teaching, namely, the necessity that each follower of Jesus should know Him of a surety to be the Christ, the son of the living God. To this end the apostles labored, and the Gospel record of John was written to set forth this great truth. "These are written," the latter declares (John xx: 31), "that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, ye might have life through his name." In the face of so clear and definite a statement as this, there can be no ground for a Christian society to consider as a non-essential of faith, the question of the Manhood and Divinity of Jesus Christ. Our early Friends were very explicit in their testimony on this point: "We do own and believe in Jesus Christ, his [God's] beloved and only begotten Son, in whom He is well pleased; and who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary; in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins." Fox's Letter to the Governor of Barbadoes.—The United Friend.

It may not be ours to utter convincing arguments, but it may be ours to live Holy lives.

THE GIANT WHO WANTED TO WORK.

S. E. EASIMAN.

In a little Scotch kitchen, with rafters above,
And the wide open fireplace that grandmothers love,
The kettle was making a terrible din,
Would you guess that a giant was prisoned within?

No one knew what he said; no one heeded the noise;
People don't when they live in a house full of boys.
And, with grandma asleep and James on the settle,
Small wonder they heard not the voice in the kettle.
"I'm a giant imprisoned!" the cry came again.
"I have strength for the work of a million of men;
Your ships I will carry, your carriages draw."
Janie looked in surprise, but no giant he saw.

"I can print all your books, and your cloth I could weave;
Your grain I will grind, if you'll but give me leave;
Great weights I can lift, as you quickly will see;
Only give me more room." Come, my lad, set me free.

Just then grandma awoke, and she cried: "Lazy thing.

Have you nothing to do but to hear tea-kettles sing?"
But he answered her gently and told her his plan—
More room for the giant to do all he can.

Just a dream? No, indeed! I will own it was not
When I tell you the name of the lad was James Watt.
'Twas the giant who is working for you and for me;
Aren't you glad that he listened, and then set him free?

"CRY UNTO HER THAT WARFARE IS ACCOMPLISHED!"

JOHN M. NEALE.

Safe home, safe home in port!
Rent cordage, shattered deck,
Torn sails, provision short,
And only not a wreck.
But, O, the joy upon the shore
To tell our voyage perils o'er!

The prize, the prize secure!
The athlete nearly fell;
Bore all he could endure,
And bore not always well.
But he may smile at troubles gone
Who sets the victor-garland on.

No more the foe can harm;
No more of leaguer camp,
And cry of night alarm,
And need of ready lamp;
And yet how nearly had he failed—
How nearly had that foe prevailed!

The exile is at home!
O, nights and days of tears;
O, longings not to roam!
O, sins and doubts and fears:
What matters now grief's darkest day?
The King has wiped all tears away.

The Great Northern Railway experienced much difficulty on their road between Everett and Seattle, where the track runs along the foot of bluffs, from the moving of the earth, which became thoroughly saturated during the rainy season and slid down and covered the tracks. It was an expensive matter removing the earth, and large gangs of men were employed. Finally an experiment was tried with a small boiler of twenty-five horse power and two hundred and fifty feet of cotton covered fire hose, and it was found that the earth could be satisfactorily removed by the hydraulic process. The road now has a regular installed plant, the boiler being located on a flat car, accompanied by another carrying a water-tank. Since this plan has been in operation large quantities of earth have been removed at the points where much trouble had been experienced before, and with such satisfactory results that no detentions to trains have occurred, and the cost has been very much less than under the old method.—The Independent.

A Letter from Germany.

GOTTINGEN, Tenth Month 16th, '90.

You probably know that the number of sunshiny days in this part of the world is fewer than in California—in fact, that spite of barometer and all signs of "clearing up," it can keep on raining here with a pertinacity that I have never before seen equalled, but when it is clear, then it is beautiful, and the Germans know how to make good use of such days. We have been planning any amount of trips for this month, but very few of them have materialized, owing to unfavorable weather. Yesterday and all last night the wind blew almost a gale, but this morning it had cleared off and promised a fine afternoon. The director of the girl's high school, who lives on the first floor, came rushing home during school hours to say we must be ready a little before one, and that we should go to Münden. I had time to look in my Baedeker and see that this place of which I had never before heard was "charmingly situated on a tongue of land at the junction of the Fulda and Werra, the united waters of which form the Weser," and was "a pleasant, old-fashioned town." There was also mention of a "Schloss," several churches of the fourteenth century, and other objects of interest. The word "old" simply electrifies me, and the thought of wandering through narrow streets and climbing old towers fills me with delight. I need not therefore tell you that I was at the station in time, where I met the rest of the party, nine in all.

Göttingen lies in a valley, as I have told you very often, and the branch of the railroad that goes toward Cassel, climbs first the ridge about sixteen hundred feet in elevation that bounds our valley on the West, and then descends on the other side through a picturesque rolling country, which very soon comes to be called the "Weser Gebirge," a general name taking in all the rolling, hilly, region west and north of the Harz.

You will be weary of my ceaseless talk about the German "Dorf," but if you could only look down upon one as it really is, with its red tiled roofs, by age and lichens mellowed into exquisite harmony with the luxuriant foliage that surrounds them, and then, too, seen in the light of such an autumn afternoon—well, you would warm up, too, I judge!

We stopped at a little station on the way, and taking a winding path that led through forests and across meadows, we came in a little less than two hours along the steep slope of a densely wooded mountain side, through whose branches we now and then caught glimpses of a dark, deep blue, which suggested great distance and gave promise of a splendid view as soon as an opening could be found. This was not long in presenting itself, and we looked down in delight and wonder at the picturesque town with its towers and red roofs, lying at the point where the three rivers meet, or rather where the two form the third.

As we were all good Germans (that does not mean that I am not a better American than ever, only being here, I naturally take on German ways), we were too thirsty to remain long, and so following a steep narrow path, we were in a few minutes landed in the back yard of a hotel picturesquely situated at a height of perhaps five hundred feet above the valley, and commanding a charming view—that is to say, from the front of the hotel—the backyard was by no means remarkable, except for the amount of geese that were sauntering about. Here we ordered coffee, and seated ourselves at a table from which, being in a glass-enclosed veranda we had a fine view. One curious German custom is the having at all such places—and their name is legion—postal cards with horribly ugly and highly colored representations of the region about. Often on one postal card one can procure pictures of any where from ten to twenty objects of interest, and all for ten pennance there is just room left to write your name and a few words. So everybody thinks of all these cards. The young girl with whom I went to Berlin, and who was also with me in the Teutenerburgerwald, sent on an average some thing like half a dozen or so a day, and often many more.

All the boarding-school girls "take collections," and each strives to outdo the other in the number and variety that she can produce. But this is a digression—after the postal card had been written (I need not tell you that from the heights of a wisdom which age and experience has brought me, I look down with pity upon such weakness), we descended into the town. Crossing over an old stone bridge we were ushered at once into narrow winding streets with the houses protruding forward, each story farther over the street, as though reaching out in a friendly way to the neighbor on the other side, who in turn leans respectfully forward to meet it half way. In a short time the greater part of the party disappeared in a florist store, and as I prefer the old houses, set myself to try and make out some of the sayings carved in the wood-work. On one read, "Wer Gott vertraut, hat wohlgehat" (who God trusts has well built), and a lot more which I have forgotten.

The old Rathhouse (Townhall), is a finely preserved building from the sixteenth century. I planted myself in front of it and tried to puzzle out the inscriptions, when I became aware of a group of giggling school children playing on the steps. I would see their head peeping round the corner, then a shout of laughter, and the heads would disappear, only to have the same scene repeated. When the rest of the party came up, we went through the building, which had nothing of remarkable in it to hold us long. After making our way through the town, we crossed the Fulda on a beautiful new bridge, and climbed, by a winding path, the very steep hill on the other side of the valley, from the top of which a high tower built on the site of an old ruin command a superb view of the entire surrounding country. It was already past sunset as we reached the top of the tower. The moon, nearly full, was beginning to shed her silvery light over the landscape, and her image was reflected back from the smooth surface of the Fulda at one foot, far, far below us. The three valleys opening out in the three directions, formed a perfect Y, and seen from this height the town was even more picturesque than from the other side of the valley. Although the walls are entirely removed, or used to form the side of buildings, it was perfectly easy to see where they had formerly stood, for within a certain limit the houses were compact as possible, without a vestige of green to be seen among them, the outside this limit the town spread out with plenty of foliage and garden about each.

After seeing so many places of the kind, find I am beginning to have a clearer idea of the history of the development of the country—it begins to soak in, as it were. You see, if the very early times there was no such thin as a walled town in Germany—and those old robber knights did all they could to prevent there being any strongholds not in their own hands. Gradually, however, as the merchant class grew in strength, and the power of the knights was weakened through the crusades and other causes, and as the emperors came to seek aid of the towns, against their too ambitious subjects, the towns gained more and more freedom, and the "Hanse," a combination of the merchants during several centuries, practically had the balance of power in their own hands. I will confess candidly that though I can talk glibly enough about the "Hansezeit," yet the more I would try to explain it, the less I would seem to know.

The churches and cathedrals belong anywhere along in the eleventh, twelfth or thirteenth centuries—the old castles are often more ancient, but the walls and towers, as well as the "Rathhäuser" belong to a later period. In front of the Rathhäuser is always the "market," where to the present day the peasant women come and sit behind their "Kiepen," in which they have their merchandise for sale. Several times a year booths are here erected and all sorts of articles exposed for sale.

I have already told you about the "Jahrmarkt" at Hanover, which comes twice a year and at which times all the public schools have vacation.

We staid up on the tower until the lights had begun to glimmer out among the trees in the valley below. In the town itself were none to be seen, for the houses are too close together to allow them to appear, and we found when we started to cross the town on our way to the station, that the aforesaid lights were very few and far between. We reached it, however, without any mishap, and had long enough time at the station for the members of the party (a German habit which I have not taken on), to drink two glasses apiece, before the train, for Göttingen came along. For the present I must say farewell, for I am already nearly half asleep, and I am sure you will wish I were quite.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Western Yearly Meeting of Friends was opened by a session of the Meeting for Sufferings, on Seventh-day morning, Tenth Month 3rd, at 10 A. M., followed by the Meeting of Ministers and Elders in the afternoon, in which the presence of the Lord was felt and the earnest concern of the meeting was that our annual gathering might be one of special blessing.

On First-day two meetings for public worship were held, both of which were well attended. The Gospel message flowed freely in both sessions, in which invitations to come to the loving Saviour and find rest to the soul that is weary and heavy laden, and warnings of the consequences of rejecting the offers of Redeeming Grace, were clearly set forth. The meetings were felt to be seasons of Divine blessings, and many hearts were made to rejoice in the feeling that the Lord was still mindful of his dependent children.

On Second-day the first session for Discipline was held. Reports were received from all the Quarterly Meetings. The names of representatives being called, all were present except four, for whose absence reasons were given. Asenith Baily, a minister from Ohio Yearly Meeting, attended the meeting, producing a minute of unity and concurrence from the Monthly Meeting and Quarterly Meeting to which she belonged; her Gospel labors were very acceptable to the meeting; there were several Friends in attendance from other Yearly Meetings whose company was very acceptable.

Epistles were received and read from New England, Canada, Ohio, Iowa and Kansas Yearly Meetings. The reading of these tokens of brotherly love brought a feeling of tenderness and love over the meeting for those from whom they came; and a testimony to the feeling of tenderness present caused many to weep in the remembrance of the goodness of God to his church and people.

On Third-day morning the representatives proposed Abel H. Blackburn for Clerk, and Thomas Elmore for Assistant, who were united with. The meeting then turned its attention to reading the Queries and the Answers to them from the Quarterly Meetings. During the consideration of the State of Society, there was much earnestness manifested that the members of our Society should live in accordance with our profession, not being ashamed that the people of the world may know us by the peculiarities that we have ever characterized the Society of Friends.

On Fourth-day two meetings for worship were held. Both sessions were well attended, and again the Gospel message flowed freely, and Friends were much refreshed in spirit, many remarking that it was good for them to be there.

Fifth-day was the last session of the meeting, which was taken up largely by reports from Committees and reading Epistles to other Yearly Meetings. The subject of Education has claimed the attention of Friends more than usual this year, and parents were encouraged to endeavor to give their children a guarded religious education, if it did call for some sacrifice at their hands. A solemn feeling came over the meeting just before it closed, in the remembrance that some who met and mingled with us last year, have been called from works to rewards, and a desire was expressed that if we should never all meet again here in this world, we might meet in the Church Triumphant on high.

The meeting then adjourned to meet at the usual time next year.

A Crisis.

Many are feeling that a crisis involving serious consequences to our people and country has just passed. One of our statesmen speaks of it as deliverance from a perilously near approach to a precipice. Many men of different political views admit that a panic has been barely escaped; although some of these had hoped that after a time better conditions would have resulted. The writer regards the situation as a Providential deliverance from danger, and also as a warning that we cease from doing evil and practice more of well-doing; lest his anger be not passed away, and his hand be stretched out still.

I am reminded of the feeling of impending judgment that preceded the outbreak of our Civil War. My father had been for many years a deeply interested observer of the iniquitous institution of slavery, and earnestly desired emancipation might be peaceably brought about, if consistent with Divine Wisdom. He sympathized with and helped the negroes in his own neighborhood, and sometimes those who had escaped from bondage. With others he was instrumental in having a law passed by the State of Pennsylvania, against kidnaping the colored people. He also labored successfully in preventing the repeal of an important section of this law. Some years before his death he said he did not wish to live to see a Civil War. A short time before his decease he expressed a feeling that slavery was about to be abolished, although he did not see in what way. He died in the Twelfth Month, 1850, several months before the firing on Fort Sumter.

Thomas Evans, who was a spiritual father to me, remarked that he felt that the punishment of the Nation for its complicity with slavery was coming; but he had craved that the Lord would spare us a little longer.

Will we not learn that national sins are punished when persisted in, as surely as individual sins? That a tariff adjustment and reciprocity in trade, will now of themselves restore prosperity to our country, I do not believe. Our expenditures for intoxicating liquors amount to more than a billion of dollars annually; a sum sufficient to liquidate the national debt, or to purchase all the gold and silver that the United States has coined. Notwithstanding high license, local option and local prohibition, the per capita consumption of these liquors is steadily and rapidly increasing. Participation in the profits of the manufacture and trade in these beverages, by licensing their sale, has reconciled our national Government, nearly all of the States, and many municipalities, to depend very largely upon the money derived from this unrighteous business for their revenue.

Seeds have been sown during the campaign just closed, which, if suffered to grow and mature, may produce a bitter harvest. Principles have been advanced that are at variance with sound morality. These have been listened to by hundreds of thousands, and no doubt accepted by many as truths. Men have been taught to believe that the capitalists and employers are the enemies of the laborer, the farmer and the employe; that they accumulated wealth by the unrequited labor of their work-people's hands; and that the remedy for this state of affairs is opposition and retaliation. It will require much wisdom and patient labor to set right those who have been thus misled. Persons who have suffered from unsuccessful business, or from reasonable expectations unrealized, or from severe losses on account of the monetary unsettlement for several years past, should not be passed by on the other side, but sympathized with and assisted by counsel, or in some other more practical way. To love our neighbors as ourselves is a great and noble attainment; and to place ourselves in their position when in trouble, may be a useful and needful lesson to many of us. Above all, let us remember that the Lord reigneth. That He is nigh unto all that call upon Him—to all that call upon Him in Truth. And that "the supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working." James v: 16. R. V. E. M.

TIME-WORK OR PIECE-WORK.—One who is doing his best is pretty sure to have this recognized; and one who is not doing his best may be equally sure that it will be known. A keen observer said, in passing a building that was in process of construction, "I can always tell whether those fellows are doing 'time-work' or 'piece-work.' In one case the blows of their hammers drag along slowly, and seem to say 'By the day, by the day'; in the other case the hammers strike briskly, and say 'By the job, by the job.'" Consciously or unconsciously, our actions show to those around us the spirit that is prompting them. It is the work into which has gone the best life and energy of the worker that finally counts.—Selected.

Friendly Intercourse.

In a recent outing from home of a few days, the writer was favored to enjoy the company of congenial friends, and to partake of the sweetness of social intercourse with those who were endeavoring to walk in the footsteps of the flock of the companions of Christ.

Among the subject of conversation was the efficacy of prayer, and the goodness of our Heavenly Father in responding to those petitions which He first puts it into the hearts of his servants to offer unto Him.

One of the incidents related was that of a sea captain, who was striving to reach a harbor near Cape Ann, but his ship became almost unmanageable, and the darkness occasioned by the storm so great, that he could not tell where he was, and was compelled to let his vessel drive, at the imminent risk of being wrecked on the shore. In his extremity he prayed to the Lord for help, and a gleam of light was sent, which showed him the entrance of the harbor, in which he found shelter and safety.

Another interesting account was that of a manufacturer in Philadelphia, who had consented to give at his expense, an excursion to his workmen and their families down the Delaware River. He made it a condition that the captain of the boat should return in time for the party to take their suppers at their own homes. Towards evening a storm came up, and as he saw the dark and threatening aspect of the clouds, a sense of the danger to which the company was exposed so impressed his mind, that about five o'clock in the afternoon he was led to pray to Him, who controls all things, that He would spare the lives of the people. They reached home in safety. On meeting with one who had been on the vessel, he inquired where they were at five o'clock, and was answered that they were near Chester (a few miles down the river), and that amidst the blackness of the storm an open space, up which they came, seemed like a lane with a wall of thick darkness on either side.

In the course of conversation, our late worthy Friends, Jacob and Phebe W. Roberts were remembered. Phebe's gift in the ministry was a very acceptable one to people in general. She was much led to encourage her hearers to be faithful to the duties called for at their hands, and to hope and trust in the Lord. The remembrance of her and her services is still precious. When Jacob Green, of Ireland, was in this country many years ago, and met with those Friends, he turned to Jacob and said: "Take care of that little woman." It is believed that he faithfully performed this. While somewhat original and bluff in his manner, he was a kind-hearted, sensible man, and a valuable Elder in the Church. Some years ago, one of our ministers felt a concern to pay a religious visit in Ohio, and his mind turned to Jacob Roberts as a companion. He wrote to Jacob suggesting his going with him, and received a letter, which must have crossed the other on its way, offering his services—if a plain countryman would be acceptable. One of the company mentioned that when he was put on the Committee to have charge of the Westtown School, he met with Jacob Roberts, who was also under that appointment, and had been for some years. Jacob wished to caution him not to be unduly sensitive to remarks that might be made, and expressed it in this characteristic way: "The first thing there has to do is to put on the hide of a rhinoceros."

Several other Friends were brought into kindly remembrance—such as David and Morris Cope, Henry Wood and Sarah Street, of Ohio. One who was intimately acquainted and had travelled in company with Henry Wood, said that when out on religious service, he was remarkable for the steadiness with which his mind was directed towards the object of his visit. He did not allow it to relax in social enjoyment until he had felt after any duty that might open. In this he was like Sarah Cresson, of a previous generation, who said she never went into company without in the first place endeavoring to feel whether her Master had any service for her.

An anecdote told of the late Morris Cope was instructive. On one occasion, when a document, prepared probably by a committee, was under the consideration of the Meeting for Sufferings, a proposition was made to strike out a certain paragraph, the omission of which would have greatly weakened the force of the essay. Morris inquired what was before the meeting, and when the clerk stated that it was a proposition to omit that paragraph, Morris remarked, "If you want to say that the exercise of the meeting for the last forty years is of no account, that is the way to do it." No one ventured to oppose this decided statement, and the paragraph was retained.

The subjects introduced into our friendly conference were not all of modern date. An anecdote was told of Nicholas Wain, a prominent Friend of last century, who in his younger years had been a successful lawyer. One day a young man came into his office and told him that he had an offer to be trained as a lawyer without cost. Nicholas simply replied, "I had an income of ten thousand a year, and I quit it."

My Elephant.

His name was "Colly;" he and I were young together.

In those days the business between Boston and India was not done by sending messages to and fro by telegraph wire under the sea, as it is now-a-days. The cargoes were sent from here by sailing vessels, and a sort of confidential clerk, called a "supercargo," was sent with each vessel, to take charge of the business at the end of the voyage, and to buy the return cargo. When I was a young man I went several times to India as supercargo, and once, in the year 1832, as I was about to sail from Boston to Calcutta, on my third voyage, at the age of twenty-two, a man came to me, who wished to import an elephant, and asked me to take an order from him to buy a large elephant and bring it home to him.

We made an agreement, and signed a written contract, which stated that the elephant's height should be measured at his shoulder; a certain price to be paid for ten feet in height, with one hundred dollars added for every inch beyond ten feet, and one hundred dollars less for every inch less.

After I had reached Calcutta and attended to business connected with the ship's return cargo, I started one day to go to an indigo plantation, about seventy miles up the river Hooghly, where, I was told, a man lived who had a herd of elephants. He received me most hospitably and took me out to a grove, where he kept about twelve elephants of different sizes and ages, each chained by one hind leg to a tree. He invited me to make my own choice among them; but as I was quite ignorant of their valuable points, and had not the slightest idea how to judge of them, I told him I would prefer to have him select one for me. This, however, he refused to do, saying that he would not take the risk; and so I finally pointed to a fine, large fellow, who seemed not too old (he was about thirty years old), and said: "There's the one I want."

"Oh," said the owner, "how came you to choose him? I would rather give up any of the others, for he is my finest and bravest tiger-bunter, and I really don't want to spare him." I stood firm, and declared that I would have that one or none, and so we closed our bargain. The high creature measured at the shoulder ten feet and one inch, and I paid for him twelve hundred rupees—equal at that time to about six hundred dollars. I then arranged for his native keeper, or mahout, to come with him to Boston; and although my host pressed me cordially to stay longer with him, and made a tempting proposal (which I longed to accept) to take me next day on a grand tiger hunt, I felt that my business duties and responsibilities were too heavy to allow me to risk my life with a tiger. So, with many regrets, I took leave of my hospitable, pleasant friend, turned my back on the tiger, which, of course, I should have "bagged," and hurried back to town to prepare for my voyage, and make all ready to lodge our giant passenger on board ship.

I had a house, or pen, built for him on deck, and knowing that we should arrive off the New England coast in winter weather, I had a warm covering made for him, thickly wadded with cotton. Fancy an elephant dressed in wadded pajamas!

They swam him down the river nearly all the way from the plantation, and kept him for a few days outside Calcutta, until all was ready. There they put on him a heavy belt, or girth, which I had had made, of four thicknesses of canvas, with heavy iron rings at the top, and he was driven to the dock after sunset, as it was forbidden to bring an elephant into town by day.

At the dock we had a crane such as is used for hoisting heavy goods, and its strong hooks being lowered, and caught into the iron rings on the elephant's waistband, the poor old fellow, trumpeting with terror and dismay, was swung, like a monstrous bale of goods, into the big pen on deck, where he was to spend the next six months at sea. He stayed there very comfortably through the long voyage, petted by all on board. He and I became great friends; and every morning, when I went to his pen to talk to him, I carried in my jacket pockets some pieces of ship biscuit, which he learned to find and take out with his trunk.

His usual food was either rice or gram (a kind of dried pea), and we had a large quantity on board for his use. After cooking it, the mahout would make a sort of hen's nest of hay, fill it with the cooked grain, and lay it as far inside the elephant's mouth as his arm could reach. Eight or ten of these "bird's-nest puddings" were needed for one meal; and when Colly wanted a glass of water, he would draw up into his trunk a whole pailful of one draught, and then, turning the end of the trunk into his mouth, squirt it down his throat. The mahout had a large shovel to use for cleaning out the pen, and one day, when he had left it standing at the side, Colly took it up by curling his trunk into the hole in the handle, and began to scratch himself with the blade all over his sides and wherever he could reach. After that he would never let the mahout have that shovel, but kept it for his own "back-scratcher."

At last our long voyage was over, and we arrived safely at Boston. Colly was as anxious as every one else to go ashore, and a wide, heavy gangway, or landing-stage, was placed from the hip to the pier for him to walk ashore; but he had only taken one step when he felt the planking sag under his weight. He drew back, and he hauled, with all his cries and urging—even abbing him with a sharp goad—could not make him venture farther than to try it with one fore-foot. I told the man to keep quiet and wait, and let him take his own way, for I was sure he would be as glad to be on land as we would be to have him get there.

Before long he began to feel his way again, cautiously pressing on the gangway with both fore-feet; then kneeling down on all four knees, he slowly hunched himself along in that position all the way across to the pier. It seemed wonderful that he should know that by spreading the weight of his body over a large surface he could get over more safely than by bearing on his feet.

He was then delivered to his new owner, who kept him for a short time in an old barn in East Boston. I went there two or three times and took friends to see my big pet, whom I was very sorry to lose sight of, when he was soon after removed to Paris unknown.

During the next six years I went several times to India, and once brought home a rhinoceros for the same man who had had the elephant. Finally I was obliged to take some months away from business, and go for my health to the West Indies. After spending the winter on a coffee plantation in the island of Cuba, I came in the spring to Havana, to sail for home. While waiting there for my vessel to be ready, I was walking idly along the street, when a man came eagerly toward me, calling me by name, and seeming much pleased to see me. When he saw that I did not recognize him, he said: "Why, don't you remember me? I'm the man for whom you bought a rhinoceros, and now I want you to come this afternoon and see my show of animals; the rhinoceros is among them, and I'd like to have you see him. Promise me that you will come. The show begins exactly at three o'clock, and you will really do me a great favor."

I was willing enough to make the promise, as my hours of waiting were slow and tedious. I betook myself that afternoon to the place described, and found my man at the door, impatiently looking out for me. A large audience was already seated in an amphitheatre, and before us, in the nearest cage, was a large rhinoceros. As I stood looking at him, the showman began addressing the crowd, jabbering to them in Spanish. I had learned a little of the language during the winter, and after a time it suddenly struck me that he was speaking of me. I turned about, and saw that every eye seemed to be fixed on me.

"Look here," I cried, "what are you doing? What are you saying about me?"

"Hush! Hush!" said he. "Don't expose me now. I am only telling them that you captured this rhinoceros by a terrific struggle, after fighting him all day in a swamp."

"Let me get out of here!" I said. "I'm not going to stay to be talked about in any such fashion!" So I turned away and walked around through a side passage of the rambling old building, until I came out in a place where I saw an elephant just beyond. As I looked at him I seemed to see a likeness to my old pet of six years before, and I called out to him: "Colly!"

Immediately he raised his head and looked towards me, moving his great ears forward in excitement. As I drew nearer to him a keeper appeared—an American—and called out to me to keep away. "Don't go near that elephant!" he said. "He's very cross to-day, and I dare not go near him myself."

But without realizing my danger, I had already come within the huge creature's reach, and before I could withdraw, he put his trunk around my waist, and drawing me gently up to him, between his tusks, held me pressed against his forehead as tenderly as a human mother would hold her child. I patted him and talked to him, but I was glad enough when he un-wound his trunk from my body and let me go. Then he began feeling about with his trunk for my sea-jacket pockets, where he used to find ship-biscuit at sea, and I called to an old black woman who sat near by with cakes for sale, and bought out her whole stock to feed the good old friend who had remembered me so many years.

The keeper watched all this scene in great excitement, and finally came forward, begging me to tell him what it meant. "For," said he, "I would not have given a farthing for your life when I saw you in the elephant's grasp!"

"Oh," said I, "he is an older friend of mine than he is of yours;" and then I told him the story of my old acquaintance with Colly, and of our long voyage together six years before.

When I turned to leave the place the dear old fellow stretched his head forward to see me as long as he could, seeming to wish I would stay with him; but after one long look backward at the noble creature, I turned a corner and never saw him again.—Our Animal Friends.

The Luciferians.—One of the curious vagaries of the human mind is shown by the existence of a French sect who worship Satan under the name of Lucifer, as the principle of intelligence and life.

A Sectarian Movement at West Point.—Under this heading The Independent gives the following information: "The Government provided, some years ago, a chapel on the reservation for religious worship in addition to that used by the chaplain. This chapel has been free both to Protestants and Catholics. Both have used it, and there has been, so far, no conflict or difficulty of any kind between them. It is not a denominational church, but is maintained by the Government for all who wish to use it.

"Recently the parish priest of Highland Falls started a movement for a Catholic chapel to be located on the ground he owned within the military reservation on Government grounds. The building is intended to be for the exclusive use of Catholic worshippers. The proposal did not, as we are informed, originate among the officers or professors of West Point, and does not command their united support. It is an outside movement, and the money is to come wholly, or almost wholly, from outside sources.

"The question that immediately occurs is, How can the ground be obtained for the proposed denominational building? Manifestly Colonel Ernst, the chief officer, has no power to make such a grant; neither has the Secretary of War. Congress alone, by special enactment, can appropriate Government land for such a purpose. It appears, however, that the Secretary of War has the power to issue a license for the erection of temporary structures, such as sutlers' sheds. The license is temporary and revocable; and those who are working for the church expect to get it. They must have a degree of confidence that the property will eventually be secured. Do they count on holding the land under a mere license? Do they have an idea that no complaint will be filed and no demand made for its revocation? Or do they expect to ask Congress, after the chapel is built, to make the grant permanent? It is significant that it is not to be a temporary structure; it is to be built of stone. If they are allowed to erect it, they could make a strong appeal against any proposition to remove it.

"We trust that the Secretary of War will refuse a license for any denominational church whatever. We do not see any good reason why it should be granted. If such a favor is conceded to the Catholics, it might be conceded to the Presbyterians, the Methodists, or any other denomination that asks for it. It is a dangerous innovation, and ought to be prevented. Let there be a general protest against this movement, not because it is Catholic, but because it is sectarian. Denominational favoritism is forbidden to the Government of the United States."

THE FRIEND.

ELEVENTH MONTH 28, 1896.

In the life of that worthy elder, Joseph Pike, of Cork, edited by the late John Barclay, the editor introduces some paragraphs concerning George Keith, of whom he says:

"On his mind becoming imbued with dissatisfaction towards Friends, the first occasion he took against them in point of doctrine was this: That they did not sufficiently preach Christ's outward or personal appearance, sufferings and death, etc. Indeed, he represented that these important truths were suffered to go into oblivion, were even dead and buried among the Quakers, and that he was raised up to be an instrument in the hands of the Almighty, by whom, in a heavenly vision, he had been expressly instructed to revive and proclaim these ancient foundational truths. Well might Thomas Ellwood exclaim, 'Judge, now, what a conceited opinion this man hath of himself, and what evil thoughts he hath left in concerning Friends, that he could let fly a slander which affects not only all our ministering Friends, but even the body of Friends in general. That suggestion,' continues he, 'is as false as it is foul.' For these great and weighty doctrines, not only always since we were a people, have been, but still are, at this day owned, received, believed, confessed to and acknowledged by the body of Friends, and declared and set forth in our public meetings, in the openings of the Divine Life and in the movings, guidance and directions of the Holy Spirit."

And John Whitney gives a similar testimony as follows: "For my part, I will freely declare (having been conversant among the Quakers from my childhood, and can remember longer ago than George Keith was a Quaker, and have had intimate acquaintance with many of the most eminent among them for many years, and heard their declarations and read more of their books than ever George Keith saw, perhaps, that I never heard or found that they did in the least slight or undervalue Christ's coming or suffering in the flesh, or the fruit and benefit of it in order to salvation; but only that people had made the historical belief of the outward transactions of it all their faith that they counted necessary to salvation, and had neglected the inward work of it. Therefore were they raised up of the Lord to turn people's minds to the measure of Christ's Spirit in themselves, that thereby they might come to know and partake of the benefits of it."

And Ellwood also makes a similar observation, to this import, "That the apostasy in the early ages of the Christian Church was rather from the inward life and power of godliness than from an acknowledgment of the outward appearance and work of Christ in the flesh; inasmuch that, while the latter doctrines continued, from age to age, to be admitted and preached upon every sect of professed Christians, the doctrines relative to the manifestation of Christ by His Spirit in the heart were generally departed from, lost and forgotten. Therefore," continues he, "when it pleased God to raise up and send forth a true Gospel ministry again, in this latter age of the world, to restore Christianity and to gather out of the many professions a peculiar people to himself, it was agreeable to the Divine wisdom to bring to light that which had been hidden, to restore to the nation that which had been lost, to turn people to that which they were most ignorant of and strangers to, rather than that which they professed to know before and had been all along trained up in."

It is a satisfaction to the editor of THE FRIEND to revive these ancient testimonies to the sound and well-balanced character of the doctrines held by Friends in the beginning (and which might be greatly enlarged), because, in some parts of professing Christendom there is a tendency to undervalue the importance of sound doctrines and to speak slightly of them as dry, dogmatic assertions. We remember hearing that worthy minister, Ellwood Dean, of Ohio, in a sermon accompanied by the flowings of Divine life, point out the fact that, although one who had been convicted of sin and repented, should thereafter live a blameless life, yet he needed forgiveness for past sins, and this must be experienced through the atoning grace of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

It is unsafe to rely on the strength of our own intellect in religious matters, in which the only safe guide is the Spirit of Christ, which must be followed and obeyed with the simplicity of a little child.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has issued a proclamation respecting boundaries of land reservations in Alaska, which were found to encroach upon lands belonging to the Greek Church, in contravention of Russia's cession of Alaska.

The official vote of Ohio is as follows: McKinley, 527,945; Bryan, 475,995; Bryan, Popular, 2,652; Levering, 5,969; Bentley, 2,775; Palmer, 1,831; McKinley, 1,232; Palmer, 1,729; Bentley, 630.

Complete official returns in South Dakota, show that the fusionists captured most of the State offices and the local judicial authorities. The Republicans elected three State officers.

Full returns in Wyoming, but with three counties unaffiliated, received by the Democratic State Committee, give all three Democratic Electors small pluralities. The Republicans will control the Legislature in both branches.

The Philadelphia and Reading Railway Company, the successor of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, has been organized with Joseph S. Harris as President. Under the new arrangement, Reading affairs will go on in practically the same hands.

A long distance telephone is now operated from Boston to St. Louis, a distance of 1,400 miles. Bank clearances in the principal cities of the country were extraordinarily large last week, and the New York Bank Clearing House issued a statement unprecedented in its changes, showing the enormous release of bonded money since the election. On Tenth Mo. 17th, the banks here held the election, twenty of the New York banks had less of in the local treasury five per cent reserve. Today there are but three under the limit. Some of the banks have earned 217,062,000 specie, and 1,285,059,928 tenders. Their deposits have increased $22,500,000. Most of the gain was made last week. Deposits increased $21,707,800, legal tenders 57,079,000 and specie 24,206,500. Loans gained 89,553,300. The surplus reserve increased 57,801,650 to $22,500,000. These changes are almost unprecedented in the history of the Clearing House. Just before the election call loans were 97 per cent, while mercantile paper was unsalable and time money exceedingly difficult to get. Now call loans are 2 1/2 per cent. Time money is easily obtained at 4 1/2 per cent. for the different material, and commercial paper is in excellent demand.

A Seattle despatch says that, owing to the crippled condition of the Great Northern and Everett and Monte Cristo Railroads there is liable to be a serious food famine in towns in the Cascade flooded district. Lumbermen of Seattle say that, as a result of the recent flood, 90 per cent of the shingle bolts cut in northern Washington were swept down the various rivers and out to sea, and that from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 feet of logs were driven through the booms and lost.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 374, which is 10 less than the previous week and 15 less than the corresponding week of 1889. Of the whole number 190 were males and 184 females; 45 died of consumption; 42 of heart disease; 34 of pneumonia; 17 of diphtheria; 14 of nephritis; 14 of apoplexy; 14 of crop; 12 of old age; 13 of typhoid fever; 13 of bronchitis; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of convulsions, and of various causes.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1864.—Sixth Month 26th.—How I feel that I love, thee, Oh, Lord. Oh, thou art worthy of the adoration of my whole being. Thou forgivest all my iniquities and transgressions, for I have had to repent my want of faithfulness his day. How merciful thou art? I renew my covenant with thee, to serve thee more continually. Oh, bless me, Lord, I beseech thee.

Seventh Month 3rd.—Thou saint to me, oh Lord, "commit thy way unto the Lord, trust also in Him, and He shall bring it to pass." I did try and thou didst help me. Like as a father pitieth his children, so thou didst pity me in my conflicts to-day and through the week. Oh, be with me in my journey, and preserve me from all evil. Keep me prayerful.

The following letter of encouragement was received about this time by her from our late esteemed friend, Samuel F. Balderston, in relation to her appearance in the ministry.

"Seventh Month 12th, 1864.

"My dear friend, Deborah Brooks:—Very thankful do I feel, more than I can express, on thy account, forasmuch as thou hast found strength to give up to the call of Him, who has a right to our best service and is worthy of all we can offer unto Him, for all we have or can have, is all his own.

"I do desire thy encouragement in every good work, and my heart is filled with gratitude, that several mouths have been opened of late in our meeting. My prayer has been, that the Great Lord of the Vineyard would raise up and send forth into his garden both servants and handmaidens to labor for the advancement of truth and righteousness in the earth, and amongst us as a people.

"Let us look singly unto Him, who is all-sufficient for us, whose power is over every other power, and whose promise is sure, 'I will never leave thee nor forsake thee,' dear friend. 'It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes.' My soul longs for better times amongst us, when the Lord shall arise and have mercy upon Zion; when his Divine presence and power shall be more known in our assemblies, and his name exalted above every name, and also when Divine love and godly zeal shall take the place of that indifference and lukewarmness which is displeasing in the sight of Him, who demands the surrender of the whole heart.

"May it please Him to arise for his great name's sake, and for his dear Son's sake, and for Zion's sake, and cause this wilderness to become like Eden again, and this desert like the garden of the Lord, that joy and gladness may again be found amongst us, thanksgiving and the voice of melody."

"Under feelings of near Christian sympathy with thee and unity of spirit, I am sincerely and affectionately thy friend and fellow pilgrim, "S. F. BALDERSTON."

D. B. spent her vacation in the summer of 1864 in New England, and writes to L. H. B.:

"Boston, Seventh Month 28th, 1864.

"Time passes away so quickly, and I find it so difficult to seize quiet opportunities amidst all the company and sight-seings incident to home visits of this kind, that letter-writing, except those to tell of intended visits, seems sometimes almost out of the question. This must be my excuse to thee, for not hearing earlier from me. I wanted to sit right down after receiving thy last kind messenger, and say how relieving it was, but time would not permit. How nice it would be if some of my present enjoyments could be shared with thee. Two weeks ago to-day I left Philadelphia for Newark, and remained with sister Sarah one night, then took the Sound boat to Groton about five o'clock the next afternoon. That part of Long Island Sound between Long Island and New York is called the East River, and it was delightful sailing on it, that evening. I never enjoyed a ride so much. The water, just as formed by his hand, underneath, the calm sky above, the beautiful banks each side, covered with objects of interest, and we floating in such a palace, the genius of those who devised it having also been bestowed by the same Bountiful Hand.

"It seemed as though we were surrounded by his living presence, perhaps that gave all the charm to me. What is worth so much as his love, good presence and countenance in this world? Is not that why thou loves the country so much? How much more delightful it is to be able to see the Divine Hand in all. Luther could say, 'All is thine, and we are thine.'

"We got in our berths again about nine o'clock, rose again near one and took the cars for Providence. Brother Stephen met me about four, and conducted me to his home, where I got a good nap and felt better, having been sick some on the cars. The change of water almost always affects me at first, being a little impregnated with sea-salt, I suppose. What a pleasant visit with kind and attentive kindred I had there. One day I went to bathe in 'old Ocean' at Newport, and enjoyed those fine breakers highly; another, we dined on a 'clam bake' and chowder by the Narragansett Bay.

"Last week, on Sixth-day, I came to my darling sister S's. Her son is still at home on account of his wounds, but must go back soon.

Another son went to the Gulf, but we fear has been lost. Come and see me, when I get back, for it seems impossible to tell all.

"The last two pages of this letter are being written, on the twenty-first, at my niece's, at Somerville, near Boston, where her husband has bought a nice home. How I would like to introduce you to each other. She is so gentle and lovable. Yesterday and to-day have been such busy days. They want to show their curiosities, and I am just as glad to see most of them. We went to the Natural History Rooms, a public school in the morning, and in the afternoon to the Boston Museum. This is well worth seeing, so do visit it whenever this way. Everything is so nicely marked. I never could believe there was anything like a mermaid before, but there were two—a kind of fish about two feet high, with a head resembling a monkey, found in or near Japan.

"This morning we had a delightful walk amidst beautiful scenery beyond Charlestown. The country is so dry, it has rained scarcely any for nine weeks here, and the air seems filled with fine dust. We went to Charlestown this afternoon, visited the prison and walked around Bunker Hill Monument. I hardly expected ever to see this place, but it seemed all right to go, and I guess it was not wrong. Tomorrow we intend to see a public school examination, and the next morning go down to 'Sandwich,' so it will probably continue for two weeks more, then it will be our turn to entertain company. But dearest Laura, thou wilt rejoice for me, that I feel so calm and happy. It seems to me sometimes that I feel the dew of heaven on my spirit, and the passage, 'I will be as the dew unto Israel,' came so sweetly to-night. I hope thou hast much peace in quiet patience and trust. My dear aged aunt, Avis Keen, at Lynn, a minister for many years, said last Seventh-day, 'that once in early life, being very anxious, she heard a voice say, 'Trust more and toil less.' Trust in the Lord, with all thy heart, and lean not to thy own understanding.'"

"PROVIDENCE, Eighth Month 4th, 1864.

"Dearest L.—. . . My dear friend, if this belief did not pervade my mind, that our friendship was as firm as though tried by fire and water, I should be much troubled at this long delay. The original of these words, or the former copy, was given according to date to Anna's husband to mail for me, and he being in a hurry in the morning concluded to wait until noon before dropping it in the box, and hung up his coat in the office. In the course of an hour the building caught fire and he barely escaped with his life. A piece of the coat was taken from the water in the cellar, and this letter found in the pocket. My first impulse was to send the first, but the smell of fire had passed upon it. The fire turned the red post-stamp black. It is quite a curiosity. Excuse my copying instead of writing anew, for being storm-staid here there seemed a little chance to copy, but not compose. Lysander's loss was over one thousand dollars, besides a three hundred dollar watch, etc. The thick hunting-case was recovered, but the inner works were ruined.

"Sandwich and Scituate have since been visited with much pleasure, and now I am homeward bound. . . Thine truly, D. B." (To be continued.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Cain Quarterly Meeting.

On the twelfth of Eleventh Month I went to Cain to attend the Quarterly Meeting, held in the old stone house at Cain, on the brow of the North Valley Hill, overlooking the great Chester County limestone valley.

The journey from Philadelphia to this spot is an interesting one geologically. After passing through the gneiss rocks about Philadelphia, the railroad gradually approaches the valley, and for a number of miles keeps on the ridge of hromyrica shales which border it on the south, and which as we go westward greatly widens. This rock is a peculiar one, very slaty in structure, comparatively soft and having a greasy feeling, like talc. Probably from this character it was formerly called Talc Slate. The soil it makes is less fertile than that derived from the decomposition of the Gneiss rock, which contains feldspar, but it readily responds to the efforts of the farmer, and produces good crops when manured.

As the road approaches Downingtown it gradually descends into the valley, and we find there a heavy bed of limestone rock, which extends westward into Lancaster County and eastward to and beyond the Schuylkill River. This valley is believed to have been in former ages occupied by an arm of the sea, and the limestone to have been formed by the deposition of corals and shells, ground up by the action of the waves and afterwards consolidated into rock by pressure, heat and other forces which have made such wonderful changes in the earth's surface. These calcareous materials must have been deposited in horizontal beds, but now the layers of rock are steeply inclined, a clear indication of the stupendous forces which have operated in this region.

At Downingtown we were met by a kind friend, who seems to consider it a part of his life work to wait upon Friends.

The Ridge which bounds Chester Valley on the north—North Valley Hill—rises quite abruptly from the lower ground. Two or three miles beyond Downingtown, a lively little stream—Beaver Creek—comes down through a gap in the hill, giving the motive power in the distance of about a mile to five mills. Up this ravine, the road climbs to the top of the hill, and leads to the beautifully situated meeting-house. The rock of the North Valley Hill is a Primal Sandstone. After meeting, we dined at the house of a friend, situated at the foot of the hill, where Beaver Creek emerges from the ravine. In the yard were some large flag-stones, probably taken from the hillside. Penetrating these were some branching crystals of black Tourmaline. The composition of the mineral is principally of silic, alumina and oxide of iron. These ingredients were doubtless present in the material out of which the sandstone was formed, and a portion of them was dissolved in the heated water which at one time permeated the mass, and from this solution they were crystallized in the form in which we now see them.

One of the company who dined here was a Friend from North Carolina, and the conversation not unnaturally turned somewhat on the trials which Friends in that State endured during the late civil war. Among the incidents related was the following:

Friends generally were opposed to the secession movement, but besides that, their peace principles would not allow them to join the army. The Confederate drafts were enforced with unrelenting strictness, and thus many Friends were brought into much suffering. On one occasion a woman Friend who was in delicate health called her young family together and told them that she expected her husband would be taken in the next draft, and she did not think that she could survive the shock, and they would be left without father or mother. One of the children, about five or six years old, was deeply affected, and, when alone, prayed earnestly to his Father in heaven that his earthly father might be spared. Some of the neighbors had determined that the Quaker should be drafted, and especial care was taken that his name should be put into the box from which the drafted names were to be drawn. But the prayer of his child was answered, and his name remained untouched.

At one time some Confederate troops came into the neighborhood of Friends' settlements, and arrested five Union men who had acted as pilots in facilitating the escape of some Union men to the Chowan River, which was then the boundary line, in those parts, between the portions of the State under the control of the Union and Confederate forces. The prisoners were to be marched to the Chowan River, and then put to death. As the party approached Winston, a Union gun-boat coming up the river fired some shells over the town, which so alarmed the commander that he ordered his command to disband and each one to take care of himself. The five prisoners at once made their way to the wharf, and were received in safety on the Union vessel.

The war was unpopular in many parts of North Carolina, and of those who were conscripted many deserted from the ranks. After some unsuccessful efforts to capture them, the Confederate officials seized the wives of the deserting men and carried them to camp, and as there was no one left at home to cook and care for the children, many of the men surrendered themselves, and thus obtained the release of their wives.

During the Revolutionary War the approach of the British army caused much fear among the farmers of Chester Valley. The mistress of one of the households gathered up her silverware and gave it to a German boy in her employment, with instructions to hide it safely. Some months after, when the alarm had subsided, the boy was questioned as to what had become of the silver, and he produced it from under a flat stone in the bottom of Beaver Creek, where it had been hidden.

On the side of the turnpike road leading westward from Downingtown stands a stone, with the inscription, "I. M. to T.," meaning one mile to Downingtown. The stone-cutter misunderstood the order, and it is said all the stones on the road, which leads to Harrisburg, have "T" instead of "D," owing to the German pronunciation. J. W.

The Grand Canyon of the Colorado River.

BY BISHOP WARREN.

Before me lies a thin bit of red rock, rippled as delicately as a woman's hair, bearing marks of raindrops, that came from the South. It was once soft clay. It was laid down close to the igneous Archaean rocks when mother earth was in her girlhood and water first began to flow. More clay flowed over, and it was hardened into rock. Many strata, variously colored and composed, were deposited, till our bit of beauty was buried thousands of feet deep. The strata were tilted variously and abraded wondrously, for our earth has been treated very much as the fair-armed bread-maker treats the lump of dough she doubles and kneads on the molding board. Other rocks of a much harder nature, composed in part of the shells of inexpressible multitudes of ocean's infusoria, were laid down from the superincumbent sea. Still the delicate ripple marks were preserved. Nature's vast library was being formed, and on this scrap of a leaf not a letter was lost.

Beside this stone now lies another of the purest white. It once flowed as water impregnated with lime, and clung to the lower side of a rock now as high above the sea as many a famous mountain. The water gradually evaporated, and the lime hung like tiny drops. Between the two stones now so near together was once a distance of more than a mile of impenetrable rock. How did they ever get together? Let us see.

After the rock making, this vast plain was lifted seven thousand feet above the sea and rimmed round with mountains. Perhaps in being afterward volcanically tossed in one of the old world's spasms, an irregular crack ripped its way along a few hundred miles. Into this crack rushed a great river, perhaps an inland ocean or vast Lake Superior, of which Salt Lake may be a little remnant puddle, and proceeded to pulverize, dissolve, and carry away these six thousand feet of rock between the two stones. There was fall enough to make forty Niagaras.

I was once where a deluge of rain had fallen a few days before in a mountain valley. I tore loose some huge rocks and plunged down a precipice of one thousand feet. The rock at the bottom was crushed under the frightful weight of the tumbling superincumbent mass and every few minutes the top became the bottom. In one hour millions of tons of rock were crushed to pebbles and spread for miles over the plain, filling up a whole village to the roof of the houses. I knew three villages utterly destroyed by a rush of water only ten feet deep. Water and gravitation make a frightful plow. Here some prehistoric Mississippi turned its mighty furrows.

The Colorado River is one of our great rivers. It is over two thousand miles long, reaches from near our northern to beyond our southern border, and drains three hundred thousand square miles of the west side of the Rocky Mountains. Great as it remains, it is a mere thread to what it once was. It is easy to see that there were several epochs of work. Suppose the first on top of the upper limestone rock to the depth of several thousand feet. This cutting is of various widths. Just here it is eighteen miles wide. But as such rocks are of varying hardness, there are many promontories that distinctly project out, say, half a mile from the general line, and rising in the centre are various Catskills and Holyokes, with defiantly perpendicular sides, that persisted in resisting the tightly rush of waters. Their foundations were it away by the mighty flood, and occasionally ic slides thundered into the chasm, leaving the all positively perpendicular.

We may now suppose the ocean waters near exhausted and only the mighty rivers that ad made that ocean left to flow. Indeed, the sing Sierras of some range unknown at the resent may have shut off whole oceans of rain. The rivers that remained began to cut a much arrower channel into the softer sand and clay below. From the great mountain rimmed lateau rivers poured in at the sides, cutting teral canyons down to the central flow. Between these stand the little Holyokes aforesaid, ith greatly narrowed base. Then I go down ith most reverent awe and pick a little ripple-in-marked leaf out of its place in the book of ature, a veritable table of stone written by the nger of God, and bring it up and lay it alonge of one formed cone after at the top. They oth be brothers formed by the same forces and r the same end.

Standing by this stupendous work of nature ay after day I try to stretch my mind to some rge computation of the work done. A whole ay is taken to go down the gorge to the river. t takes seven miles of zigzag trail, sometimes ightfully steep, along shelves not over two et wide, under rock thousands of feet above nd going down thousands of feet below, to get own that perpendicular mile. It was an in-ense day's work.

There was the river, a regular freight train, unning day and night, the track unincumbered with returning cars (they were returned y the elevated road of the upper air, burdened ith dissolved rock and earth. A slip into this iver scarcely seemed to wet the foot; it seemed ather to coat it thickly with mud rescued from a plunge toward the sea. What unimaginable ounts the larger river must have carried in ounted ages. In the short time the Missis-ppi has been at work it has built out the land t its mouth one hundred miles into the Gulf.

In the side canyon down which we worked ur sublime and toilful way it was easy to see e work done. Sometimes the fierce torrent ould pile the canyon bottom with every vary of stone from the whole mile deep into one remendous heap of conglomerate. The next ush of waters would form a channel through is and pour millions of tons into the main iver. For years Boston toiled in feeble imitation of Milton's angels to bring the Milton Hills to the Back Bay and South Boston Flats. Boston made more land than the city original-ly contained, but it did not move a teaspoonful ompared with these excavations. The day as full of perceptions of the grandeur of vast ock masses never before suggested, except by he mighty mass of the Matterhorn seen close y from its Herault shoulder.

The section traversed that day seemed like a ighty canyon full of vast sublimities while e were in it, but the next day, seen from the im as a part of the mighty whole, it appeared ite indeed. One gets new meanings of the ords almighty, eternity, infinity, in the pre-ence of things done that seem to require them ll.

In 1869 Mayor J. W. Powell attempted to ass down this tumultuous river aided by nine een, and with four boats specially constructed o the purpose. In ninety-eight days he had ade one thousand miles, much of it in extrem-est peril. There was no possibility of climbing o the plateau above for weeks at a time.

Any great scene in nature is like the woman yu fall in love with at first sight for some pose of head, quietly carriage, auroral blush of color, penetrative murmur of voice, or a glance of soul through its illumined windows. You do not know much about her, but in long years heroic endurance of trials, in the great dignity of motherhood, in the unspeakable comforts, and in the supernal and ineffable beauty and loveliness that covers it all, you find a richness and worth of which the most ardent lover never dreamed. The first sight of the canyon often brings strong men to their knees in awe and adoration. The gorge at Niagara is one hundred and fifty feet deep; that is far short of six thousand six hundred and forty. Great is the first impression, but in the longer and closer acquaintance every sense of beauty is flooded to the utmost. I was out before "joyous day stood tiptoe on the breezy mountain tops."

I have seen many sunrises in this world and one other. I have watched the moon slowly rolling its deep valleys for weeks into the sunlight. I knew what to expect. But nature always surpasses expectations. The sinuosities of the rim sent back their various colors. A hundred domes and spires, wind sculptured and water sculptured, reached up like Memnon to catch the first light of the sun, and seemed to me to break out into Memnonian music. As the world rolled, the steady light penetrated deeper, shadows diminished, light spaces broadened and multiplied till it seemed as if a new creation were veritably going forward, and a new "Let there be light" had been uttered. I had seen it for the first time the night before in the mellow light of a nearly full moon, but the sunlight, really seemed to make, in respect to breadth, depth, and definiteness, a new creation.

One peculiar effect I never noticed elsewhere. It is well known that the blue sky is not blue and that there is no sky. Blue is the color of the atmosphere, and when seen in the miles deep overhead, or condensed in a jar, it shows its own true color. So, looking into this inconceivable canyon, the true color came out most beautifully. There was a background of red and yellowish rocks. These made the cold blue blush with warm color. The sapphire was backed with sardonyx, and the bluish white of the chalcodony was half pellucid to the gold chrysolite behind it.

One great purpose of this world is its use as significant symbol and hint of the world to come. The communication of ideas and feelings there is not by slow, clumsy speech, often misunderstood, originally made to express low physical wants, but it is by panorama, charade, and parable, making things and relations of earth as hintful of greater things as a bit of float ore in the plains is suggestive of boundless mines in the upper hills, and as the joy of finding one lost lamb in the wilderness tells of the joy of finding and saving a human soul. One never goes to any of God's great wonders to see sights, but to live life.

The old Hebrew prophets and poets saw God everywhere in nature. The floods cap their hands and the hills are joyful together before the Lord. Miss Proctor, in the Yosemite, caught the same lofty spirit, and sang:

"Perpetual masses here intone,

Uncounted censers swing,

A psalm on every breeze is blown;

The echoing peaks from thine to thine

Greet the intwelling King;

The Lord, the Lord is everywhere,

And seraph-tongued are earth and air."

The Bakers' Just Grievance.

There occurred in THE FRIEND of Seventh Month 20th, 1895, brief reference to a public complaint made by journey-men bakers and confectioners of Philadelphia, against the demand for the serving of fresh bread and pastry, and of tea, on the First-day of the week. The grievance of these unjustly-worked men has not been forgotten. The Woman's Health Protective Association having had their sympathies enlisted in the matter, have recently, by a committee which had been appointed, made report of their investigation to a conference to which had been invited representatives of ministers' meetings, delegates from labor unions, proprietors of bakeries, and representatives of the journey-men bakers.

This report, as commented on by Charles Roads, an earnest, sympathetic Methodist minister, who was present, "showed," he says, "a condition of things in our city, and which existed in all large cities more or less, that is really incredible for shocking, filthy degradation, unhealthiness, and petty but intolerable tyrannies over work people. What do you think of baker-shops with pet dogs, cats, birds, mice, cockroaches and other vermin abounding everywhere? With beds in the same room for the men who are compelled to labor seven days in the week and from fourteen to eighteen hours a day? Places were described where the room was hardly ever scrubbed or washed, and men who seldom found time to wear any other clothes than the light garments comfortable in the close and hot underground bakeries."

Not only the sanitary aspect of the subject was discussed, but the personal degradation consequent upon such conditions of daily toil, with the ethical question of no First-day rest and no right observance of the day. They must start in to work at six o'clock in the evening of Seventh-day, and continue until about ten o'clock on First-day morning, when their state of exhaustion and heat is such that they are ready to throw themselves down upon a couch, which is not infrequently in the same room where they have been baking. "In many cases, however," says C. Roads, "they go out to deliver the bread to customers, many of whom are selfish and thoughtless church members who must have absolutely fresh bread on Sabbath morning, though it is gotten by the life-blood or heathenish despoiling of fellow-men of all religious and civilized privileges."

It is further remarked that the addresses "of these cruelly oppressed work-people were remarkable for good sense and moderation. Their regard for the rights of their employers was in striking contrast with the popular notion that work-people who are 'discontented' are anarchistic and violent in language. They ask for the enactment of a law which will close bake shops and confectioneries on the Sabbath and regulate their sanitary condition and work hours."

In four States, of which New Jersey is one, laws have been enacted which it is hoped will be held constitutional, and will prove practicable. It is proposed to petition the legislature of Pennsylvania for a similar statute at its coming session. J. W. LEEDS.

"To the reformer, in an especial manner, comes home the truth that whose ruleth his own spirit is greater than he who taketh a city. Patience, hope, charity, watchfulness unto prayer,—how needful are all these to his success!"—The Scottish Reformers.

HOLY SPIRIT, LEAD THOU ME.

MELVILLE WYANS MILLER.

O Holy Spirit, lead Thou me!
Thy Jesus blood I come to Thee,
And in His name alone I pray
That Thou wilt lead me day by day.
Except Thou art
Within my heart,
Except Thou come and lead my soul,
I cannot reach the heavenly goal,
Nor do on earth the Father's will,
Except, dear Lord, Thou come and fill
My soul each day,
And show the way
Of safe and sure escape from sin,
The precious Christ I cannot win;
And so I come and cry to Thee,
O Holy Spirit, lead Thou me!

O Holy Spirit, lead Thou me!
In Christ's dear name I plead with Thee,
Take Thou my trembling hand in Thine,
And lead me, Comforter divine!
Teach me Thy will,
And do Thou fill

My soul with Thine own self each day,
That I may do as Thou shalt say,
That I may yield myself to Thee
And be as Thou wouldst have me be.
Thou hast the power
To lead each hour—

O come, dear Lord, in all Thy might
And flood the way with heavenly light;
Make plain my path and lead Thou me,
O Holy Spirit, lead Thou me!

O Holy Spirit, lead Thou me!
Except each step I walk with Thee,
I cannot keep the narrow way,
Nor yet please Thee a single day,
Be Thou my guide,
With me abide,

And lead my wayward soul until
With joy I do Thy blessed will,
Until I love with all my heart
To follow Thee; Thy strength impart,
Thy power bestow,

Until I know
Beyond all doubt that Thou art near
To help me conquer every fear,
O let me thus be led by Thee,
Thus, Holy Spirit, lead Thou me!

O Holy Spirit, lead Thou me!
Lead me as seemeth best to Thee;
Take Thou my little life and choose
For me my path; if Thou canst use
Me any way

O then I pray
That I may always hear thy call
And, hearing, faithful be in all
Thou givest me to do and be.
Help me each day to trust in Thee;
And I beseech

Thee, Lord, to teach
The things of God to me and guide
My steps aright; yes, let me hide Myself in Thee and ever be,
O Holy Spirit, lead by Thee!

THE CARPENTER'S SON.

"Is not this the carpenter's son?"

The query of the one, prompted by pride,
Showed what was the offence; and still offences,
How oft we judge ourselves, how oft we find
Should be despised; no calling can be mean
If it is useful. No occupation
Honorable, and properly performed,
But what may elevate. The Saviour wrought
With his reputed father as his trade—
Doubtless industriously. He was one
In all things faithful; his every act so showed
We fail'd to comprehend his dual life—
He seem'd so human, and, withal Divine
He taught by precept—by example more;
Of whom 'twas said, "No fault was found."

A Brief Account of the Life of Daniel Barker.

Daniel Barker, son of Enoch and Elizabeth Barker, was born Seventh-day of Tenth Month, 1803, in Randolph County, North Carolina. He was of very delicate health in childhood, and after he was grown he suffered a great deal of bodily pain, having had one hip and shoulder put out of place, and his breast bone fractured by a tree falling on him; still he was able to do light work, and raised a large family of children, five boys and six girls. He was a wheelwright by trade, also a farmer, and could turn his hand to almost any kind of work.

He was married the seventeenth day of Second Month, 1825, to Lydia Davis, who proved to be a faithful and agreeable companion, both in spiritual and temporal affairs, for fifty-three years, after which she was called from works to rewards; she having been an Elder thirty-three years. Daniel was always religiously inclined, and had many Divine visitations in his youth; his motto being all through life, to do as he would be done by. When he was but a small lad he dreamed he was in a great crowd and some one gave him a large water-melon and a trumpet, and told him to take the melon and go around to all the people and blow the trumpet as he went, which he did, but when he finished his round his melon was gone.

That dream, I believe, was a foresight of his work in the ministry; the trumpet representing his voice and the melon what he had to communicate, because he said his feelings when speaking in meeting were just such as he had while going around and blowing the trumpet. We heard him say if there had been the encouragement in his young days that there was of late years, no doubt but he would have been preaching before he was fifteen years old. He was of a very timid disposition, from which he suffered a great deal in his mind; even after he felt that he was called to preach the Gospel, he could not for a long time overcome sufficiently to arise in meeting and relieve his mind of the few words which were from time to time presented clearly to his view; the enemy trying all the while to make him believe that if he did begin he would not hold out; so he let one call after another pass without yielding, each one causing deeper distress of mind, until he felt that he could bear it no longer, and at last he decided to obey if the call to speak in meeting was ever renewed again; which shortly occurred and at the same time a voice seemed to say to him, if thou fails this time all will be done; so he arose and spoke the words which were presented to him at that time, which had a great effect on the meeting, and he felt much peace of mind. From this time on he always endeavored to move forward in this line as he was led by the light and life of the Holy Spirit.

In First Month, 1843, he was acknowledged as a minister by Holly Spring Monthly Meeting, in Randolph County, N. C. His father, after travelling as a companion with him to some meetings which he had appointed, said to him: "I can tell thee something which, I expect, will surprise thee; there was exercised in thy sleep, when thou was but a child, just like thee is now while speaking in meeting. Thy mother and I have listened to thee many times and we believed then, if thee lived and kept thy place, thee would be a preacher;" but it surprised him only to know that they heard him.

Second of Seventh Month, 1843, he writes as follows, "It has rested for some time on my mind to pen down some of my experience in passing through many trying seasons and deep afflictions of body and mind, having experienced a considerable share of both, which I believe has been as the chastening of the Lord, through adorable mercy, designed for the humbling of my spirit, and drawing my mind into a state of whole dependence on Him, the everlasting Fountain of Light and Life; blessed forever be his Holy Name; He has not left my soul in the pit, but has often appeared to the comfort of my poor drooping mind, delivering me as out of the mouth of the destroyer, and making a way for escape where there seemed to be no way. Though many have been my backslidings and turnings aside from the true path of rectitude, yet He hath still followed me in judgments, always remembering mercy O, may the remembrance of these things bring me into a more steadfast watchfulness and entire resignation unto his Divine will and requirements, at all times and on all occasions, being prepared to say in sincerity and in truth, no my will, but thine, O Lord, be done."

At one time, while lying down to rest, whether awake or asleep I do not know, he appeared to be in a room, on one side of which he saw pictured a man with an awful, fierce, disagreeable looking countenance, and after inquiring who that was, he was told it was Satan, and was bid look on the other side of the room which he did, and there he saw another picture with an exceedingly beautiful and lovely countenance, and told that was Jesus Christ. This scene made a deep and lasting impression on his mind, and he often spoke about seeing more or less of one or the other in the countenance of people with whom he met.

From 1841 to 1847 he was engaged much of the time in visiting the meetings and Friends in North Carolina and Virginia. He then visited Ohio and Indiana Yearly Meetings, and in 1851 attended most, or all, the Yearly Meetings on this Continent. In 1853, his wife accompanied him, visited meetings in Canada, Iowa, Kansas and Indiana. In 1855 he visited some meetings and Friends of Indiana Yearly Meeting, some Indians under the care of Friends attended the setting up of Western Yearly Meeting, also attended Baltimore Yearly Meeting. In 1855, visited New York and New England Yearly Meetings. In 1866, Ohio Yearly Meeting, and some meetings in Tennessee. In 1868 he labored amongst Friends in Philadelphia and Baltimore. In 1875, he again visited meetings and Friends in Canada, also attended Indiana, Western Iowa, Kansas, Ohio and Baltimore Yearly Meetings. In 1881, he attended Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and in 1882, he labored amongst Friends in the verge of Baltimore Yearly Meeting. He also travelled extensively in North Carolina after this, and between the times of his visits to the Northern and Western States, laboring earnestly for the salvation of souls, and for the upbuilding of the cause of Zion.

While writing sketches of his travels through one journey, he says, "How necessary it is to those who go into the work of the ministry to watch, yeo, to keep the eye to their Leader, and move only under his direction; may this be my situation at all times, giving the praise to Him to whom alone it belongs."

For the benefit and encouragement of those who may read these lines and who have the care of children, especially mothers who are left to train them in the way they should go, I will pen down a portion of two of his letters written to his family at home, which, with many other show his great anxiety for the welfare of his children.

ren, both spiritual and temporal, while under the care of their mother in his absence; and was fully concerned when at home with them, for when he would often gather them around him and read a portion of Scripture, after which he would often engage in fervent prayer or speak in testimony, thus drawing their minds from the things of this world and pointing them to the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world; earnestly exhorting them to be obedient to the manifestations of the Holy Spirit a their hearts; often reminding them of the uncertainty of time, and the necessity of being prepared for a better world when called to give an account of the deeds done whilst here in the body.

Brandy is Sapping the life of the French Nation.

A bill for the increased taxation of alcoholic drinks has been before the French parliament over a year. In one of the debates in the chamber of deputies Dr. Sannelongue said as he summed up a long presentation of government statistics and medical facts concerning the injury to the public health worked by the abuse of alcohol:

"In France alcoholism has really existed only for fifty years and in the world only for a century or two. Looking at the spectacle which alcoholism now presents to us everywhere, we have the right to ask what will become of humanity under such conditions."

Dr. Leon Labbe, after a long examination of the subject, said in the senate:

"I do not wish to use words for effect, but I am forced to acknowledge that this question concerns the very future of our nation."

The amount of alcohol taxed for human consumption in France has been trippled in ten years. Within fifteen years the number of recognized liquor shops has increased by more than one hundred thousand, bringing the total number close up to five hundred thousand for over than forty million of men, women and children.

From Saturday evening, when workmen are paid, until Monday evening (not morning) you cannot walk one hundred yards in the working-men's streets without meeting a drunken man. Monday is taken to wind up the debauch, when he week's wages have not been already spent. A case is cited of one workman who had lost his reckoning of time and staggered back to the factory on Monday. When told what day it was, he at once left work on principle. Monday evening is the noisy time. Little parties are to be met coming home from the resorts in the suburbs—father, mother, children and friends—staggering along together to the tune of some sentimental song shouted at the top of their voices. They have all been drinking the same liquor—brandy, at six or even four cents a glass when there is money enough; otherwise the cheaper potato spirits or poisonous bitters and their injurious drinks are used. These can be sold at almost any price, since they cost the seller only a cent for many glasses. They are cheap because they are made of the refuse "heads and tails" from the distilleries of industrial alcohol.

The hardest drinking is done by the iron workers and coal heavers. In a mill employing one hundred and fifty men the manager knew only five whom he could send safely into the city. Even to these he did not dare intrust any distant commission, as without supervision they would leave their work for drink. In another establishment fifteen men were relatively sober out of two hundred. None of the others could walk fifty yards along the street without stopping to drink at a liquor shop. One of them never went to his work or left it unless accompanied by his wife.

Dr. Tourlot, while at his detective work, saw one hundred and fifty glasses of bitters sold in ten minutes in a saloon near one of the large factories. He took particular pains to observe the lower class of workmen along the wharfs. For this purpose he served in one of their resorts. At the zinc counter there are men in rags drinking. Around the door are women and children, with hungry faces, waiting for the little money that may escape the clutches of the liquor seller. These dock workers earn from five to seven cents an hour. They scarcely pay more than five cents a day for food, and for two cents they can lodge at the Sniffing Flea or some similar inn. All the rest of their money goes for strong drink.

The coal heavers at the docks constitute a higher class of workmen. They earn from two to three dollars a day and feel themselves well. They do not drink, so to speak, in working hours, contenting themselves with five or six cups of coffee during the day. With each cup they take four cents' worth of brandy (more than two "ponies"). But when night comes, they drink up all that is left of their pay except what the wife has managed to get from them. Often the wives grow tired of this existence and become worse drunkards than the men. After thirty-five years of age the muscular strength of the coal heaver is gone, and he becomes a common workman along the wharfs.

WE take a kind of personal pride in the following statement by ex-Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, in regard to the effect of prohibition in that State. We were there when that memorable contest was going on and cast our vote for prohibition; and we recollect the predictions freely given out as to the evil effect of it, should it be adopted. Ingalls knows whereof he affirms, and it makes us glad to hear his testimony as given in a Furor article.

"Kansas has abolished the saloon. The open dramshop traffic is as extinct as the sale of indulgences. A drunkard is a phenomenon. The barkeeper has joined the troubadours, the crusader and the mound builder. The brewery, the distillery and the bonded warehouse are known only to the archaeologist. Temptation being removed from the young and inferior, they are fortified and redeemed. The liquor seller, being proscribed, is an outlaw, and his vocation is disreputable. Drinking being stigmatized, is out of fashion, and the consumption of intoxicants has enormously decreased. Intelligent and conservative observers estimate the reduction at ninety per cent. It cannot be less than seventy-five. . . . One of the most significant and extraordinary results is the diminution of crime in the State. At the January (1889) term of the district court of the county in which the capital is situated there was not a single criminal case on the docket. Many city and country prisons are without a tenant. The number and percentage of the convicts in the State penitentiary have been remarkably diminished."

"In the economy of God, no effort, however small, put forth for the right cause, fails of its effect. No voice, however feeble, lifted up for truth, ever dies amidst the confused voices of time."—The Scottish Reformers.

Diminution of Game in Africa.

The vast herds of game which once ranged over the steppes are being rapidly reduced in size and number. Plains which, in the days of Andrew Smith, Oswell and Gordon Cumming, were thronged with antelope, are now treeless, and many of the species seem destined soon to follow the quagga and white rhinoceros into extinction. Man, no doubt, has played a leading part in the annihilation of the enormous herds that once thronged Cape Colony. The fact that, during the last few years, the game has retreated from the Somali coast into the interior, shows how easily it can be driven from a district. Nevertheless I doubt the justice of charging sportsmen with the main responsibility for the destruction of the big game.

In South America a mammalian fauna, much richer than that of Africa (for it included no less than fifty-eight genera of animals larger than a big dog), has been destroyed since a time which, though before the date of the human occupation of the continent, was geologically recent. Man has, no doubt, helped to exterminate some species, but his influence has probably been insignificant compared with that of natural agencies.

Lions are abundant on all the game-fields, and Jackson and Mackinnon once saw twenty-three in a single herd on the Kapti plains. The number of animals such a herd must destroy every year is enormous, and disease is probably more effective in the process of destruction. When Jackson returned from Uganda in July, 1890, he saw, between Baringo and Naivasha, herds varying in size from one hundred to six hundred buffaloes, six times in a single day, and Tekei, while at Njemps, in January, 1888, shot no less than fifty-three individuals in the month.

In the same district, in 1893, I did not see a single buffalo. Five years before, the buffalo was almost the commonest of the big game in British East Africa. The whole number I saw was four—a herd of three in the Tana Valley, near Nyatana, and a single bull in the valley of the Thika-thika. The explanation has been supplied by Gedge, who followed Jackson a few months later. Several times a day his caravan had to diverge from its path, to avoid the stench from a rotting carcass—in fact he saw fifteen in one day, but he did not see a single living buffalo. Cattle disease had swept through the country and destroyed them all.

The gnu and the giraffe have suffered almost as badly. I only saw one of the former, and one herd of the latter, both on the Kapti Plains, but in the valley of the Thika-thika I found giraffe bones nearly every day, and once saw the remains of six skeletons on a single march. Giraffe and gnu are both subject to the same disease as the buffalo, and thus, in British East Africa, they have almost shared its fate.

Though disease unquestionably aids in the work of extermination, it can scarcely cause the destruction of whole faunas, for one malady only seems to attack a few species. We must look to some other cause to account for the vast accumulation of bones belonging to animals of different species and of different habits, from which most of the remains of fossil mammalia have been derived. These huge piles of bones have always been a puzzle to geologists, for, as Sir Henry Howorth remarks, "Nor would any causes we know to be operating now, account for the caches or heaps of incongruous beasts found in precisely the same fresh condition, and yet piled together in confused masses. This mixture of animals of different habits and habits—of carnivores and pachyderms and herbivores—is most puzzling, especially when the remains show, so often, a common freshness and an unworn and an ungnawed appearance. Death certainly has no favorites, and is singularly neutral in its methods, but it does not, in its normal moods at all events, collect great mylodons and thickly-hided megatheres, nimble opossums and safely-cuirassed glyptodonts, caries and mastodons, and kill them together and bury them together."

This singular association of bones is one of the arguments on which Sir Henry Howarth bases his theory of the destruction of the great extinct mammalia by a deluge. On the march across Laikipia, however, a different explanation of the phenomenon impressed itself forcibly, and even painfully, on my mind. The plateau had been described to me as one of the richest game-fields in Africa, and I trusted to it to supplement our scanty food supply.

Here and there, around a water-hole, we found acres of ground white with the bones of rhinoceros and zebra, gazelle and antelope, jackal and hyena, and among them we once observed the remains of a lion. All the bones of the skeletons were there, and they were fresh and ungnawed. The explanation is simple. The year before there had been a drought, which had cleared both game and people from the district. Those which did not migrate crowded around the dwindling pools and fought for the last drop of water. These accumulations of bones were, therefore, due to a drought, and not to a deluge.

The only animal in the extermination of which man is playing the leading part is the elephant. The date of its extinction, however, is far distant, for, in some districts, it is still so numerous as to be a serious plague to the inhabitants. On the borders of the Kikuyu country elephants occur in such abundance and do such serious damage to the plantations, that an elephant-hunter would be welcomed as warmly as if he were a medieval knight-errant come to do battle with the dragon. Lions, also, are numerous, and do terrible damage to the herds. Their tracks occur everywhere, and though I only saw them thrice, I heard them very frequently.

J. W. GREGORY.

The action of those warm-hearted Peruvians who dispatched a vessel with a cargo of provisions, tents and clothing, valued at forty thousand dollars soles, in aid of the sufferers by the terrible fire at Guayaquil, Ecuador, as well as the promptness with which the Peruvian Government ordered a war vessel at Paíta to collect all available supplies and hasten with them to the stricken city, should receive more than passing notice. This is not the mere generous outpouring of superabundance toward a friendly State, but the sharing of their own insufficient store to help suffering kinsmen. For Peru is poor. She has struggled against adversity for years, since the time when her generous defense of brow-beaten Bolivia called down upon her the crushing power of Chile. Not only has she been poor as a nation, but her people have been plunged into poverty, against which they have struggled with fortitude akin to heroism. Hence, to bestow gifts with such free hand as this is magnanimous and self-sacrificing in the highest degree. And to this must be added the circumstance that Peru and Ecuador have long been estranged on account of a boundary dispute that nearly led to war.—The Independent.

THE notorious Sheats Law is a thing of the past. Conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity, it has had a short, inglorious life, and has died a fitting death. For alleged violation of this statute, seven teachers of the Orange Park School were indicted, arrested and bound over in the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars each to appear before the Clay County Circuit Court for trial at the Tenth Month term. At a hearing on the twenty-first, Judge R. M. Cole presiding, a motion was made by counsel for the defense to quash the indictment. This apparently might have been easily done, but the defense preferred to get a decision upon the main question, the constitutionality of the law. The State's attorney was therefore allowed to file additional information, and two of the indicted teachers voluntarily gave him facts to support their own indictment. An exhaustive and masterly argument was then submitted by the counsel for the defense, Bisbee and Rinehart, of Jacksonville, objecting to the statute as vague in its terms and contradictory in its provisions; as unconstitutional in that the body of the statute contained what was not in its title; as arbitrary and unreasonable, creating a crime where none existed, and so going beyond the police power of the State; as needlessly abridging the natural rights of property, contract and personal association, thus conflicting with the Fourteenth Amendment to the National Constitution; as discriminating against the rights of teachers to pursue their lawful and useful calling unimpeded by restrictions laid upon men of no other business or profession; as being founded simply and solely upon the distinction of color in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The reply of the State's Attorney entirely failed to meet this powerful and just impeachment. The Court without hesitation decided that the body of the statute, in exceeding the scope of the title, violated the Constitution of Florida, and that the law was therefore unconstitutional, null and void.—The Independent.

HOW A BOY MEASURED A TREE.—He is not a boy in a book; he lives in our house. He seldom says anything remarkable. He eats oatmeal in large quantities, and tears his trousers, and goes through the toes of his boots, and loses his cap, and slams the doors, and chases the cat, just like any other boy. But he is remarkable; for he asks few questions and does much thinking. If he does not understand he whistles.

There was much whistling in our yard one summer. It seemed to be an all-summer performance. Near the end of the season, however, our boy announced the height of our tall maple to be thirty-three feet.

"Why, how do you know?" was the general question.

"Measured it."

"How?"

"Foot rule and yardstick."

"You didn't climb that tall tree?" his mother asked anxiously.

"No'm; I just found the length of the shadow, and measured that."

"By the length of the shadow, and measured that?"

"Yes'm; but twice a day the shadows are just as long as things themselves. I've been trying it all summer. I drove a stick in the ground, and when the shadow was just as long as the stick I knew that the shadow would be just as long as the tree, and that's thirty-three feet."—Bright Jewels.

A GREAT "BASE LINE" SURVEY.—The United States Coast and Geodetic Survey has just finished its labor in the field upon the most stupendous geodetic survey ever undertaken in any country, and which gives to the United States the longest base line upon which to establish subsequent surveys in existence in the world. It is known as the transcontinental arc, and lies along the thirty-ninth parallel of north latitude, extending from ocean to ocean. Its eastern end is at a point on the Atlantic coast ten miles south of Little Egg Island light-house, below Cape May, and its western end is six miles north of Punta Arenas lighthouse, on the Pacific, several miles above San Francisco.

According to the radius of the thirty-ninth parallel, as given by Bessel, the famous astronomer of Königsberg, Germany, who first calculated the diameters of the earth and measured the distance from the earth to sixty-one Cygni, the nearest fixed star, the length of the arc as measured by the Coast and Geodetic Survey officials is one hundred and eleven feet in error, and according to the radius of the same parallel as fixed by Sir Andrew Clarke, of Glasgow University, the error is ninety-eight and a half feet. But General Duffield, superintendent of the survey, declares that these variations from the heretofore established standards show error in them, and not in the calculations of his scientists. By the measurements made on the line, and which have been aggregated in the office here, the arc at sea level for the entire distance—that is, following the curvature of the earth's surface—is 2,625.8 miles in length. The establishment of the radius of the thirty-ninth parallel from these measurements is a matter for further calculation.

The value and vastness of the work just accomplished cannot be intelligently appreciated by the unscientific mind. It was begun by the Survey nearly, if not quite, half a century ago. Progress upon it has been spasmodic, but some work has been done every year since the beginning. It has cost the Government about $1,000,000, but the expenditure is said by the officials to be fully justified by the importance of the project.

Russia and China are the only other countries on the globe wherein a base line of anything like equal magnitude is possible, and in neither one is it likely to be surveyed for many years. The longest base line heretofore surveyed was that in India, running north and south, about a thousand miles in length.

European scientists have been greatly interested in the progress of the American arc, and its completion will doubtless cause the receipt by the Coast and Geodetic Survey officials of many congratulations from abroad.—Friends' Intelligence.

In the English Notes, in our last issue, appeared a reference to a speech made in London by a cultured Indian gentleman, in which he spoke of the chief drawback to the Christianizing of India being the loose morals and practical contempt for Christianity manifested by the European residents. This is not to be wondered at, and we were prepared for similar statements from other quarters. McNabb, of Foochow, China, contributes an article on "Foreign Community Life" in the pages of the Missionary Review of the World for Tenth Month, in which he comments on the same sad facts. Open and disgusting immorality abounds in all the treaty ports. The Europeans seem recklessly and viciously immoral. Is it any wonder that it has seen said: "The Chinese at first feared and respected those who came to their shores. By degrees the respectful fear of the Chinese passed into haughty contempt. These community people constitute the mighty barrier to the progress of Christian missions in China."—Recorder.

"BIND THEM ABOUT THY NECK."—The reference here is to a custom common among many peoples in all ages, the wearing of some small article suspended from the neck, next the skin of the breast. They have generally been looked upon as charms, to avert evil from the wearer. Sometimes they signify the special caste. The young Brahmin, when initiated into the rites of Brahminism, has a silken thread bound loosely round his neck. This thread he must ever wear through life. To cast it aside is apostasy, and he greatest struggle in the baptism of a Brahmin convert is the breaking of this thread. Not unlike the symbolism of the Brahmaic thread was the golden bull worn by patrician boys among the Romans, and the lorica, a scrap of eather, with signs or letters written on it, worn by all free-born boys, whether of noble rank or not. The charge in this passage is to cling to mercy and truth more tenaciously than to rank and fortune. The custom goes back into the earliest antiquity. On the oldest mummies of Egypt are found words written upon scraps of papyrus, tightly rolled up and sewed in linen, and suspended round the neck; and the custom of wearing these amulets appears to have been derived from Egypt by the Israelites. But instead of the little figures of the various deities, or the scarabæi, with the name of the god or king inscribed, which were also often used by the Egyptians, they used words and verses from the aw, written on tiny strips of parchment, and rolled up, which were supposed to avert the evil eye, or remedy deleterious influences on heir children. Not only is this continued by the Jews, but the custom has descended to the Arabs of the present day, who use sentences of the Koran stitched up in leather, and hung from the neck of adults as well as children. The talnuds has many allusions to the use of these charms, which were believed often to cure diseases. They were in use also among the early Christians, but were denounced as leading to superstition, and finally forbidden by the council of Laodicea.

"WRITE THEM UPON THE TABLE OF THINE HEART."—Not on the tablets which thou useth or the daily memoranda. These tablets were thin wooden boards, on which wax was thinly spread, and a style, or small pointed stick, served as a pen. When done with, the writing, thus cratched, was obliterated by simply warming the wax and smoothing the surface for future use, as plates are used by modern school-boys. The permanent impress on the heart is contrasted with this perishable writing.—H. B. Tristram, n S. & Times.

EXTRACT FROM THE LETTER OF A DECEASED FRIEND.—"A piety which brings peace and confidence, as the result of regeneration, is a piety which practises self-denial, endures the cross, despises the shame. The one who possesses his piety will be industrious, temperate, frugal, making money when he can honestly, and giving freely but judiciously. Doing good to the souls and bodies of men, feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting the sick. This piety despises a slavish conformity to the world's fashions, and condemns and repudiates its follies. Yet it is ever courteous and refined. It manifests itself alike in the parlor, the kitchen, the nursery, the counting-room, the exchange, the field, the barn, the political assembly, the halls of legislation and of justice, as well as in the assembly of the Church, exemplifying in practice "Whether, therefore, ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do to the honor and glory of God."

Land Grabbing Nations.—The Independent states that in 1884, Great Britain held control of about 8,400,000 square miles outside of Europe. This area has now increased to about 11,000,000 square miles. The French territory has advanced from about 665,000 square miles in 1884 to 3,291,000 square miles. The most of this addition has been in Africa. Germany had no foreign territory in 1884, but has since taken under her control more than 1,000,000 square miles, mostly in Africa. The Congo Free States, under the control of the King of Belgium, contain about 11,000,000 square miles. The Independent adds:

"These figures, which we take from a careful historical summary in the London Times, shows plainly what was evident to every impartial observer, that land-grabbing is not a sin of a single nation. If it be a sin, Great Britain, France and Germany are about equally in fault. There is no question that their action, arbitrary as it sometimes has been, utterly indifferent to the supposed rights of the native population, has been on the whole for their benefit and for the progress of civilization. The next twelve years is likely to see this division of the world among three or four great European powers carried a great deal further, unless China shall speedily learn the lessons of its lately broken up. The Turkish Empire will probably, to Great Britain, and probably Persia to Russia.

Egypt will go to Great Britain, and France will move steadily forward to the border of Egypt. But what will become of the Transvaal and the Portuguese possessions in Africa depends on whether the South African colonies shall become an independent republic."

The Venezuela Dispute.—Late information from England brings the cheering news that the British Government has consented to an agreement with Venezuela, the practical issue of which will probably be to refer the boundary dispute of the Government to the decision of arbitrators. We ought to be grateful to the Prince of Peace for this additional evidence of the spread of righteous principles.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 5, 1896.

In our issue of Eleventh Month 7th we inserted an editorial from the New York Independent on the "Moral Issues of the Campaign." This has elicited at least half a dozen communications—about half in approval and about half in disapproval of the article. Of those who united with the sentiments it contained, a part would have preferred that it should have been issued before the election, so as to have had some influence on that event. In reply to these Friends, the Editor says, that he desires to remember that THE FRIEND is not a partisan paper, and that he does not wish to contend for either of the two leading parties any further than in so doing he can promote the great principles of morality. Indeed, for several past years, he has been so impressed with a sense of the evils that flow from the consumption of intoxicating beverages, that his vote has been given in support of prohibition, as the most important issue that claims the action of our citizens.

The correspondence in connection with the article referred to furnishes an instructive illustration of the extent to which men of equal intellectual ability, and honesty of purpose, are influenced by their predilections, and by the atmosphere in which they live. Two of those who have favored the Editor with their criticisms, think the Editor of the Independent unjustly condemns the Chicago convention for the plank which denounces the Federal Government for interfering in the Chicago riots which grew out of the railway strikes; and that it is not just to say that that utterance "accuses law and order, and excuses rioting and disorder." While we do not remember the occurrences of that trying period with sufficient accuracy to decide between The Independent and our critics, yet our impression is strong, that the charge in The Independent is practically correct, whether verbally so or not; our intelligent readers can determine this point for themselves. Probably they will generally unite in the assertion that "arbitrary interference by Federal authorities in local affairs ought to be avoided," and yet many may think that interference was justified by the circumstances and situation at the time.

Another correspondent diverges into a consideration of the hardships which induced the workmen at Chicago to enter upon the strike. This has so remote a connection with the question at issue, that it need not detain us. He criticises also the statement of The Independent that "the Government sold its bonds for gold," etc., saying that although this was partially true, yet the great bulk of the bonds was bought with legal tender. He thinks, and we have met with similar assertions elsewhere, that the financial legislation of the country has been directed to favor the capitalists and to oppress the poor.

We do not know on what grounds such a charge is made, although we can readily conceive that persons hearing this statement repeatedly made, may honestly come to believe its truth. It has been one of the glories of our country that the path to eminence and fortune was restricted to no class of its inhabitants (except by the system of slavery), and that any one possessing the requisite abilities, and willing to practice the needed exertion and self-denial, might advance therein. Indeed we need not go far back until we find that the most wealthy of our citizens sprang from families of very moderate means.

The point in this campaign which has given the Editor the most uneasiness and concern, has been what seemed to him the effort, for partisan purposes, to induce the laboring classes to look with enmity on the more wealthy, and to imagine themselves to be unfairly treated.

It would be a happy circumstance for our country, if the ordeal through which we have just passed, should induce honest and well intentioned men to use their efforts to remove everything which is unjust and unequal from our laws and practices, and to cultivate that spirit of benevolence which aims at the universal good of mankind.

The fact should also be inculated that the laboring and the monied classes are each necessary to the other, and that those dispositions should be cherished which would tend to harmonious relations between the employer and employed. We think it is cause for gratitude that the excitement which during the recent campaign occasioned much apprehension in some quarters, has so generally disappeared, and the results of the election have been so quietly and universally accepted.

Hullab H. Bonwill again appeals to the benevolent for help for Indians and white people in Kansas, many of whom are very destitute. Clothing and bedding for men, women and children may be forwarded to Doughton, Wilkins & Co., 204 Market Street. The needful repairing will be done on the articles purchased. She also wishes twenty-five dollars to purchase shoes, etc. The money may be forwarded to Joseph Hall at Friend's Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Treasury Department has issued a call for the redemption of United States 6 per cent. bonds, amounting to $9,000,000 face value, issued under the act of Seventh Month 1st, 1862, and Seventh M<sup>o</sup> 2nd, 1864, in aid of certain Pacific Railroads. These bonds are commonly known as currency sixes, and became due First Month 1st, next.

Colonel Wilson, Superintendent of Public Grounds at the national capital, reports that 1,315,440 persons at the act of the Washington monument since it was opened to the public eight years ago, in Teuth Month, 1888.

The vote on equal suffrage amendment was: For, 12,126; against, 6,282; majority for amendment, 5,844.

The officials of the Secretary of State of Georgia say that there was no election in Charlton County, Ga., and nobody in the county knew that there was an election. The famous Okefenokee swamp covers most of the territory of Charlton County, which is on the Florida line. According to the reports, the are several towns in the county, with Walker's Hill as the County seat, but all efforts of the Secretary of State to get returns from there has proved unavailing, and it is considered a certainty that no election was held.

A despatch from San Antonio, Texas, says: "The rush of corn shipments to Mexico through here has been the heaviest ever known during the past three years, and the transferring capacity of the roads at the border has been taxed to its fullest. The great bulk of corn comes from Kansas, Iowa and Nebraska, where it is purchased for 10 cents to 15 cents per bushel, and sold in Mexico as high as two dollars per bushel, Mexican currency. In addition to these shipments by rail, heavy quantities are being made by water for the more southern States of Mexico."

Complaint is made that in the Cape Cod cranberry bogs the native pickers have been supplanted by Italians, Finns and Swedes, and that thus another American industry has passed into the hands of foreigners. In regard to another and more celebrated New England industry, that of wilding, visitors to the Cape of recent years have not failed to notice that Portuguese immigrants and West Indian negroes form the bulk of the crews. The New York World says Provincetown has a large and thrifty Portuguese colony inhabiting almost the very spot where the Filizian mothers did their work, and was doing in the new land. From the lower portion of Allegany County, Md., the farmers reported recently a strange migratory movement of a large number of hawks. A flight of hawks, about two miles in width, that was fully three hours in passing, crossed the valley in a southwesterly direction. "The sun was obscured for a mile by the moving black cloud." One farmer was satisfied as to the species of the birds, fired into the flock and brought down six. They were found to belong to the bird, and not to the chicken hawk species.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 359, which is 15 more than the previous week, and less than the corresponding week of the previous year. The total 179 were males and 210 females; 32 died of consumption; 46 of pneumonia; 25 of heart disease; 21 of diphtheria; 17 of bronchitis; 15 of old age; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of nephritis; 12 of cancer; 11 from casualties; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 10 of bright's disease; 10 of cholera; 9 of convulsions; 9 of inflammation of the brain; 9 of paralysis.

De-patches from the northwest of the 25th and 26th of Eleventh Month, report that the heaviest storm known in Montana for years is raging all over the State, and the mercury at different points is from 10 to 40 degrees below zero. The storm which had been raging in Minnesota and the Dakotas for forty-eight hours, is the worst since the great blizzard of First Month, 1888. Railroad traffic is almost suspended owing to the snow.

Benjamin Arthrop Gould, the well-known scholar and astronomer, died in Boston on the 26th ult., as the result of a fall.

RUSSIA.—The Nova Venetia, an inspired St. Petersburg journal, says: "The policy of Russia is not to support the action of the other Powers, but to enforce her own will. No matter what massacres of Armenian and other Christians may occur, the isolated action of Russia is a practical reality."

The Berlin Government is fully aware that this is the policy of Austria, and is dreading about what Austria's developments, Germany well knowing that Austria is ready to strike at an opportune moment to check the ascendancy of Russia in Turkey. The sum of the present position is that the Porte, backed by Russia, will continue to play its old game of delusive reforms with impunity.

On condition to recently a feather dealer in London received 6000 birds of paradise, 300,000 birds of various kinds from the East Indies, and 1,400,000 humming birds. In three months another dealer imported 256,328 birds from the East Indies.

There is a striking outlook for a settlement of the dock laborers' strike at Hamburg. Committees have been appointed on both sides to make some concessions. The strikers number 6000.

The latest discoveries among the older rocks of the Palaeozoic age, says "Popular Science," shows the existence of dragon flies measuring over two feet in the expanse of wings. These are much larger than the reported traces of enormous insects discovered about a year ago. The wings were found at a horixant period was upon the same gigantic scale.

The wife of Nansen, the famous Arctic explorer, is the owner of a remarkable carrier pigeon, which, after being away from his home for nearly two years, winged its way back over a thousand miles of frozen waste and yet another thousand of ocean and frost and plain. After the striking white wing, brought to Nansen, telling his wife that he was well and that the expedition was doing finely.

It is stated that the British Colonial Office has decided to send a commission to the British West Indies to examine into the critical position of the sugar industry.

A decree was issued on the 26th ult., by General Weyler notifying all growers of corn in the province of Pinar del Rio, Havana and Matanzas to ship all corn in their possession to the nearest towns and settlements. After Twelfth Mo, 20th all corn found in the possession of farmers will be regarded as contraband and the owners liable to imprisonment. Permission has been refused planters in Cuba to grind sugar cane at their own risk.

Official statistics show that there are now 17,340 soldiers sick in the various military hospitals in Cuba. Of this number 1438 are suffering from yellow fever.

The month of March, 1862, presents an instructive object lesson in Government control of railways has been followed by the debate in the Brazilian Congress, growing out of the bill to lease the Brazilian Central Railway to a foreign syndicate.

The Central road, with its branches, covers 500 miles of the best traffic producing districts in the Republic. The main line extends from Rio Janeiro, on the north, to St. Paul, in the south, with an important branch west to the State of Minas. The road was built some years ago by the Government, at an expense of $150,000,000, and earned for a time an income of $16,000,000 annually, several millions of which being clear profit. Of late years competition on the road has been given as a reward for political activity, the various of one party succeeding each other with the various changes of administration. In many cases the salaries were largely disproportionate to the character of the service performed, while in nearly every case the best experts were employed, the ablest and highest were unfit for their places. The debates in the Congress which disclosed these facts also showed conclusively that the road, instead of being a paying investment, is steadily losing money at the rate of $2,000,000 a year.

Advices from Winnipeg, Manitoba, state that the worst blizzard in years raged the latter part of last week throughout the Canadian province. At Winnipeg snow drifts eight to ten feet high are common and the wind was blowing at the rate of fifty miles an hour.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1864.—Eighth Month 26th.—The following from a letter to a brother and sister:

"PHILADELPHIA, Eighth Month 26th, 1864.

"I wanted to go to Arch Street Meeting yesterday, not having attended any for a week. L— went with me, and we were well paid for the effort. Thomas Evans rose with the words, Oh, Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? Oh, Judah, what shall I do unto thee? For your goodness is as the morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away." He thought this was the heartfelt language of some, and gave us encouragement to greater watchfulness and prayer. The last part of the same text had been mournfully in my mind in remembrance of the past week, and his words confirmed my apprehension of my greater need of withdrawal from the world. Oh, to be in the world and not of the world. The Apostle said, that when he was at 'home in the body, he was absent from the Lord,' and he chose rather to be 'absent from the body and present with the Lord.' I often think of this, and desire strength to be faithful. Sometimes heart and flesh and strength fail in the thought of being as a fool, always. Then tribulations work patience and joy in Him, so I am comforted in the prospect of the end. I thought afterward, what should I not be willing to pass through, to be able with Divine power to comfort others, as He confirmed, strengthened and comforted me, even under a cross. I sometimes so wish that everybody knew the Saviour and the rest there is in Him. Thomas quoted Lamentations, third chapter, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth verses, which always come very close home to me."

Ninth Month 18th.—Oh, my God! My God! How am I before Thee? Thou didst preserve me in my journey and kept me near to thee and gave me peace. But how have I repaid thee since? I have given up to one temptation and another, till I am covered with sin. Thou art merciful, and hast strengthened my hands marvelously this day in my secret prayer for the coming week. I come unto thee, poor, worn and weary. Help, Lord, for all the Godliness ceaseth in me without thy succoring aid.

Tenth Month 9th.—Thanksgiving redound to thee this night for thy mercy. Last night, while

I was beseeching thee for it, here in my quiet chamber, thou remembered me and stayed the raging fire at my school-room. All praise be unto thee. Oh, help me to live more and more faithfully before thee.

16th.—I do not feel much condemnation this night for the week past. O, Lord, thou knowest my trials, how I want to be as an empty vessel before thee, and how words come into my mind out of meeting, and make me fear they are my own planning. I can appeal to thee, that I try to be like clay, without a will. Oh, Lord, have mercy on me; give me clearness, give me faith.

23rd.—I feel joy and peace in my soul this day, and a trust in Divine mercy. I have tasted living bread and living water during the week, and have been permitted sometimes to sit in Heavenly places in Christ Jesus. What shall I render unto thee, O, Lord, but the adoration of my whole soul. Make me faithful in every duty.

30th.—A morning of peace and an afternoon of conflict, drawing nigh to my Saviour, asking Him to humble me. This evening remembered the Comforter promised to those that love Him. Help me to show I love thee by keeping every commandment, oh, my Lord and my God.

Eleventh Month 6th.—I have not been entirely thine this week; given up to some unusual temptations. Oh, when shall I get every hoof out of Egypt, and not serve my old taskmaster in any one thing? Forgive, oh Lord, and blot out. Thou hast cheered me this day, oh, my Father. Thou enable me to give up, and then come close to me, and told me thou loved me. Oh, it was precious, and I felt thy banner over me was love.

3rd.—The twelfth chapter of Isaiah has comforted me so much this week, and I have indeed drawn water out of the wells of salvation sometimes.

20th.—My heart feels sad to-night, I am afraid I am not led by the pure Spirit of Christ. I cling to thy feet, to be cleansed from all filthiness of flesh and spirit; crucify all my vanity and every lust, and lay me lowly in the dust.

22nd.—This day was Monthly Meeting, and I am confirmed in believing that I am led by the spirit of self love and vanity. Oh, Thou who cast up seven devils out of Mary Magdalene and still loved her, cast this wicked spirit out of me. Pour out in thy mercy thy Holy Spirit! The unclean spirit will not go out of me, but by my submitting more and more to fasting and prayer and silence. Oh, God of mercy, help me, that I bring not disgrace upon thy cause. Oh, shut me up forever or take my life away.

27th.—The past week has been one of as great humiliation and contrition as I ever passed through. I felt when I laid down last night that He had given me a holier spirit, and that I sought his glory more continually. Lead me in the paths of judgment, oh, Lord.

TO L. H. B.

"Twelfth Month 1st, 1864.

... "Sometimes I feel that 'The joy of the Lord is my only strength.' When we can turn inward and feel his presence there, watching over us and protecting us, giving our daily bread and the living water, forgiving us all our trespasses and shortcomings; this is joy indeed, with which none can intermeddle. My thoughts since Third-day have been so much on the little seed of the kingdom planted in every heart, the world over, whether they ever heard of the Saviour or not, or know of the Bible. The principle is in every one, and they know whether they do right or wrong. It is the Saviour's spirit, whether they know it or not. How I wish that every one of us, who are taught to know what it is, and esteem it, would bow more and more deeply to it, that it may grow and increase, and send forth its branches into all our conduct, like the spreading tree, that we may sit down and rise up and walk under the shadow thereof. Solomon says, 'I sat under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit was sweet to my taste.' How often I think, 'Hide me under the shadow of thy wing,' and do now desire it for thee, dearest, for I know thou often feels exposed and tempted, in thy struggles to come out from the world and be separate from its chafy spirit. Oh, that we may each one of us be gathered in the end as pure wheat into his garner there, forever to celebrate his great mercy in visiting and saving us. Oh, dear L—, how I love thee this moment, and desire that we may both strive each day to walk in white before Him. . . . The school-room often brings around me many chasteing cares. Twenty-two little ones are to be instructed by words, by books and by example, and I am to keep calm, sweet tempered and good. How can it be done unless helped by his good Spirit. These words sometimes come so sweetly, 'When earthly vapors close around thee, climb to the mountaintops of faith and prayer. Dearest L—, think of me, and pray for me sometimes, too, when thou art bowed in deepest humiliation, before that high and Holy One, who dwells also with the contrite and humble heart. There is much more that I could say, but sometimes I find I am to 'pour out my soul' only before Him. Be assured of my endeared love and intent.

"D. B."

Twelfth Month 4th.—I do not think my heart has been enough established in fear, before the Almighty. I wait and ask for wisdom, but I forget the fear of the Lord that is wisdom, and to depart from evil is understanding." Oh, that I might with my whole heart depart from everything which is not for me to indulge in. I have renewed my covenant with thee this afternoon, and thou art a covenant-keeping God. Oh, Lord, I am weak and afraid I shall slip from mine unless thou help. Be merciful unto me, and bless me, with full dedication.

18th.—I have been strongly tempted all the week with words of a supplication which it seemed as though I must utter to-day, but I besought the Lord to lead me only by his Holy Spirit, and when I woke this morning, it seemed as though He folded me in his arms, and He strengthened me in meeting to resist, for I feared I was seeking mine own honor only. How despicable I am! I feel very thankful and peaceful to-night for his mercy to me.

25th.—Oh, my precious Lord! give unto me some certain evidence that I am led by thy Holy Spirit only. I gave up to-day to what seemed required of me, but thy peace and calmness sometimes seem to be mine, yet again I doubt.

31st.—This is the last day of the old year. I have not always been faithful, but God has been so good and merciful, I feel his abounding goodness this night. His love fills a soul that was once so cold. What shall I render unto thee for all thy benefits? A full and dedicated heart is all I have to bring.

First Month 1st, 1893.—I felt in meeting to-day as though all my sins were forgiven, that a new white robe was given me, and I must try not to spit it.

8th.—My spirit and mind have not been enough inward. I am too carnally minded. Help me, oh, Lord, to be more spiritually minded, and give me life and peace. I must watch and pray more. For a little while in meeting this afternoon I felt as if I really loved God and my Saviour, with all my heart and mind and soul and strength.

14th.—I mourn over my want of inwardness and seeking to enjoy Holy Communion. It seems as though He was close to me, but I do not enough seek to sup with my dear Lord and Master.

22nd.—A good deal of self-denial at times, but not enough dedicated to thee, Lord, my good and merciful Master. Help me to abide in thee continually.

FRATERNAL LIFE INSURANCE.—The Christian Cynosure contains an article designed to expose the unsoundness of the ground on which many of the so-called beneficiary insurance associations are built. In ordinary life insurance societies, the insured are required to pay an annual premium, which, when properly invested and the interest received is compounded, will be sufficient to pay the sum insured, supposing the individual to live the average length of human life. Hence, if the society is properly and rightly managed, there is a reasonable security that the necessary funds will be forthcoming to pay the obligations which the society has incurred.

In the fraternal life insurance associations the amounts required to be paid are very small and form but a small percentage of the sum promised to be paid. The "Ancient Order of United Workmen" is perhaps the oldest and largest of these associations, and one of its officers estimates the amount paid in by each member at two hundred dollars, for which he holds a certificate for two thousand dollars, payable at his death. The total membership of the "A. O. U. W." is 262,000. Each holds a certificate of two thousand dollars, which makes $724,000,000. The members who die early and while the order is rapidly growing, will probably be paid, but no sensible man can suppose that the great bulk of these obligations will ever be met. As the rate of death increase, the assessments required to meet the demands will become so heavy that the members will refuse to pay them, and the association will split to pieces by its own weight.

A Brief Account of the Life of Daniel Barker.

This letter was written in 1847, while visiting in Wayne County, Indiana:

"Most Endeared Lydia:—

"How my spirit is made at times to feel for thee, and to breathe to the God of every good and perfect gift that He would in his adorable goodness and mercy be pleased to be with thee in thy deep exercises and tender care over our dear children, enabling thee to discharge this great and important duty to the peace of thy own mind; my greatest desire for them is, that they may be brought up in the fear of the Lord, yielding obedience to all his requireing, that so they may be counted worthy of an inheritance in the heavenly Jerusalem, which is of more value than all the treasures of this transitory world. I am firm in the belief that as thy eye is kept single unto Him He will bless thy most feeble efforts in this respect. I trust at times I feel the force of the many fervent desires for my preservations. I have been preserved, I think, in a remarkable manner as to my health, and wonderfully borne up under many deep trials, having seen, as it were, a Divine hand preparing the way before me; I hope the Lord, in his mercy, will enable us to commit the keeping of our souls to Him, for He is able to do for us more abundantly than we can ask or think. I greatly desire that you, my dear children, may at all times be obedient to your dear mother, and mind the things that belong to your peace and everlasting happiness, often retiring in spirit before the Lord in order to know his will concerning you, with desires to do it, and often reading the Scriptures which are able to make you wise unto salvation, through faith in Jesus Christ."

The following letter was written while laboring in Tennessee, on his way to Ohio Yearly Meeting, Eighth Month 20th, 1866:

"FRIENDSVILLE, Blount Co., Tenn.

"My dearly beloved wife, and my greatest earthly treasure, with the dear children and our aged mother, for whom my spirit is often bowed before the throne of grace, with breathing desires for your preservation in every way, as for my own, from everything that would destroy that peace of mind designed for the followers of the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world, to enjoy. Oh! how I do desire that we may all labor earnestly to be resigned to the will and disposal of our Heavenly Father in all things, and as we feel our weakness and inability of ourselves to arrive to that state of mind in which we can say in sincerity and truth, Not my will, but Thine, O Lord, be done. May we present ourselves before Him in humility and full faith, acknowledging our weakness and his almighty power, with breathing desires that He would help us, and strengthen us with might in the inner man, drawing so in love to Him above everything else, that a willingness may be wrought in us to suffer afflictions and bear whatever bereavements or tribulations He may see fit to permit, in order that He may be glorified and we prepared for an inheritance amongst the saints in light, when done with time here below, remembering that time is short, and eternity hath no end, and then, I have no doubt, there will be an experiencing of strength to be given in proportion to every trial, for He knows best what is best for us, and he will do right; and the promise is, that He will never leave nor forsake those, his humble dependent ones, but will lead them by the still waters of Shiloh's peaceful streams and cause them to lie down in the green pastures of life and salvation; then may we safely trust in Him and He will bring it to pass. O dearest one, remember He keepeth those in perfect peace, whose minds are stayed on Him."

He attended meeting diligently as long as his bodily strength would admit, and encouraged others to do the same. The last six or eight years of his life were spent mostly at home much of which time he was engaged in reading the Scriptures and other religious literature, and would often speak of the goodness and mercy of God, and our entire dependence on Him. He said he knew he had not always done as he ought, but he felt that his sins were all forgiven and often expressed a desire that when his time came to leave this world, he might die easily, which was mercifully granted. I heard him say that the following lines of poetry had many times been a great help to him:

Comfort take, thou child of sorrow,
All is ordered well for thee,

Look not to the anxious morrow,
As thy day, thy strength shall be.

While he gradually became more feeble, his mind also failed, until many earthly things appeared to him entirely obscure; still he seems to have a clear view of a spiritual life, and would very often have a word of encouragement or warning for those who came to see him, and bidding them farewell, he would often say, "The way to farewell is to do well, and I want us all to do well here so we can farewell it eternally. He was confined to his bed about one week with influenza, or lagrippe, much of which time he was unconscious, still he was often engaged in prayer, or speaking as though he was in meeting, even quoting Scripture as correctly as ever, earnestly exhorting those around him to be faithful in performing whatever was required of them. Thus he appeared to be laboring for the advancement of the Redeemer cause as long as he was able to speak, and finished his work here, we trust, to the glory of God, and to the honor of his ever worthy Name. The last few hours of his life he was not able to speak, his breath all the time growing shorter until he quietly ceased to breathe, as one gently falling asleep, and thus departed this life about eight o'clock on the morning of the first day of First Month, 1892, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

Written by his daughter, Elzena Shields, in 1896.

[To the preceding outline of the life-work of this worthy Friend, the Editor desires to add his own testimony. Some twenty or more years ago he attended Canada Yearly Meeting, held at Pickering, near the north shore of Lake Ontario. There were present a large number of ministers and others from different parts of the country, and among them Daniel Barker. Most of the strangers belonged to the fast school of those professing to be Friends, and several of them exhorted us to be in the frequent or daily practice of uttering vocal prayer in our families, without sufficiently calling attention to the necessary prerequisite of feeling the Divine call and preparation for the service. After several had spoken, Daniel arose and related his own experience. When a boy of about fifteen years of age, he was in a tender frame of spirit, and when he had been unwatchful at home had done anything wrong, he could not be comfortable without retiring alone and seeking forgiveness from his Heavenly Father.

On one such occasion, the thought presented o his mind, "Why is it that when I pray, it is always without the utterance of words? I do not speak as the ministers do, when praying in meeting." Following on the suggestion, he knelt down and attempted to offer vocal prayer, but although his heart had been full of secret petitions, all seemed to disappear, and no ability was felt to pray with the spirit. This experience was at first somewhat puzzling to him but depths of the mine. Nothing could be purchased without a dispute. Over every counter there was wrangling from morning to night. The workman and his employer had a quarrel as regularly as the Saturday came round. BRIEF ACCOUNT

OF

OF SALEM, NEW JERSEY.

SARAH S. COLE, daughter of Richard and Hannah S. Cole, and grand-daughter of Ananias Sayres—who was the first sheriff of Cumberland County, New Jersey—was born in Salem County, in the same State, in the year 1795. She was an unusually lovely girl, of pleasing manners, and was much admired, both for her personal charms and for the brightness of her intellect.

Previously to her last sickness, she was greatly exercised concerning the everlasting peace of her immortal soul; and knowing she had broken covenant so often with her God, she said she was afraid to try to renew it again; and often expressed to her mother that she must be more wicked than others. It is believed that the admiration of her suitors was ensuring to her soul. It became her usual practice during the day to retire into silence by herself, and she was often drawn into humble supplication to the Father of all our mercies for the renewal of his precious covenant with her. In his own time He was pleased to hold forth the sceptre of his love in a wonderful manner, and removed the cloud which had so long overshadowed her mind.

One day when she had been alone for some time her mother feeling anxious, sought her, and on entering the room, Sarah joyfully exclaimed: "Oh! that I could tell thee what I have seen and felt; but it is past expression. The goodness and mercy of the Lord are indeed wonderful. He has followed me Recapitulating some of the scenes of want and woe which he had seen, Sammy continued, "I have given away all I had, and am sixty miles from home, and if I had a toll-gate to go through I have not a penny to pay my way, and if something is not done, the people will die and it will bring a judgment upon our land." The appeal was favorably heard. The man of means gave a large contribution, and likewise assisted in a committee of relief.

Among other trials that this man of faith was called to endure, was the circumstance of being wronged by a relative out of the large sum of ten thousand dollars, yet he was enabled to say concerning it, "The loss never robbed me of one hour's sleep.

Visiting a sick woman once, and giving her six pence, with which she seemed to be wonderfully pleased, he began to sympathize, as he left the sick chamber, "Can six pence make a poor creature happy? How many six pence have I spent on this month of mine, by feeding it with tobacco? I will never take another pipe while I live, and will give the poor whatever I save from it."

Having been taken sick, his medical attendant said to him, "You must resume the use of the pipe, Mr. Hick." "Never more while I live," he replied. "It is essential to your restoration to health, and I cannot be answerable for consequences should you reject the advice given." "Let come what will," was the firm answer, "I'll never take another pipe. I've told my son so, and I'll abide by it." "You will in all probability die then." "Glory be to God for that. I shall go to heaven. I have made a vow and I'll keep it." He lived several years after that, his release a happy one, nearly his last words being, "Peace, joy, love."

A Sand-Storm of the American Desert.

That the "Great American Desert" still exists, in spite of strenuous efforts on the part of certain politicians, railroad corporations, and other interested parties to obliterate it from the maps, is a fact only too well known to many thousands of disappointed settlers, army people, prospectors and travellers over certain lines of railway. Most especially is it in evidence on the route of the Southern Pacific road, which traverses its desolation for hundreds of miles, and whose tank cars for the transportation of water form an important item of equipment. It is true that portions of its unproductive lands are irrigable (at a vast expense, and may thus, in the distant future, be reclaimed to the uses of agriculture. At the same time, it is equally true that wide areas lie so remote from revivifying influences that, unless subjected to radical climatic changes, they must always remain desolate, wind-blown wastes, exhibiting the characteristics and phenomena of all deserts existing under similar conditions.

With a thunderous roar the sand-storm hurls itself upon its victims, driving them before it with irresistible fury. No animate form may oppose it and live, but man or beast so ill-fated as to be caught within its dread radius must submit to be driven forward like an autumn leaf, blinded, choked and sorely lashed, until some sheltering lee is reached, or the fury of the storm is exhausted. If he stumbles and falls, or sinks through weakness, he is lost, and the skeletons of former victims are stripped of their heated covering to furnish him a sepulchre.

Although the sand-storm is generally of short duration, it sometimes lasts for hours, and has been known to rage for days with unabated fury. While thus exercising its evil powers it destroys life and changes the whole aspect of the country over which it sweeps, moving hills and valleys to new positions, filling dry water-courses, burying the little oases nourished by infrequent springs, and obliterating trails. In the old days of slow-moving wagon trains it was a menace and a calamity, while even in this era of railroads, it brings distress and peril to the traveller. It fills the most carefully protected cars with its stifling dust, blocks the track with

But when the great instruments of exchange became thoroughly deranged, all trade, all industry, were smitten as with a palsy. The evil was felt daily and hourly in almost every place and by almost every class—in the dairy and on the threshing floor, by the anvil and by the loom, on the billows of the ocean and in the

from my youth until now; but oh! how hard it is to get human nature under our feet, and to know Christ Jesus to be All in all! Oh! dear mother, the covenant is now renewed—never I hope to be broken. I believe I have seen my sins sweep away like froth on the foaming billows; and I thought I saw they should not impede my everlasting peace. Oh mother join me in praising the Lord Jesus! Come life or death, I feel my will given up to the Lord. Now I do experience what my dear brother Charles wished for me when he prayed; 'I might be more weaned from the world, and be favored to see what he felt.'" "Oh! what a favor," she continued, "if we are all called home to that happy place, where no poisonous thing shall ever enter to disturb our peace! O, peace! how has my heart sought thee and through the Lord's great goodness, I have found thee! Let us, mother, praise and honor Him, the Great Author and Preserver of my being! who, in his loving kindness has condescended to visit me, a poor worm of the dust, and not only has visited but taken me into his favor."

Her mother saying one day: "My dear child, I am sorry to leave thee so much alone." She replied, "Oh mother, do not say alone, I have had the best of company! If thou only knew the sweet union and communion that I have with the dear Emanuel at those seasons when thou hast to leave me, I feel my spirit drawn home to its God—its Saviour. I often think it is possible such a poor weak worm of the dust can be so highly favored? I believe it is partly on thy account dear mother, that thou mayst be made willing to give me up."

She was often engaged in supplication, and on one occasion in the following manner: "Oh Lord! wilt Thou be pleased in Thy condescending mercy, to strengthen me to bear with patience everything which Thou mayst see best to inflict, until I become prepared and fitted for Thy kingdom! I think my sufferings light so that I can but win Thee, and Thou wilt be pleased to take me for Thy own. Oh most gracious Father! look down in mercy upon my aged parents and be pleased to support them under every trying dispensation—enable them to go in and out before my dear little brothers so as to lead them in the way of all truth. narrow place where they cannot turn to the right hand nor to the left, but cause them fully to surrender unto Thy blessed will; that they may grow in Thy love and fear, and be a comfort to their parents. Oh Lord! be pleased in Thy adorable goodness to strengthen my mother to give me up with a willing mind. Make her to see it is best for us both as thou hast mercifully permitted me, and I can say in truth: "Thy will be done."

Shortly before her decease she dictated a letter to a young man to whom she was engaged to be married, in which she says: "I must inform thee my time here is almost ended, and I feel nothing in my way to impede my happiness. The Lord in his infinite mercy has been pleased to visit my soul with the day-spring from on high. Oh! that it may be thy situation is the desire of thy friend who never expects to see thee in this present world! But, oh! that we may meet in the world above where sickness and sorrow cease, and the weary soul shall forever be at rest! O, the sweet peace I have experienced; it is worth striving for."

"I have been made renewedly sensible of the importance of living a Christian life. This to human nature seems to be an attainment of an high and exalted nature; but let us not be discouraged with the difficulties which attend the journey through this checkered scene; but let us remember to our comfort and consolation that those who earnestly and diligently seek virtue, shall find her. But mark the difference—those who do not seek shall not find. Then, O, my dear friend! hasten, I entreat thee, to become acquainted with true experimental religion! Remember it is to be in this life that we must engage in the contest if we would obtain the victory. Endeavor to retire, yea, frequently retire in subjection to know thyself wholly resigned and given up to the Lord. Oh! how I deceived myself in this respect; I once thought I knew myself, but found by painful experience that I could do no good thing. But the Lord in the riches of his mercy has been pleased to hold forth the sceptre of his love and in his adorable goodness hath enabled me to sing his praise as on the banks of deliverance. What, oh! what must be the prospect of those who never sought God with full purpose of heart! It is the whole heart He calls for, and He loves an early sacrifice.

Most especially is it in evidence on the route of the Southern Pacific road, which traverses its desolation for hundreds of miles, and whose tank cars for the transportation of water form an important item of equipment. It is true that portions of its unproductive lands are irrigable at a vast expense, and may thus, in the distant future, be reclaimed to the uses of agriculture. At the same time, it is equally true that wide areas lie so remote from revivifying influences that, unless subjected to radical climatic changes, they must always remain desolate, wind-blown wastes, exhibiting the characteristics and phenomena of all deserts existing under similar conditions.

With a thunderous roar the sand-storm hurls itself upon its victims, driving them before it with irresistible fury. No animate form may oppose it and live, but man or beast so ill-fated as to be caught within its dread radius must submit to be driven forward like an autumn leaf, blinded, choked and sorely lashed, until some sheltering lee is reached, or the fury of the storm is exhausted. If he stumbles and falls, or sinks through weakness, he is lost, and the skeletons of former victims are stripped of their heated covering to furnish him a sepulchre.

Although the sand-storm is generally of short duration, it sometimes lasts for hours, and has been known to rage for days with unabated fury. While thus exercising its evil powers it destroys life and changes the whole aspect of the country over which it sweeps, moving hills and valleys to new positions, filling dry water-courses, burying the little oases nourished by infrequent springs, and obliterating trails. In the old days of slow-moving wagon trains it was a menace and a calamity, while even in this era of railroads, it brings distress and peril to the traveller. 3rd.—This is the last day of the old year. I have not always been faithful, but God has been so good and merciful, I feel his abounding goodness this night. His love fills a soul that was once so cold. What shall I render unto thee for all thy benefits? A full and dedicated heart is all I have to bring.

8th.—My spirit and mind have not been enough inward. I am too carnally minded. Help me, oh, Lord, to be more spiritually minded, and give me life and peace. I must watch and pray more. For a little while in meeting this afternoon I felt as if I really loved God and my Saviour, with all my heart and mind and soul and strength.

14th.—I mourn over my want of inwardness and seeking to enjoy Holy Communion. It seems as though He was close to me, but I do not enough seek to sup with my dear Lord and Master.

22nd.—A good deal of self-denial at times, but not enough dedicated to thee, Lord, my good and merciful Master. Help me to abide in thee continually.

FRACTIONAL LIFE INSURANCE.—The Christian Chronicle contains an article designed to expose the unsoundness of the ground on which many of the so-called beneficiary insurance associations are built. In ordinary life insurance societies, the insured are required to pay an annual premium, which, when properly invested and the interest received is compounded, will be sufficient to pay the sum insured, supposing the individual to live the average length of human life. Hence, if the society is properly and rightly managed, there is a reasonable security that the necessary funds will be forthcoming to pay the obligations which the society has incurred.

In the fraternal life insurance associations the amounts required to be paid are very small and form but a small percentage of the sum promised to be paid. The "Ancient Order of United Workmen" is perhaps the oldest and largest of these associations, and one of its officers estimates the amount paid in by each member at two hundred dollars, for which he holds a certificate for two thousand dollars, payable at his death. The total membership of the "A. O. U. W." is 282,000. Each holds a certificate of two thousand dollars, which makes 872,400,000. The members who die early and while the order is rapidly growing, will probably be paid, but no sensible man can suppose that the great bulk of these obligations will ever be met. As the rate of death increase, the assessments required to meet the demands will become so heavy that the members will refuse to pay them, and the association will fall to pieces by its own weight.

BRIEF ACCOUNT OF SARAH S. COLE.

When death, awful death stares them in the face and then, prepared or not, they must go, dreadful is their situation.

"Oh! my dear friend make [Christ] thy choice, and thou never wilt have cause to repent it: I hope thou wilt not take it amiss that I invite thee so ardently, earnestly and pressingly to seek the Lord; for I am brought to see the necessity of it. It is the last advice from thy true friend."

She was often exercised in anticipating the hour of death, fearing she could not bear it quietly. But one morning her mother coming into the room she clasped her neck, and said: "O, dear mother, what a precious Father I have! He has been pleased in his infinite mercy to remove all my fears; promising to be with me in the hour of departure and support me through all. I think I shall live two days from this. Oh, mother! sit down and help me to praise God for his many favors towards me! My pain of body is at times great, but my peace of mind makes up for all."

The day before her departure she believed her work was nearly done, and the next morning said to her mother: "Do not go down to thy breakfast, but let it be brought up, for this is the last day we shall spend together in this world." She was asked if she felt more poorly. She replied, "No! but I feel convinced this is the last day of my stay here. O, dear mother! do give me up willingly. Remember it is the willing and obedient that shall be blessed. One request I have to make—that thou wilt sit by me and not grieve." She then desired her mother to read to her, which she did until she said it was enough and that it would be the last reading that she should ever hear. She then lay very quiet and composed, waiting for the solemn change. She slept sweetly for a little while and revived about 12 o'clock, and engaged in fervent supplication on behalf of her father and her two little brothers and others, and then was just heard to say, "Sweet Jesus, come, and if consistent with Thy will, take me to thyself. Oh! yes come quickly, I long to give up this body of clay. Without Thee there is no Balm in Gilead, nor any Physician there! O sweet Jesus! take me to Thyself! Thou art my precious friend—my Saviour." She then quietly departed on the 21st day of the Sixth Month, 1846.

those professing to be Friends, and several of them exhorted us to be in the frequent or daily practice of uttering vocal prayer in our families, without sufficiently calling attention to the necessary prerequisite of feeling the Divine call and preparation for the service. After several had spoken, Daniel arose and related his own experience. When a boy of about fifteen years of age, he was in a tender frame of spirit, and when he had been unwatchful and had done anything wrong, he could not be comfortable without retiring alone and seeking forgiveness from his Heavenly Father.

On one such occasion, the thought presented o his mind, "Why is it that when I pray, it always without the utterance of words? I do not speak as the ministers do, when praying in meeting." Following on the suggestion, he knelt down and attempted to offer vocal prayer, but although his heart had been full of secret petitions, all seemed to disappear, and no ability was felt to pray with the spirit. This experience was at first somewhat puzzling to him, but it was soon shown to him that although in meeting persons might be led to pray vocally in order that those present might be impressed with the plenitude of the occasion, yet that words were not necessary for communicating with that Being who knows the very thoughts and intents of the heart.

The sense of comfort and relief which this short communication conveyed, endeared the old man to me, and this feeling was further strengthened a few years after, when at North Carolina Yearly Meeting, by a visit to his home. At the Boarding School, where we had previously tarried, there were many strangers, some of whom were advocates of practices inconsistent with the former usages of the Society. The change from this atmosphere to the quiet peace that prevailed in D. B.'s household, was most grateful. It was like escaping from a rough wilderness to smooth pastures.—[Ed.]

MACAULAY, in the twenty-first chapter of his "History of England," has a long account of the distress caused by the disorders of the currency in the reign of William III, and their correction by Parliament under the advice of Newton and Locke. After giving the facts in detail, he says:

"The evils produced by this state of the currency were not such as have generally been thought worthy to occupy a prominent place in history. Yet it may well be doubted whether all the misery which had been inflicted on the English nation in a quarter of a century by bad kings, bad ministers, bad parliaments and bad judges was equal to the misery caused in a single year by bad crowns and bad shillings. Those events which furnish the best themes for pathetic or indignant eloquence are not always those which most affect the happiness of the great body of the people. The misgovernment of Charles and James, gross as it had been, had not prevented the common business of life from going steadily and prosperously on. While the honor and independence of the State were sold to a foreign power, while chartered rights were invaded, while fundamental laws were violated, hundreds of thousands of quiet, honest and industrious families labored and traded, ate their meals and lay down to rest in comfort and security. Whether Whigs or Tories, Protestants or Jesuits, were uppermost, the grazier drove his beasts to market, the grocer weighed out his currants, the draper measured out his broadcloth, the huck of buyers and sellers was as loud as ever in the towns; the harvest home was celebrated as joyously as ever in the hamlets; he cream overflowed the pails in Cheshire; he apple juice foamed in the presses of Herefordshire; the piles of crockery glowed in the urnaces of the Trent, and the barrows of coal rolled fast along the timber railways of the Tyne. But when the great instruments of exchange became thoroughly deranged, all trade, all industry, were smitten as with a palsy. The evil was felt daily and hourly in almost every place and by almost every class—in the dairy and on the threshing floor, by the anvils and by the loom, on the billows of the ocean and in the depths of the mine. Nothing could be purchased without a dispute. Over every counter there was wrangling from morning to night. The workman and his employer had a quarrel as regularly as the Saturday came round. On a fair day or a market day the clamors, the reproaches, the taunts, the curses, were incessant; and it was well no booth was overturned and no head broken. No merchant would contract to deliver goods without making some stipulation about the quality of coin in which he was to be paid. Even men of business were often bewildered by the confusion into which all pecuniary transactions were thrown. The simple and the careless were pillaged without mercy by extortioners whose demands grew even more rapidly than the money shrank. The price of the necessities of life, of shoes, of ale, of oatmeal, rose fast. The laborer found that the bit of metal which, when he received, it was called a shilling, would hardly, when he wanted to purchase a pot of beer or a loaf of rye bread, go as far as a sixpence."—Selected.

The Village Blacksmith, Sammy Hick.

On the fair ground, near York, England, upon a certain, so-called Whit-Monday in last century, John Bardsall, a Methodist preacher, a helper of Wesley, was endeavoring in the midst of scenes of disorder and brutality, to declare to the ungodly the way of salvation. Being threatened with rough treatment, a young man of powerful build rushed to his side, and warned the rude crowd not to touch the preacher. The latter's champion was Sammy Hick, the village blacksmith. A writer in the Christian Standard, giving a little narrative of his life, says of him, that "he became an earnest Christian, and soon gained much public favor, for he was an upright, truthful, honest man, no sham or make-believe, but an Israelite indeed, in whom there is no guile."

Sammy, as he was customarily called, experienced a concern to preach the Gospel, but it came as the result of no theological training. Waking from his sleep one night, he told his wife what was the deep impression on his mind, but she bade him go to sleep again, with the intimation that he was under a delusion. Nevertheless, he was unable to resist the impression of assured duty, and would say, "I have only one talent, but I am determined that it shall never be given to the man who has ten." He began to preach, and continued to do so until he died.

The account speaks of him as a man of strong faith, as also one who was not lacking in good works. In a time of great distress among the working-classes of England, preaching the while, he gave away all his substance. Being told at the place to which he had come, that there was but one wealthy man in the locality, and he a Roman Catholic, Sammy expressed his belief that the Lord had the hearts of Roman Catholics in his hand, and so believing, and praying as he went, he came into the great man's presence. Recapitulating some of the scenes of want and woe which he had seen, Sammy continued, "I have given away all I had, and am sixty miles from home, and if I had a toll-gate to go through I have not a penny to pay my way, and if something is not done, the people will die and it will bring a judgment upon our land." The appeal was favorably heard. The man of means gave a large contribution, and likewise assisted in a committee of relief.

Among other trials that this man of faith was called to endure, was the circumstance of being wronged by a relative out of the large sum of ten thousand dollars, yet he was enabled to say concerning it, "The loss never cooled me of one hair's sweep."

Visiting a sick woman one, and giving her six pence, with which she seemed to be wonderfully pleased, he began to sobberize, as he left the sick chamber, "Can six pence make a poor creature happy? How many six pence have I spent on this month of mine, by feeding it with tobacco? I will never take another pipe while I live, and will give the poor whatever I save from it."

Having been taken sick, his medical attendant said to him, "You must receive the use of the pipe, Mr. Hick." "Never more while I live," he replied. "It is essential to your restoration to health, and I cannot be answerable for consequences should you reject the advice given." "Let come what will," was the firm answer, "I'll never take another pipe. I've told my son so, and I'll abide by it." "You will in all probability die then." "Glorry be to God for that. I shall go to heaven. I have made a vow and I'll keep it." He lived several years after that, his release a happy one, nearly his last words being, "Peace, joy, love."

A Sand-Storm of the American Desert.

That the "Great American Desert" still exists, in spite of strenuous efforts on the part of certain politicians, railroad corporations, and other interested parties to obliterate it from the maps, is a fact only too well known to many thousands of disappointed settlers, army people, prospectors and travellers over certain lines of railway. Most especially is it in evidence on the route of the Southern Pacific road, which traverses its desolation for hundreds of miles, and whose tank cars for the transportation of water form an important item of equipment. It is true that portions of its unproductive lands are irrigable at a vast expense, and may thus, in the distant future, be reclaimed to the uses of agriculture. At the same time, it is equally true that wide areas lie so remote from revivifying influences that, unless subjected to radical climatic changes, they must always remain desolate, wind-blown wastes, exhibiting the characteristics and phenomena of all deserts existing under similar conditions.

With a thunderous roar the sand-storm hurls itself upon its victims, driving them before it with irresistible fury. No animate form may oppose it and live, but man or beast so ill-treated as to be caught within its dread radius must submit to be driven forward like an autumn leaf, blinded, choked and sorely lashed, until some sheltering lee is reached, or the eye of the storm is exhausted. If he stumbles and falls, or sinks through weakness, he is lost, and the skeletons of former victims are stripped off their heated covering to furnish him a sepulchre.

Although the sand-storm is generally of short duration, it sometimes lasts for hours, and has been known to rage for days with unabated fury. While thus exercising its evil powers it destroys life and changes the whole aspect of the country over which it sweeps, moving hills and valleys to new positions, filling dry water-courses, burying the little oases nourished by infrequent springs, and obliterating trails. In the old days of slow-moving wagon trains it was a menace and a calamity, while even in this era of railroads, it brings distress and peril to the traveller. It fills the most carefully protected cars with its stifling dust, blocks the track with heavy drifts, cuts down telegraph poles with its sharp flinty particles, grinds clear glass into opaqueness, and in a thousand ways renders life miserable and a burden.—Harper's Weekly.

THE LICHEN.

HENRY BURTON.

I hear the bleating of the flock,
The curlew's cry upon the wold,
Yet heed them not, but lay my sick
Upon the scuffed floor of my rock.

You live your threescore years, and then
The willing hands, the lighted face
Are covered o'er in Death's embrace;
Such are the little lives of men.

Over the centuries of years
My life, a golden current, runs;
Nor do I count the setting suns—
My life is linked with vaster spheres.

I spin my little threads, and make
A ladder of the braided light;
And Bethel's angels, in the night,
Come down to speak to souls that wake.

Out on the farthest margin I stand;
My bridge of golden chains I throw
Across the dark abyss below;
I take in mine the dead world's hand,

And say, "O dead earth, rise and live!
My voice is but the Master's call,
The Life of life who made us all—Wake from thyself, and learn to give!"

Seest thou the harvest in the shock?
The orchards in the plain below?
I turned my silent wheel, and lo!
The loam fell off the granite rock.

I live that higher life may be;
I teach the heather bells to ring,
I help the summer fields to sing,
I wake the humming of the bee.

So leave me on my lonely wold;
And if my service be not much,
I still can brighten all I touch,
And turn the dullest grain to gold.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Niagara Falls Utilized.

The announcement has been made by the public press, within the past week, that electric cars are running on the streets of Buffalo, by power transmitted from the falling water of the great cataract, twenty-seven miles distant. This achievement of modern science may be ranked as the crowning triumph of the age. A brief sketch of some of the prominent features of the work will probably interest the readers of THE FRIEND. The facts are collected from the Scientific American and Appleton's Cyclopedia of 1894.

In 1886 the Legislature of New York chartered the Niagara Falls Power Company to use the water drawn from above the Falls on the American side, by a canal which should turn the turbine wheels, located at the bottom of a pit about one hundred and fifty feet deep under this canal, for running factories and other commercial purposes. At this date electric machinery for transmitting power was in its infancy, and it is only within the past five years that the inventive genius of man has perfected the apparatus which give a new and wider scope to the use of Niagara's latent energy. The knowledge deep before attempting to company thus formed, laid their foundations strict any physical work, by appointing a commission of the most eminent scientific men and practical engineers in the United States and Europe, to devise plan— Among them were Dr. Coleman Sellers, of Phila., Sir Wm. Thompson, of England, Theo. Turrettini, of Geneva, and others. They offered a prize of twenty-five hundred dollars for the best scheme, and several of one thousand dollars each for subordinate plans. The work was begun in 1890, and has only been completed this year. It consists of a canal starting from the bank of the Niagara River, a few miles above the cataract, one hundred and ten feet wide at the river side, one hundred and eighty feet at its lower end, and fourteen hundred feet long. Here the power-house is built, and on the side of the canal next it are fourteen gates for the water to flow from, whence it falls through immense vertical iron tubes, seven feet in diameter, called "penstocks," one hundred and forty feet in depth, to the turbine wheels at the bottom of the tunnel, which is cut from this point to the river below the Falls, near the Clifton bridge. This tunnel is shaped like a horse-shoe, twenty-one feet high, about nineteen feet wide at its greatest diameter, two hundred feet below the surface of the ground, and seven thousand feet long. It is lined with brick throughout, and cased at the lower end for a distance of ninety-five feet with steel plates, to prevent the erosion of the water, which rushes through it at the rate of twenty miles an hour.

The turbine wheels attached to each "penstock" are designed to develop five thousand horse power each, under a head of one hundred and forty feet of water, and with two hundred and fifty revolutions in a minute. These wheels turn a vertical shaft which runs from them up to the surface of the ground in the "power-house," and to the top of this shaft are geared the wheels and belts which turn the dynamos and other machinery. The shaft is made of steel tubing, thirty inches in diameter, and with the machinery placed upon it, weighs one hundred and fifty thousand pounds.

Any one can realize how difficult an engineering problem it must have been to support this immense weight at the bottom, with the addition of the column of water, whilst revolving two hundred and fifty times a minute. The hardest steel block on which it would rest and revolve, would be bored through in a short time, unless a part of the superincumbent pressure could be uplifted. This has been effected by a very ingenious device. The steel shaft is not placed inside the "penstock," down which the water falls, but near by it. The two disks of the turbines, upon which the blades or buckets are fastened, are placed one at the bottom and the other at the top of a cylindrical case or drum. The water from the "penstock" is admitted into this drum at the side, near the bottom of it. The greater part of the water rises by the immense hydraulic pressure, and forces itself through the upper turbine disks and buckets, thus bearing up the weight of the shaft, whilst it performs its allotted task of driving the revolutions of the machinery at the same time. The other part of the water falls to the bottom of the drum, and drives the lower turbine wheel, the two co-operating to the same end. The turbines were built by the I. P. Morris Company, of Philadelphia.

The total horse power of Niagara Falls has been computed at nearly seven millions. This is estimated as being equal to the consumption of sixty-five thousand tons of coal per day. The tunnel now built is capable of delivering a flow of water sufficient to generate one hundred and twenty thousand horse power. Ten wheels and dynamos are ready to operate. They are said to be capable of running all the manufacturing plants of Buffalo.

The most important problem for the financial success of this colossal undertaking is its ability to transmit the energy gathered in the power-house to distant cities without too great waste on the way. In 1878 Sir Wm. Siemens stated that there would be sixty per cent. of loss in transmitting one thousand horse power by electricity over a distance of thirty miles, but since that date electrical science and construction have made vast strides, so that much better results have been obtained; and it is estimated by some experts that power can be economically conveyed from the Niagara works to Albany for lighting that city or running manufactories.

A statement appeared in the Ledger on the twenty-first instant that the experimental test made by the Buffalo Street Railway Company, on two of its lines, of the electric power from the Niagara Power Co., has proved so successful that the power will be gradually extended to other lines of the system. This seems to give a practical solution to the question of transmission so far as thirty miles.

The public generally are perhaps as much interested in the question of the esthetic effect of these uses of the waters of Niagara on the grand scenery, which gives the spot a world-wide celebrity, and inspires a jealousy on the part of all lovers of nature lest commercial cupidity should rob us of a heritage of sublimity and beauty which every American claims a share in. Curtis Brown, writing in the Cosmopolitan for the Ninth Month of 1894, says: "No one visiting the Niagara Falls reservations when these enterprises are fairly begun, or half a dozen years from now, when perhaps they will be fully developed, would find any outward and visible sign of them, except the mills along the hydraulic canal basin, which for years have formed part of the view from the Victoria Park. There is little danger also to the Falls themselves. The vast mass of water speeding over the precipice will suffer but little diminution, three-quarters of a foot perhaps, not more."

John Bogart, State Engineer of New York, estimated that the tunnel above alluded to would reduce the depth of the water at the crest of the American Falls about one inch and four-fifths; and the five hundred thousand horse power required for both Companies now incorporated, will take about nine inches from the depth of the water, when running to their full capacity, so that there would be no obvious difference in the appearance of the Cataract to an observer.

While the harnessing of the mighty energies of the waters of Niagara by means of the turbine wheel and its applied mechanism, for the service of man, seems wonderful to contemplate, yet it is so much in line with the means we are familiar with in the force of gravity, that it fails to excite our admiration, in comparison with the subtle power of the electrical and magnetic influences set in motion to supplement and carry out the former. We can see the rush of water, but not the electric current that speeds with almost infinitely greater velocity through a small wire, carrying with it the concentrated strength of the great cataract to the distant points, whence it can best serve the wants of humanity. The Dynamo is the agent which effects this transmission. Let us look a little into the philosophical principles and mechanism which enter into the composition of this latest triumph of human invention.

If we magnetize a needle by drawing it across a loadstone or natural magnet, and suspend it by a thread tied around the middle, it will point north and south. Take a spool and wind around it fine wire covered with silk or cotton. Suspend the magnetized needle so that one end of it will be near, but not touching, the open end of the spool of wire. Then by an electrical battery send a current of electricity through the wire around the spool, and that will make the coil an electro-magnet, which will attract the north end of the needle to it. If the other end of the needle, or south pole, be then brought near the end of the spool, it will be repelled by it. This simple apparatus will give us an illustration of the principle on which the dynamo acts.

The machinery is complex, but its operation all depends upon the revolution of large coils of insulated wire, around a magnet always at right angles to its length. Currents of electricity are excited in the coil as it revolves rapidly by the poles of the magnet, first in one direction as it passes the North pole, then in the reverse direction as it passes the South pole; but by a very ingenious contrivance for shifting the contact of the ends of the wires as they pass the poles in the revolution of the coils, a continuous current in one direction is propelled through the carrying wire.

The vertical shaft that reaches up from the tunnel under the power-house at Niagara, is set whirling by the rush of the waters through the turbine wheels at its base; its motion drives the great coils of copper wire in the dynamo in their revolutions around the enclosed magnet with tremendous velocity, transmitting a powerful current of electric force to the wires stretched to distant places, ever drawing from the earth below a supply of magnetism to do the bidding of busy men.

In thus reviewing the works of man, and admiring the inventive skill displayed through them, let us not fail to look beyond his finite powers to trace them up to the infinite Source of all wisdom, with humble gratitude to the Creator of every good and perfect gift; remembering that as the engine is motionless without the steam, and the dynamo inert until the magnetic impulse is drawn from the earth, so the human brain is powerless unless endowed with energy from the Divine hand, and upheld every moment by his power.

The votaries of science and skill are ever most to be admired when they exhibit the pious humility of that prince of scientists, Sir Isaac Newton, who valued the Bible above all other books, and near the close of life compared himself to a child gathering a few pebbles on the sea shore, whilst the great ocean of truth lay undiscovered before him.

CHARLES RHODES.

GOODNESS AND USEFULNESS.—Goodness conditions usefulness. A grimy hand may do a gracious deed, but a bad heart cannot. What a man says, and what a man is, must stand together,—must consist. His life can ruin his lips, or fill them with power. It is what men see that gives value to what they say. Paul had the right order, "Take heed unto thyself, and unto the doctrine." Being comes before saying or doing. Well may we pray, "Search me, O God! Reveal me to myself. Cleanse me from secret faults, that those who are acquainted with me, who know my down-sittings and my uprisings, may not see in me the evil way that gives the lie to my words."—Selected.

The Church and the Theatre.

By Newton Hall (of London) as reported in Christian Literature and Review of the Churches.

I am here to affirm that the theatre of the present day as a whole is calculated to do moral injury both to performers and spectators, and therefore should not receive the sanction of the Christian Church.

I know what will be urged in opposition to this thesis. That we are born with a natural love of dramatic representation. That the theatre cannot be driven out of the world as long as multitudes crave the pleasure. That the Christian Church should therefore try to improve and render harmless what is neither desirable nor possible to destroy. My reply is addressed not to those who regard pleasure as supreme, but who confess Christ as King, who for his sake are willing to deny themselves unnecessary pleasure rather than injure their own spiritual interests, or those of others. I have no personal antipathy to the drama, to the Greek tragedies, and the plays of Shakespeare. Nor have I any personal knowledge of the theatre.

But my father in his youth frequently acted at theatres, and when he became a Christian his whole soul revolted against the theatre as he had known it. He then became the proprietor of the best country newspaper in Kent, and to show his opinion of theatres, he would not advertise the theatrical companies which came to Maidstone. It was a great sacrifice, for the theatres pay very well.

My brother Arthur, who is one of the most devoted clergymen I ever met, as a young man in London, was frequently at theatres, and knows all about them, and has been behind the scenes and in the front. He is as strongly opposed to theatrical presentations as my father was. What I refer to now is the present stage, not to the theatre of former days.

Now there are practical difficulties in connection with the carrying on of the stage. The theatre is a place of amusement; it does not profess to be a place of instruction. To make it pay the rent of the building and the cost of the company, it requires continual attendance, or else it does not pay; therefore there must be a great motive to please, not the minority, but the masses. Secondly, there is a difficulty in providing an entertainment to suit the masses. Professor Henry Morley says that almost all the plays represented in London are translations from the French, and that this ought not to be very obvious. A critic in a secular paper says: "The plays frequently offered are thoroughly Parisian, with personages so objectionable and incidents so gross, that it excites surprise that they have escaped the censure of the Lord Chamberlain."

Mr. Burnand, a great play-writer, in the Fortnightly, says, "It is simply impossible for a girl to enter the theatre, and to prepare to be an actress, without all her moral senses being shocked at once, and if afterwards she feels more easy about it, it simply proves her deterioration."

I now wish to speak of the influence of the play on the actors themselves. Garrick boasted that he so entered into the vile character he assumed, as to feel that it was he himself. Dr. Johnson said, "If you really feel such a monster, you ought to be banged every time you perform it." Mrs. Siddons, who was a great actress, when her sister married a respectable man, though poor, said, "Thank, God, she is off the stage." I do not at all say that all actors are immoral. But there is a danger, and it can be said of very few. Rosseau said, "I observe in general that actors are men of bad morals and given to low practices, and actresses lead a loose life." Is that very improbable? On the stage, as we know it is falsely called love presented as a man and woman kissing one another, and is not that likely to deteriorate their sense of modesty? What is one of the principal attractions of the theatre at the present day? Is it not women scarcely dressed, or dressed so as to represent nudity? Are not women presented in men's attire, and men in women's attire, and is not that calculated to unsex the individual so acting?

A lady who was well introduced to me, and who had been a leading singer at a leading church, and had a fine voice, came from America for the purpose of preparing for the theatrical profession. She thought she could be an actress without injury, but she got told she could not get on. She could not get put into the leading parts. Unless a lady had plenty of money to purchase a position, or unless she was willing to sell herself to the patron of that theatre, she had no chance. So she gave up her idea and went back to America again.

Actresses, says an author of repute, have won rapturous applause from whole generations of men, who consider that, where their pleasure is involved, no risks of life or honor are too great for women to run. My brother Arthur had a conversation with an actor who had become a religious man. In fact he could not go on with his profession. All day his mind was filled with c-stumes, face-painting and grimaces. He had no peace until he gave up his profession. He spoke to my brother of the late hours, the long rehearsals from twelve to four, the constant flirting, the frequent familiarity with the actresses in all sorts of costume, having to go to a great distance after the theatre was over, the profession of love to each other in the family of actors leading to evil. Could a converted man tolerate that?

Dumas, the French novelist, in answer to some critic about plays, said, "You are right not to take your daughter to see my play, but you should not take her to see the theatre at all. The theatre, being a picture or satire of social manners, must ever be immoral, the social manners themselves being immoral." I remember reading a defense of the theatre by a theatrical manager. He was accused of putting on the boards things which young people should not see. He replied, "Certainly, we play for men and women; we represent the world as it is; as it is, it is not fit for the young."

I know a gentleman who was the editor of one of our leading daily papers, a worldly man. He resigned. I asked him why. He told me it was because of the continual advertisements of the theatre, and the favorable comment always made by the theatrical critic. He could not stop the advertisements as editor, and therefore he gave up a very lofty and lucrative position, because of the character of the theatres, and the way they were advertised and praised in the London newspapers. Very seldom have I seen an editor acting as a censor of the theatre, as they very often do of the pulpit, and denounce and condemn theatres of an immoral character. Then, as to the influence on actors. In the book of essays called "Obiter Dicta," there is a reference to Tom Davies, and the point is that the profession of an actor demands that a man must destroy his own identity. Dr. Johnson once said to Tom Davies, "Tom, what are you to-night?" "That is difficult to answer," said

Tom, "with any true sense of human dignity. The doctor prescribes fun. Fancy being every night taken as a safe prescription for the blues, to adopt as a trade making people laugh by delivering for one hundred nights another man's jokes in a costume which the author of the jokes would blush to be seen in." That seems unworthy of a man of character.

Although I have not been to theatres, I have had something to do with those who have been. A lady—a remarkably gifted actress—came one day to my church. She became convinced of the Bible truth, and, after great trouble and difficulty from her friends, she renounced her Romanism and became a Bible Christian. She continued to attend theatres. I did not press her to give it up. I never preach against this sort of thing; I always preach Christ. But at last she did give it up. I asked her how it was she had given up a lucrative profession. It was not, she said, through anything she had read or heard. But in her own room, and on her knees, she had prayed to become holy, humble, and pure. "I went to the theatre," she said, "but I never would take an immoral part. But I had to act, and be for the time what I was acting. I felt I could not be one thing at one time and another at another time, and so I have given up my theatre." Montague Stanley was a great performer, but he became a Christian, and then gave up the profession, and perfected himself in drawing to support his wife and family.

My argument is that it deteriorates actors and actresses. We cannot lawfully take pleasure in any performance that does them injury. The theatre, as at present carried on, must be injurious to a large multitude of young people. Mothers can hardly like to take their young sons and daughters to see the scenes of sensuality and immorality at some of our theatres. It is a pleasure so doubtful, that we Christian people ought to be willing to sacrifice the pleasure in order that we shall not be partakers of that which to so many is so injurious. We should live as those in the constant presence of Him who has said, "I am with you always," and do those things which are well pleasing in his sight.—Friends' Intelligence.

Water Baptism and the Supper.

To the Editor of The London Friend.

DEAR FRIEND.—The longer I live in a heathen land, and the more I watch the effect of these so-called Christian rites upon native converts, the more I am convinced from the formality, bitterness, schisms, and often sin, which they give rise to, that they are not of God, and that it is my duty to teach that they are not.

Of late years much has been said and written by thoughtful and often holy men of God about the evils, the social and religious separations, even amongst the professing followers of our Lord and Saviour, not to speak of the bondage in this life, caused by the man-made ceremonialism of the Christian Church. And yet with such a history as that Church possesses, its members seem oblivious to the consequences of the teaching and practice of those ceremonialism, which are spreading the wide world over, covering the light and life of Christ in the hearts and lives of those to whom the Gospel is preached.

What appeared lately about the "secret subtle workings of the Romanist and the Ritualist" is indeed true. It said in the Christian, "It seems to us that the great danger lies in the oblivious of all danger on the part of the Protestant Churches." We, as sharers in the intimable blessings of the Reformation, ought to be ashamed of this state of things. It is not only the fascinating rites and ceremonies of the Greek, Roman and Ritualistic churches which are the causes of stumbling to precious souls, but our Protestant, evangelical and Non-conformist Churches are doing harm by the teaching and practice of water baptism and the supper, as Divinely-appointed rites of the Christian Church; when all who are prepared to lay aside their preconceived views, and to accept the light given to us in these latter days, must see these rites have not come to us from our Lord. Neander tells us that "Many of those who joined the Church, bringing their pagan notions with them into Christianity, sought in baptism a magical lustration which could render them at once entirely pure. Their longing after reconciliation with God remained covered under a grossly material form, and they sought in Christ, not a Saviour from sin, but a bestower of an outward and magical annihilation of it."

It is cheering to read such a bold statement as John Bradford, of Wadhams College, Oxford, made in his sermon entitled "One baptism," when he said, "That God did send John to baptize with water is admitted, but I deny that Christ ever did send any one to baptize with water. This is coming to the point. Here I stand and challenge any man to show me when and where Christ ever commanded any one to baptize with water." And yet, strange to say, intelligent men who read their Bibles, in spite of the distinct statement of the inspired word that there is but "one baptism" (Eph. iv. 6), which John (John i. 23), our Lord (Acts i. 5), Peter (Acts xi. 16), distinctly contrast with "John's water baptism," "add to the prophecy of this book," and put the word "water" into our Lord's great commission to his Church in Matt. xxviii. 19, Mark xvi. 16. They must know that these "divers baptisms, carnal ordinances (rites and ceremonies), were only imposed until a time of reformation" (Heb. ix. 10), and that Jesus, the world's great Reformer, "blotted out the bond written in ordinances, which was contrary to us, and He hath taken it out of the way, nailing it to the cross" (Col. ii. 14). How strange, I say, when they must know that there was "a disannulling of the [carnal, v. 16] commandment going before for the weakness and unprofitableness thereof" (Heb. vii. 17), and have experienced the blessedness of being "buried with Him by baptism unto death" (Rom. vi. 4), that they should last after the "beggarly elements."

It is cheering also to read what Archbishop Whately has the boldness to say about the observance of "The Supper," "that it is both paradoxical and superstitious, and therefore a stumbling-block to the progress of Christianity." These are but echoes of the teaching of many good men who have had the courage to declare their convictions and have dared to differ from the fashionable teaching of the day.

If our Lord and Master were visibly to appear in our Churches now, as "a teacher sent from God," would it be in the costume of a modern parson sprinkling with water at the "sacred font?" Would He be found taking part in the immersions in water of adults? Would He be found, in this the nineteenth century, taking part in a defunct Jewish feast? No, but we should hear again his rebuke of Mark vii. 7, 8: "Howbeit, in vain do they worship Me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of man. For laying aside the commandment of God, ye hold the tradition of men."

How sad it is, then, that those who love their Saviour, who preach his Gospel in our meeting-houses, who teach his holiness at our conventions, do not shake off these traditions of men which are causes of stumbling to so many souls. If they have not the courage to give up these things, "whereby their brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Rom. xiv. 2), they at least should acknowledge that they are not of Divine origin, and thus free themselves from the responsibility of leading men by their silence to think they are God-given, and hence binding upon them.

The teaching and practice of water baptism and the supper have been, and still are, causes of bitterness amongst those who should be one in Christ Jesus, and deluded souls are substituting these shadows for the "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." They are accepting the letter, and rejecting the Spirit which giveth life. I heard with sorrow lately of some Christians brought up as "Friends," asking how it was that such men as Andrew Murray, F. B. Meyer, whose writings had been such a spiritual blessing to them, taught and practised water baptism, and the partaking of bread and wine, as Divinely-appointed rites of the Christian Church. Westcott and Hort, in their Greek New Testament of 1890, give their reasons for pronouncing the words in Luke xxii: 19, 20, "this do in remembrance of Me," to be probably a very early interpolation (see Appendix pp. 63, 63). It is refreshing to hear the testimony of such as Hannah Whitall Smith, who have formerly been led to practice water baptism and the supper, and who have now given them up again, that they might not come between them and their Lord.—Albert S. Clarke, in The London Friend.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Modified Flora.—The nyika is a broad zone lying west of the coastal plain of East Africa. The soil is sandy and porous; and water is scarce except during the rainy seasons. Most of the zone is occupied by thin thorn scrub.

During the rainy season, however, a change comes for a while over the nyika. The whole country is then sodden with moisture, the paths which have generally been worn into hollows, are occupied by streams; the valleys are converted into swamps. The vegetation suddenly appears to wake up; the baobabs burst into flower and then into leaf; the grass becomes green; creepers climb over the acacias and cover them with a mass of large white flowers, among which the convolvulus is especially conspicuous. But as soon as the rains cease, the nyika reverts to its normal condition. The grass withers, the undergrowth dies and disappears, prairie fires break out and sweep across the country, and the traveller has to march for days over charred blackened wastes, which a month before had been green with turf and gorgeous with flowers. The most remarkable feature in the flora of the nyika is its specialization to resist desiccation and death during long periods of drought. It is modified to enable it to survive the hot, dry season in four different ways, each based on the principle of reducing the loss of moisture in transpiration." The simplest contrivance is the adopted by the baobab (Adansonia), the leave of which remain on the tree only during the rainy season. A second plan is used by many of the acacias, in which the leaves are reduced to mere spines or needles, the fleshy tissue being lost, and only the veins or "vascular bundles" left. A third arrangement for the same end is the reduction of the surface of the leaf in proportion to its mass; thus the leaf becomes thick and succulent, and the number of "stomata" or pores through which moisture can escape, is lessened, as in the fibre-yielding plants, such as the aloe. The last and extreme method is the entire disappearance of the leaves, which are represented only by thorns and spines, while evaporation is effected by the green, succulent stem. The loss of moisture from the plant is therefore greatly reduced, for the surface on which it can take place is small in comparison with that exposed on a leaf-bearing tree. The plant secures, in fact, a minimum of surface with a maximum of mass. The thick, succulent stems, moreover, contain special stores of moisture, and reservoirs of milky juice or "latex," which, being confined in special vessels or elongated cells, can only escape by the slow escape of exosmosis. The plants in which this adaptation has been developed are the most remarkable looking in East Africa. Such are the species of Aristolochia, a genus which has one representative, the birthwort (A. Clematitis, Linn.), established in England; and the forms in the nyika are huge spherical bulbs, sometimes three feet in diameter, from which long trailing branches, armed with thick spines, spread over the ground. The bulb is full of juice; this is reported to be very poisonous, and the only animals that attack the plant are the ants. The spurges (Euphorbiae), offer a still better illustration, for they occur in two very different types. In the grass-plain, as on Laikipia, this family is represented by small herbs, with leaves and structure like the common spurges of our woods and fields; but in the nyika, the species such as Euphorbia nyika, (Pax.), are lofty candelabra-shaped trees, from thirty to sixty-feet in height, with thick, succulent stems like the cacti. In other places, in the Bariugo basin, a closely allied genus forms hedges and thickets, which can only be traversed at some risk; for the spines are sharp and brittle, and if they run into the flesh they break off, and deposit an acrid juice which causes ulceration.—J. W. Gregory.

Mosquitoes at Salt Lake in Africa.—Life is almost insupportable on account of the mosquitoes. These creatures sting at all hours of the day, and are quite active in shady places during the very hottest part of it. It is only by keeping to paths which are vigorously patrolled by brilliant blue and red dragon-flies that one can avoid them. Sleep is almost impossible, and even the pachydermatous Suahili used to come and complain to me that he could get no rest at all. The only manner in which I could obtain any relief was by arranging a fire and counter attraction of sleeping porters in front of the sole entrance to my hut, and even then, some always got inside my net.

I think it is chiefly on account of this that the few villages on the lake are inhabited by such a miserably puny and unhealthy set; because at night their houses are kept constantly full of choking smoke from fires of green wood, which is almost worse than the evil itself. I am not sure that this is the true explanation, or I have noticed on Tanganyika and on the Shire River, a similar wretched condition in these families which spend their lives in canoes and live chiefly on fish—a practice that certainly always produces a very weak development of the lower limbs, while of course a constantly moist and humid atmosphere is always unhealthy in a tropical climate.—A Naturalist in Mad-Africa.

The International Federation of Lord's-Day Societies has made a report as to the work done in the year. Among the items of interest are the following: In France the Paris League for Sunday Rest has enrolled over four thousand members. Many shops are closed on Sunday, including the great Magnificent Louvre. In the army Sunday is a day of rest, and contractors are not now obliged to work on that day. In Lyons there are more than one thousand shops and stores closed entirely on Sunday. A commission has been sent to England from Germany to inquire into the laws applying to Sunday labor in factories and in workshops. There has been a marked advance also in Austria, owing to an enactment in December, 1895, that on Sunday all work, industrial and commercial, shall cease, except such as is absolutely necessary. In Switzerland Sunday laws have been passed in nearly all the cantons. The post and telegraphic service are reduced one-half. No freight trains are run, and the freight depots are closed. Each employe on railroads, steamboats, street road cars, and in the post office is allowed fifty-two days of rest, and seventeen of these must be Sundays. In Belgium, on account of the anti-religious feeling, the Sunday as a day of rest is not named in the law which guarantees one rest day in each week for women and children; but in practice it is thus observed to a very great degree, and in many departments of labor Sunday work has been reduced. In Holland there are no Sunday newspapers, the railway traffic is reduced, and Sunday hours of rest are given to public servants, though a whole day on each Sunday is an exception, not the rule. In Denmark shops are closed at nine A. M., and also factories, except where work is essential. In such cases the employe's get alternate Sundays. In Norway and Sweden factories and workshops close on Sundays, and no intoxicating liquors are sold from five o'clock Saturday afternoon until eight o'clock Monday morning. There is not even bread making on Sunday, and street railways are closed until afternoon. In the cities there is only one postal delivery at eight o'clock in the morning, and railway servants get every third Sunday. The movement has extended to Russia, where a new law as to Sunday is in preparation, and where the post offices are open only from twelve to two, and public houses are closed until eleven o'clock in the morning. In Spain the Sunday work of young persons under eighteen years of age in factories is prohibited. In Japan, of the six hundred newspapers and periodicals not one is published on Sunday. In India the Christian Literature Society is active, and has accomplished considerable.—The Independent.

Slavery in Zanzibar and Pemba.—As these countries are under the control of the British Government, it is expected that emancipation of the slaves will soon be decreed. Friends in Great Britain have felt a great degree of responsibility for the care which the emancipated slaves will need, especially on the Island of Pemba, where a large number are employed on the clove plantations. At the late Meeting for Sufferings, a Friend offered to go out and establish an industrial mission—agreeing to purchase a clove plantation, and to watch over the interests of the present slaves. The Meeting for Sufferings, without finally committing itself to this responsible undertaking, encouraged the Friend to go to the place and make the necessary investigation and report.

Abolition of Slavery in Madagascar.—The French authorities in Madagascar have issued a decree proclaiming the abolition of slavery.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 12, 1896

It is said that during the late election campaign, one of the political parties employed seventeen thousand three hundred stump-speakers who were stationed in two-five Western States, under contracts to speak nightly during the last two weeks of the campaign. Added to this, was the distribution of thousands and thousands of printed documents, in which the issues at stake were discussed. There was evidently an intense earnestness which spared neither labor nor expense to convince the people, and secure their votes.

Some of the religious papers have said that if the same earnestness and effort were used to turn sinners from the evil of their ways, very glorious results would be achieved by the Church of Christ. While we believe that the influence of the professing Church would be largely increased by a corresponding increase of zeal, and that a Divine blessing may reasonably be expected to attend the faithful performance of those labors called for by the Head of the Church, yet it is well to remember that "transformation of apostate man is work for Him who made him;" and that a change of heart from corrupt to holy, no man can make for himself, even less for others. For this change we are dependent upon the visitations of Divine Grace, and submission thereto, and co-operation therewith. These visitations give the ability to forsake sin, and enable us to advance in that path which leads to the realms of celestial happiness. It is the union from on high, the blessed Holy Spirit, which must inspire the preacher, and it only can enable him to speak in the demonstration of the Spirit, and with heavenly power; and it is the Divine Power accompanying his labors which alone can so work on the hearts of the hearers, as to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God.

We would not willingly discourage any of the Lord's servants from laboring in his cause—but we believe it would be wise for all such to heed the caution expressed by the apostle, "Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves; but our sufficiency is of God."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President's message was read in both Houses of Congress on the 7th inst. It is recognized as an able document. The affairs of the nation are reviewed. Protection has been given to our citizens in Asiatic Turkey, as far as possible, but the difficulties of active interference, in the deplorable condition of that country, are pointed out. Our interest in Cuba, peculiarly is second only to Spain, and that country, he thinks should give aid to us to the Island. He further says: "Whatever circumstances may arise, our policy and our interests will constrain us to abide to the application of the sword and the Venezuelan Government has accepted the arbitration as agreed upon by Secretary Olney and Sir Julian Pauncefote. An extra session of the Venezuelan Congress will be called as soon as possible in order that the men-of-war may be received on board by the necessary treaty between Great Britain and Venezuela.

An increase in the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, during Eleventh Month, 1896, was $1,100,000,000, cash in the Treasury, $8,740,000,000.

On the 3rd inst. President Cleveland issued a proclamation, which suspends the law relieving vessels from German ports from cargoes dues and other charges in American ports. This is done upon evidence that American vessels are not given the same privileges in ports in Germany. It is retaliatory in its nature.

Supervising Inspector General Dumont reports that during the last year 221 persons lost their lives on steam vessels, out of 100,000,000 passengers carried. This was a decrease in loss of life of 173 persons from the year before.

Dr. William H. Furness, 34, has just returned, after more than a year's absence, from the Archipelago, where he has been making collections for the museum of the University of Pennsylvania, principally in Borneo. He penetrated countries never visited before, and brought back valuable information. A Des Moines despatch says that the "Tobacco Trust" has discovered that the Iowa Cigarette Prohibitory law "cannot be enforced because of interferences with the Inter-State commerce," and that on the 30th ult. 1187 shipments of cigarettes were received from New York and sold in the original packages, no attempt being made to prevent it.

Chief Wadlin, of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor, Massachusetts, says that "eighty-four per cent. of all persons employed in the manufacturing establishments had intemperate habits that led to the crimes committed by them: 31 per cent. were drunk when crime was committed, and 96 per cent. are addicted to the use of liquor."

Before the New York State Investigating Committee of Moral Suicides, Dr. Johnson testified, giving the names of several saloons, where he had visited and found to be worse than mere drinking places. He quoted the Superintendent of the Lowery Mission as saying that the Raines law is being used for immoral purposes. Not only is this true, but there is evidence that the reduction in the number of saloons has not decreased drunkenness. On a cruise, from Third to Fifth Avenue, New York, with, inclusive, there was a heavy increase in the number of arrests for drunkenness. I. F. Fink, the publisher and Prohibitionist, told the committee there was more drunkenness in Brooklyn under the new law than under the old, as well as an increase in immorality.

Brother "Fingle," a Catholic priest, said he knew a great deal about the working of the Raines law in his section from personal observation and special information, and also that a talk with eight or ten representatives of the Catholic clergy, made him sure that his opinion was theirs. "It is my firm conviction," he said, "that drunkenness is on the increase since the opening of the new law. We have had on our poor roll a great increase of mendicants. We have had in our gine in and out of tenement houses a larger number of drunken brawls to settle. We have had a greater number of complaints from women, mothers and families; a larger number of complaints that children could not go to school on account of want of clothes, the husband drinking." He also put the blame on the magistrates.

The funded debt of the railways of Pennsylvania is $897,995,473, which, with a capital stock and floating debts, makes a total capitalization of $2,007,191,545. According to the census of 1890, Mississippi had 274,242 white voters and 159,659 black voters; and yet the total vote for Miss-issippi this year was but 61,893. South Carolina had 192,257 white voters and 122,949 black voters; and yet the total vote of South Carolina this year was 63,978.

The California almond growers, in convention at Sacramento, on the 1st inst., adopted a memorial to Congress asking for a protective tariff. It is said that there are over 25,000 acres of almond orchards in California.

Texas despatches report that a severe blizzard had been raging in portions of that State during the forty-eight hours ending on the 15th ult. At Houston, San Antonio and Eagle Pass, the heaviest snow-storm of recent years is in progress.

Heavy snow-fall on the 2nd inst. in portions of Virginia, North Carolina and Georgia.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 341, which is 43 less than the previous week and 73 less than the corresponding week of 1895. The total for 1896, to date, was 13,780, and for 1895, to the corresponding date, 15,587, showing a decrease of 1,807. Of the deaths, 482 were males and 1,525 females; 31 died of pneumonia. There was a consumption of 3,055 lbs. of meat, 26,200 lbs. of coal, 14,000 millions of the staple and breads, 411 of apples; 10,620 gallons of 2nd quality apple, 9 of medicinal wine, 27 of medicinal wine, 29 of medicinal wine.

This seems to indicate that "regulation" does not "regulate" in England.

Joseph K. D. Patmore died in England on the 25th of last month. He was the author of the best-selling title "The Home" in the "Home." It was borrowed from Friends' Library. Since 1847 he was Assistant Librarian in the British Museum.

Emigration to America has created so great a dearth of labor in the agricultural districts of Germany that Chinese coolies are now being imported for field work in the provinces of Silesia, East Prussia, Posen and Pomerania. Coolies are content to work for 20 cents a day, and if they continue to arrive in large numbers emigration of German peasants to this country will likely receive a great impetus.

It has been discovered that the Executive Committee of the Socialist party are lack of the local organizers of the Hamburg strike. They are working out of the interest of the laborers in the interest of the Social-Democratic Party. It is said the strike would have been settled if the Socialists had not intervened. It is thought the Government will soon take some action.

Spanish merchants and financiers decided to attempt to raise 400,000,000 pesetas to loan the Government.

In Eastern Australia a hundred million sheep and great herds of cattle and horses now feed upon pastures covering flat ground which thirty years ago was a desert of soft sand, so "rotten" that the feet sank at every step. This once worthless ground has been beaten into compact soil by the feet of the sheep and cattle, and it is believed that other great desert expanses in Australia may be turned into productive pasture, and in a similar manner.

A terrific wind storm, accompanied by heavy rain, swept over the Windward and Leeward Islands last week. The loss of life is known to have been great. A number of sugar, coffee and cotton estates were inundated.

A St. Johns despatch says that "the purchase of the Newfoundland Railway by the Government will bring the cost of the road to $19,000,000, which is 95¢ per head of the population."

The Newfoundland Government has decided to purchase the Newfoundland Railway for the sum of $1,775,000. The railway company, besides handing over its lines to the Government, will relinquish all its contracts for coal and timber within its colony.

During a protracted illness of several months duration, a struggle for resignation to the Divine will was often the clothing of her spirit, and finally through the mercy of our Heavenly Father she adapted the language, "Not my will, but thine be done, O Lord!" Her close was peaceful, giving evidence to relative and friends that her purified spirit is forever at rest.

TO L. H. B.

"PHILADELPHIA, Second Month 15th, 1865.

"I have indeed been remiss in not writing sooner. It has often been on my mind, but the very right time did not seem to come, and unless it is right, a long connection of words would profit little. I almost always feel the responsibility of writing to my young friends to be great, and beseech Him, who can direct every minute circumstance in life to bless my endeavors to be of some service.

"Dost thou ever think of me during all these storms? There is something very joyous to me a storm, particularly snow storms. They seem to be like such a lot of little white birds coming down, and the covering is so beautiful and pure or the dark earth. I have seen storms of thunder and lightning so awful, that I have wished they would cease, but still their very awe has been acceptable to me.

"I love to feel the majesty and power of the Almighty one, who is so merciful and condescending, too. Sometimes lately I have been afraid I love Him too easily, and besought for a greater dread upon my spirit. 'I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me.' He forgives our transgressions so soon, that I often feel like the one to whom much was forgiven and who loved much. Thou hast such good views of his wonders there in the country, and not a glance from the window but can bring thee a token of his power. Thou hast the heart to prize it too, and that is still better.

"How thankful I am that He has touched thy heart, and led thee to seek the knowledge of Him, whom to know is life eternal. I hope my dear Laura is not shunning the cross in anything. A jealousy has been with me ever since thy last visit on that point, but I know not why, and cannot and should not judge. O, my dearest, we must be broken to pieces upon the rock Christ Jesus—nothing else will do. Poor Job was broken at the last, and I have felt his state more than ever of late, and thankfully, too, putting my hand upon my mouth, feeling the vileness of my nature—nothing in me good, only kept alive and allowed to walk the earth by his goodness, but sometimes feeling a desire to depart and be at rest.

"Your visit was appreciated by me, for poverty in the conversational line is so often my lot, that it must be the person's goodness of heart only that prompts a visit to me. Dear E. W.! How changed! I could not see that peculiar modest, winning look that had so frequently attracted my heart towards her before. Perhaps it was the way she wore her hair. I like best to remember her as in former times. There is no prejudice; it is merely the uncontrollable attraction of the heart. I hope she may be preserved meek and lowly, like a little child, at his feet. How I long for that for thee, too, my dear! O, for preservation; O, for preservation for my precious L. Thou art tempted, without doubt, but try to beg to be delivered from evil each day, and He who can open every eye will show thee the snares of thine enemy. Why I have written thus I know not, it may prove a warning some time. Remember thy poor struggling friend at times. Storms of temptation have been in her path; but one Friend remarked to me, 'Storms purify the air.' I have found it so, for I can love and fear Him more deeply and walk more faithfully from them. Thanks be unto Him, who can give the victory to thee and to me.

Thine truly as ever,

"D. B."

Second Month 5th.—My dear Lord instructed me last night in a vision. All the week I had been tried with words coming into my mind, as though they must be expressed in meeting, and a little inclination in me at times, to remember them. I went to bed feeling that my Father pitied me. About the middle of the night I dreamed I was a servant girl with several others, and that they had formed a plot to injure the mistress and rob her house. I knew it was wrong to go with them, but was afraid to oppose them, so went out upon the roof while they engaged in their guilty work. Soon the mistress came and caught them, but they escaped and threw me a pair of shoes, saying they might be my share. The other articles were recovered, but my shoes I never had the courage to restore, but thought I would wear them sometimes. There seemed to be a vague impression that they brought me into disgrace afterwards. I tried to turn away from this unpleasant dream, but soon the passages, "Being shod with the preparation of the Gospel of peace," and "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation," etc., came to mind, and I was instructed that I had been stealing shoes, and that I must be shod only with his power, and my heart must be lifted up for this "Holy Ghost to come upon me and the power of the Most High to overshadow me, if He ever called me again to his work." "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place wherein thou standest is holy ground." Oh, most merciful God, preserve thy poor servant, help me to be like clay in thy hands, and increase my faith. Preserve me in holy reverent silence and submission of soul before thee, oh, Father.

TO L. H. B.

"Sixth Month 6th, 1865."

"It does seem almost as if I had neglected thee wrongfully, but my heart has been with thee many a time, where feeling was too deep for utterance even with this medium. Dost thou ever know, my dear, what it is to have a heart full of prayer and petitioning, and to feel that the Spirit maketh intercession for us, according to the will of God? What a blessed assurance we have, that He knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, and that all things shall work together for good to them that love God! How rich is his mercy! How unsearchable are his ways, and his judgments past finding out! Who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed unto Him again.' O, dear Laura, let us serve Him fully, being like good old Joshua, whatever others do, we will serve the Lord.

"I have been deeply impressed of late with his mercy in taking away all our sins, casting them behind his back, or into the depths of the sea that we cannot find them. O, He forgives all our shortcomings and shines upon us with the blessed light of his countenance. We indeed see his mercy towards our nation. We have had a sad bereavement, but if it may be, it came just in time to save our people from sinful exultation."

Yes, my dear, it is an inexpressible comfort to feel that his good Spirit does visit all, everybody. How long it has driven with and waited for us. When cast down, remember He looks at the contrite in heart, and regards them as a Father does his children. My heart would faint many a time, and I my spirit be overwhelmed if it were not for this supporting assurance. My thoughts so often stray, instead of every one being brought into subjection to the obedience of Christ. I met with a verse which touched the right chord:

"O to grace, how great a debtor"

Daily I am constrained to be.

Let that grace, Lord, like a fetter

Bind my wandering heart to thee."

"And another:

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,

That were an offering far too small,

Love, so amazing, so divine,

Demand my heart, my life, my all!"

"A very interesting work, which seems to be comments on the book of Exodus, has been loaned me, and I am enjoying it so much. The writer spiritualizes almost everything. The crossing the Red Sea and the wilderness journey is very interesting. Oh, let us not murmur at anything, as they did, but in everything give thanks; though there may be some bitter cups meted out for our refinement and sanctification. The last word seems most to help and good when we look at our own poor souls, but let us look 12th.—I have been discussing some passage to come to mind, or that the Lord would speak to me, when suddenly these words came, "The Lord looking down, loveth such as wait and watch for Him," accompanied with the feeling, that I ought to give them to others. I did so soon, but did not find them for myself afterwards. I am afraid I gave away what was for myself. Oh, Lord, for preservation. Teach thy poor child. Why do I not have more peace? These words came to-night, "Oh, that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments, then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." Oh, help me, Lord, this week.

Getting Something for Nothing.

A dangerous thing in the moral world is the desire of getting something for nothing. It is this desire that leads the thief to break the house and the highwayman to take the road. It is this desire that causes the gambler to substitute gaming for honest labor, and to try by a lucky deal to become the possessor of the money or goods of others. It is this desire that prompts men to bet on horse races and elections—the desire of getting other men's property without giving a fair equivalent. It is this desire that leads men to reckless speculation in futures and real estate and to the formation of trusts and monopolies. It was this desire run mad that led England into the South Sea Bubble and caused ruin and untold misery to thousands—that led France into Law's Mississippi Bubble, and came near plunging the nation into total bankruptcy. It is this same desire that is causing the desolation of hundreds of our American homes every year—this desire which is so fatal to the incentive to honest effort.

Let it be put down as an axiom that it is impossible to make something out of nothing. No way has ever been devised, or ever can be devised, of getting something for nothing, in which one party does not suffer to the extent that the other gains. If the thief steals, the owner must lose the goods stolen, if the gambler wins a thousand dollars, his opponent must lose that amount; if a syndicate buys up all the wheat on the market and makes a fortune out of it, somebody must pay dear for flour; if a company waters its stock, somebody must buy water; if people ride on a bubble, they must expect to be precipitated when the bubble bursts. There is but one correct and thoroughly honest business principle, and that is to give value received in every transaction. An equivalent must be given. This equivalent may be in labor, in goods, in money, in what you please; but it must be an equivalent. All else is on a false basis and leads to evil.

This experiment of making something from nothing has been tried time and again by nations as well as by individuals. Kings and parliaments have issued paper money and false coins and inflated currency, and always with one result. History will be searched in vain for a single instance of fiat money which has held its own for any considerable time and which has not resulted in loss either to the Government or to those who trusted the Government.

And the experiment has failed in every instance for one simple reason: the money did not represent actual value. Kings and nations cannot speak value into existence. It never has been done.—Calvin S. Brown, in The Independent.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Man—His Nature and Relation to His Maker.

In man are found three distinct essentials to his being, viz: body, mind and soul.

The psalmist David referred not alone to his body when he exclaimed, "I will praise thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works, and that my soul knoweth right well" (Ps. cxxxix: 14), for presently he refers to a higher One as speaking to his soul, saying, "How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them" (v: 17).

He who created the light created the eye to behold the light and all created things in that light. He who created sound formed the ear to hear. So of Christ, the Eternal Word, by whom all things were made, it is said, "In Him was life, and the life was the light of men" (John: 1: 4). The eye and the ear of the soul must then be opened by God, that they may see and hear the things of God, for "the things of God knoweth no man, but the spirit of God" (1 Cor. ii: 11). This then, is God's new visitation to the man, by his grace in Christ.

Modern scientists aver that the original source of all terrestrial light is the sun. From it we know that perpetual streams of heat and light do flow. It may also be the prime fountain and source of all electrical action, which also furnishes light, and as for wood, coal or other animal or vegetable matter, they all owe their combustible properties to the sun's action, at some, it may be remote, period of their formation. By means of these subtle agencies, man transmits his thoughts thousands of miles along the bed of the ocean, causes the very tones of his voice to be heard hundreds of miles distant, transports himself a mile a minute, delineates objects in the perfection of outline, light and shade. Such marvellous power has the mind of man been permitted to acquire over matter, or the powers of nature.

But what are these to Him who made them all? Who gave to man such power to subdue the elements to his will? Can we fathom his power? Can we limit his knowledge? Ah, no, his Name remains forever, Almighty, Omnipotent, All-seeing, Omnipresent. The best and wisest of men have acknowledged, "Thou understandest my thoughts afar off." "There is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, oh, Lord, thou knowest it altogether" (Ps. cxxxix: 4). "Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it" (v: 6).

He who created all these things, and man himself, empowering him to subdue them to his purpose, is the Eternal Word, the Sun and Source of all spiritual light to the soul of man.

It has pleased God that in Him should be hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. He quickens and enlightens the soul to see and understand the things of God. He unlocks the seals and opens the heart and the understanding. And these gifts He dispenses to those who love and fear Him of his own free grace, and not according to the power or cultivation of man's wisdom or intellect. For, as the man strong in body is often inferior in mental power to one possessing less bodily vigor, so likewise the man of great intellectual capacity often falls short in the fervor of his soul, to him who, though of weaker mind, is enlightened and strengthened in his soul by the Holy Spirit. Not that weakness in one commands the strength in another, for, all things else being equal, he is best fitted for work in the world, who is able both in body, mind and spirit, for that which he is called to do, and all may be laid on the altar of God's service.

In man rightly ordered, Christ is the Head and all in the man is governed in the love and fear of God. The mind is preserved from harboring evil thoughts, which the enemy of souls may shoot as darts at the man, and from the lusts and motions of the flesh to sin, and the body is made a servant to righteousness alone, nor is it permitted to do evil. Indeed every thought and deed is brought to the judgment seat of Christ. Such is the man who walks with God, who obeys the command, "Be ye holy, as I the Lord your God am holy."

It may indeed please God to call the weak and despised of the world, and to fill them with Divine power, and to ordain strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, that his name alone must be glorified; yet must we remember that it would not be right for us to desire to be weak in either bodily or mental gifts, as though being so would commend us to God or draw down Divine favor, for truly what are all these things before Him?

All must be laid in the dust and we become humbled as little children; so must the kingdom of God be received, that each one may sit at the feet of Jesus, our Teacher Divine, and do as He said, "Learn of me." Therefore whilst not slothful in our lawful business or calling, let us at the same time "be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." Let Him reign in us whose right it is, "Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts." "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit, soul and body, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." (1 Thess. v: 23)

W. W. B.

DUTY, OR PRIVILEGE?—How common it is for us to feel that we have a duty to be at work in Christ's service! How rare it is that we realize the privilege of doing any work for Christ. We almost think that Christ needs our help and that therefore we ought to take hold and do what we can for Him. We are liable to lose sight of the fact that Christ is in no sense dependent upon any of us for any service whatsoever, and that He simply confers an honor upon us when He permits us to do anything in the prosecution of his Heavenly work here on earth. Even under a human administration there are many places to be filled, and many applicants for those places. Whether the position be as a representative in a foreign land, or as a worker in a subordinate place nearer home, he who is asked to accept it, and to receive its honors and its emoluments accordingly, can hardly suppose that he deserves any credit for taking the position, and so for being a share in the toils and the triumphs of the administration which appoints him to it. Why, then, should any Christian disciple suppose that he confers a favor on his Divine Master by accepting a position of service and of honor at home or abroad, when those who are worthier than himself might have been selected in his stead? And when we realize the privilege of working for Christ, we shall not want to neglect that privilege in term time or in vacation.—S. S. Times.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Visit to Logan's Quarry.

On the twenty-fourth of Eleventh Month, I left home to pay a visit, long contemplated, to one of the quarries of Chester County, Pa.; the point most especially aimed at was what is known as Logan's Quarry—about two miles west of Juniouville. A kind friend met me at West Chester, and to his good services I am indebted for the success of the excursion.

Our first visit was to the limestone quarry in the Chester County Poor-house farm. The limestone contains Magnesia, and is quite crystalline in structure, but does not present the neat faces of rock which are visible in Baker's quarry, described in a recent number of THE FRIEND. A bed of rotten gneiss containing such mica occupies part of the quarry, and here is also much quartz. Indeed, the most of these limestone deposits, south of the great valley, contains more or less quartz, in some cases so much as to destroy the value of the stone for agricultural purposes. A geological friend told me that he was consulted about a limestone which looked well, but would not burn into lime. On analyzing it, he found that it was more than half quartz.

Several interesting minerals have been found in this quarry, among them Chesterite, which was once regarded as a variety of feldspar. It occurs in cavities in the limestone in the form of crystals. As the quarry had not been worked for some years, circumstances did not favor our making much of a collection. Some of the poorest inmates were at the quarry, loading an x-cart, with earth, to repair the ice-dam. On acquiring after minerals, they referred us to one they called "Chesterite Billy," who had resided at the institution for several years, and appeared to have taken more interest in such matters than he others. We hunted him up, and he said the Chesterite was found in pockets in the limestone, and promised shortly to procure specimens for us.

Soon after breakfast the next morning we started for Logan's quarry. The men were at work on a bed of beautiful white stone, which might be called marble. Overlaying this was a large quantity of limestone sand, which is found to be a very useful material for raising plants from cuttings, the roots seeming to grow unusually readily from the cuttings inserted into it, to green-houses.

One of the inducements to visit this quarry was to obtain specimens of tremolite, a mineral which is often found in this locality. Tremolite is considered as one of the varieties of Hornblende, a mineral which possesses many forms, which are identified as belonging to the same group, by certain peculiarities of the crystallization. The dark green or black individuals are called Hornblende, and contain considerable iron; actinolite generally presents lighter green colors, and is usually crystallized in long, slender prisms; tremolite has white fibres, and contains a mere trace of iron. It is mainly a compound of silica, magnesia and lime. It derives its name from Tremola, in Switzerland, where it was first found.

Not being familiar with the quarry, we did not meet with the mineral at first, and so went to the house of the proprietor. His sister produced a tray of minerals, and showed us several specimens, one of which was very beautiful, the fine delicate fibres were arranged side by side, as if a strand of very fine cotton had been transformed into rock. The owner knew it as cotton-stone. We admired the smoothness and glossy texture, and returned to the quarry to make a further search. We soon found on one of the blocks of stone, quarried for the limekiln, a coating of tremolite, which furnished us with several very good specimens of this beautiful mineral. It seems probable that in the process of hardening the original ocean sediment of corals and shells into limestone rocks, the silica, lime and magnesia of which Tremolite consists, had been taken up into solution in heated water, and subsequently crystallized into the beautiful fibres in which we found it.

Logan's quarry has produced some large crystals of sulphure of iron, or iron pyrites, and we saw a large piece of rock, which was penetrated by numerous crystals of dark Turmaline. Like the Tremolite, these were probably formed by crystallization from aqueous solution, in remote ages. Turmalines are found of various colors. The composition of the black is mainly of silica, aluminum and iron, mixed with small proportions of several other ingredients. The green species contain less iron, but some lithia, and in the red the iron disappears, and its place is partially supplied by boracic acid and manganese.

Well pleased with our success, we returned homeward by another road, which crossed the serpentine barrens of Newlin township, where considerable quantities of that valuable mineral, Corundum, had been dug. The works are at present abandoned, but a large area of perhaps one hundred acres was marked with the piles of earth and rock, which showed where exploration had been made for corundum. The variety in the appearance of the stones lying on the surface, made me wish for the presence of a skilled mineralogist, who could have pointed out the different species that were exposed to view.

On this barren spot grew quantities of the Mountain Pink (Phlox subulata), which much frequents the serpentine ridges, and in the Fourth and Fifth Months covers them with a sheet of bloom. I was surprised and pleased to find some of them in flower at this late season of the year. I supposed that the mildness of the weather had so favored the growth of the plant, that the flowers which in ordinary course would have appeared next spring, had ventured to show themselves at this early period.

Although it was an unexpected pleasure to find Phlox in bloom, yet it was not very surprising, for during the Eleventh Month I had met with several similar instances. The winter Jessamine, whose yellow blossoms are among the earliest which show themselves, after winter has passed, had been in flower for a week or two. Among those I had seen in bloom were the Round-leaved Mallow (Malva rotundifolia), whose fruit, composed of numerous small capsules, aggregated into a flattened head, the children were accustomed to call cheese; the Yellow Dandelion; the Peppergrass, (Lepidium Virginicum), and the common Chickweed (Stellaria media), a hardy plant which Dr. Darlington says may be found in flower, in mild winters, in every month of the year.

On the whole, the trip was a very interesting and instructive one. J. W.

Against the Teaching of War in History Text Books.

"Particularly by the study of the ancient poets and historians," it was justly remarked by William Ellery Channing, "the sentiments of early and barbarous ages on the subject of war are kept alive in the mind; and though Christian by profession, some of the earliest and deepest impressions are received in the school of unevangelized antiquity." On the same theme the eminent essayist, John Foster, wrote: "Who can tell how much that passion for war, which, from the universality of its prevalence, might seem inseparable from the nature of man, may, in the civilized world, have been reinforced by the enthusiastic admiration with which young men have read Homer and similar poets, whose genius transforms what is, and ought always to appear, purely horrid, into an aspect of grandeur." It was, hence, a sufficiently frank admission that was lately made in a leading religious journal by an apologist for the Boys' Brigade scheme, that "all healthy boys have a love of soldiery born in them," leaving as a not unfair inference the corollary that the youth who did not resent an attack upon his rights or strike back when assaulted, must be weak and unwholly.

It is a lamentable but natural sequence of this emulation of the false-heroic models found so largely in pagan classics, as contra-distinguished from those moulded upon the pure Christian type, which heretofore have been kept too much in the background, that the school history text-books of our day are so largely what they are, a compend of the battles of one's country, with a very pronounced bias under the label of patriotism for "my country, right or wrong." That was therefore a much needed testimony penned by Rector Alex. Mackay-Smith, in responding to an invitation to be present at the conference on international arbitration in Independence Hall, on last Washington's birth-day, in which he said, "Our children are nurtured on stories of British cruelty in the Revolutionary war; the devil, to them, has a red coat, and carries a Queen Anne musket. My great-grandfather was an officer in that war, but I wish we could forget the whole conflict. My own children are growing up to dislike England because of that old war as told in their school books. It is time to stop it. Patriotism is the noblest virtue, but it must not be nourished in hate. A little common sense as well as Christian charity on both sides is needed."

At the meeting here referred to, Prof. W. Hudson Shaw, of Oxford, England, deprecated the undemocratic policy and some of the language of the premier, believing that they did not fairly represent English public sentiment, which he said was largely in sympathy with American institutions, and for lasting peace between the two countries. He found fault, in a mild way, however, with the text-books used in American schools, which incited enmity toward the mother country in the minds of our youth. Felix Adler, of New York, endorsed Professor Shaw's mild protest against un-called-for anti-British sentiment in American text-books, and said he felt at liberty as an American to make the protest in stronger language. The audience, the newspaper report says, heartily applauded reference to the subject.

It was to help counteract this most pernicious method of acquainting our young people with the history of their country, that I brought out in 1877 my United States History, and some years later, my smaller history, more especially for the use of schools. Several editions of each of these were issued, but as there are none now for sale, I shall not be charged with advertising the books. In the pre-tory note to the first issue, the following avowal from my personal experience of the pernicious pedagogic battle-drilling referred to, is thus stated:

"This persistent indoctrination of warlike ideas resulted in producing an intensely partisan feeling, so that the very name of 'British' or 'Mexican' became a hateful sound to our patriotic apprehensions. Indeed our principal concern appeared to be to learn how much greater was the battle loss in killed and wounded on the part of the British, than was that of the Americans. It is not using too forcible an expression to say that there was begotten in our youthful minds something of the malignant sentiment of murderers. Of the moral loss occasioned by a state of warfare, together with its exceeding expensiveness, we had no conception. To supply, in a measure, this lack of information, and to promote the knowledge of those things in the past and present history of our country which tend to its peace, prosperity and true renown, are the purposes of this work. The rule of political action recommended may be concisely expressed by that vigorous Anglo-Saxon word—straightforwardness."

We have lately had some very recent exemplifications of this teaching of international antagonism, on the part of the lads and young men in some of the public schools, colleges and universities of Spain and the United States respectively. The Philadelphia Record tells of a small boy who made a quantity of crayon-colored paper flags of Spain, which, in an explosion of patriotism he threw one by one into the kitchen fire, and then "schemally loaded his Fourth of July pistol with caps and fired a salute in honor of the event."

For a number of years Herman Molkenboer, of Bonn, Germany, has been corresponding with editors, essayists and teachers in various countries of Europe and America, for the purpose of propagating information upon this matter, and seeking, by representations to governments and school boards, to effect a change in the usual harmful way of presenting patriotism in the history text-books. In an address last year to schoolmasters and teachers, in Stockholm, Sweden, by M. F. Rasmussen, the mischievous effect of the present almost universal pollution of school-books and popular histories with the war spirit and eulogies of the battle field, was vigorously presented. It was declared to be a national curse. "The war spirit is the evil spirit of schools, and the war spirit is the evil spirit of the community." In Denmark, a handy manual of history has been lately issued, in which the author, N. E. Højberg, has forbidden to give the warrior a place of honored prominence in comparison with the useful citizen, the philanthropist, the artist, the inventor, the engineer. In Glasgow, Scotland, since the first of this year, the local school board having been memorialized upon the subject of the presentation of peace and against the teaching of un-friendliness towards foreign nations, acceded to a request that a lecture, illustrated by fine-line drawings of scenes described on the battle-fields of eastern France, be given the scholars, and that copies of the anti-war essay of M. Sève, a government schoolmaster of France, which obtained the prize offered by the International Arbitration and Peace Association, be distributed to the teachers.

In the year 1853, I laid before the then United States commissioner of education, John Eaton, the desirability (as it seemed to me) of issuing a bulletin upon this matter for the information and right stimulation of our teachers, proffering some material if such was desired. The commissioner, in reply, said that while he could not promise to use such material as a bulletin, he would be greatly obliged for any statement of facts I might be able to send him.

The present commissioner of education, W. T. Harris, having also been written to on the foregoing subject, has replied that he thinks the presentation of the matter is "timely," and will "do good in the way of developing a feeling in favor of international arbitration." The commissioner surely occupies a position wherein he can greatly advance this very important reform, and I think it is not hoping too much to believe that he will be found actively interesting himself in so furthering it.

In a late number of the Herald of Peace, of London, is a stirring editorial on "The Education of the Young in Pacific Sentiments," wherein cheering recognition is given to the fact that "at peace congresses and meetings there is being manifested an increasing sense of the importance of taking definite and systematic measures to educate the young in pacific sentiments and to indoctrinate the minds, both of school children and college students, with sound and humane principles in relation to the evils of war and the blessing of international concord." Allusion is made to the recent agitation of the subject in some of the European states, as well as in England, while occasion is taken to specially point out how our text-books in America, in treating of the Revolutionary War, have sedulously fostered the bad feeling in omitting to point out how it was that the obstinacy and folly of George the Third, and of Lord North, did not rightly reflect the prevalent opinion of the British people generally upon the matters then at issue with the colonies. Green's History of the English People is cited as a historic work of the better, unprejudiced class.

The Arbitrator, likewise of London, has also a valuable editorial which refers to the visit to United States this summer, of Samuel Plimssoll, favorably known for his successful efforts in connection with the amelioration of the international steamer passenger service. The distinct purpose of his visit was to make examination of a large number of our school histories, with the object of obtaining data upon the genesis and perpetuation of an alleged very antagonistic feeling in the United States toward the mother country. "Before he left this country [England], he searched thirty-four of the histories used in our Board Schools, without finding any unkind allusion to the United States, but he asserts that the opposite is the case in America. As a practical result of his inquiries, it is reported that he has persuaded the federal commissioner of education to deal with the subject in his next report. To a New York reporter, Mr. Plimssoll sensibly commented upon the sort of history he found in American school-books. "It seems strange to me that you should allow the ill feeling caused by a war of one hundred and twenty years ago to still exist. You must remember that nine-tenths of the English people were opposed to the war at the time, and that the remaining one-tenth, the governing class, was divided within itself on the subject. Why let the nets of a datt old king, who was in retirement for insanity two or three times, cause an everlasting animosity toward the England of to-day, which has no more to do with that time than the United States of to-day has?"

This matter of the great folly of King George in his treatment of the claims and grievances of the American colonies was well enlarged upon by Edwin D. Mead, editor of the New England Magazine, in an address on "The True Historic Relations of England and America," delivered not long ago at Lake Mohonk. "This then," he concludes his theme, "is what we want to make our people know, that in the American Revolution England did not hate us, but that the best men in England were our friends from that time to this,—the men of the Revolution and fathers of our constitution finding their greatest eulogists in English statesmen like Brougham and Gladstone. . . . The English historians, Green, Gardiner and the rest, tell the story of the American Revolution precisely as we desire to have it told; and above all, the boys and girls in the district schools are taught this history from their text-books in the right way, in the way which makes them love and admire us and our fathers, instead of hating us."<sup>8</sup>

In our own country, John Bach MacMaster, has given us a history modelled somewhat after that of Green, in making more prominent the social and industrial conditions of the people. Arthur Gilman, author of "A History of the American People," wrote me (1885) about the time that that work was published, relative to his non-use of battle pictures: "I avoided the class of cuts upon which you animadvert, because they are usually not true (being simply imaginative), as well as because I think them improper to be placed before children. I have written more or less on historical subjects, and find myself constantly drawn away from strife toward the contemplation of the peaceful progress of civilization. Wars must doubtless be recorded, but let us not emphasize their details."

Nearly seventy years ago (in 1828) that conscientious educator, Emma H. Willard, of Troy, New York, deprecating the large space usually given to the wars, made the effort to supply a text-book of United States history of a more beneficent character than those ordinarily in use. Sometime before the civil war, a friend of New York city (Ruth Murray, I think) made an essay in the same direction. About 1880, appeared the compendious class book of Dr. Edward Taylor, and two or three years ago, the one compiled by Prof. A. C. Thomas, of Haverford College. This, I understand, is being revised for a new edition.

It will not suffice that the history compiler's standpoint be that of forbearance and amity between the United States and Great Britain, or between the Anglo-Saxon peoples the world over. The conscience of professing Christendom appears to be slowly coming up to the apprehension that the settlement of the misunderstandings and grievances of its component nations by resort to fighting, is not only expensive and barbarous, but that it is morally wrong.

When that deeply inquisitive disciple of Confucius, Li Hung Chang, visited Gladstone month or two ago, and asked him what he thought of war, England's greatest statesman liberally replied: "War benefits nobody, in all cases one country is in the wrong, and every often both countries are in the wrong." A good marginal note indeed for the new text-book of history that shall tell of Earl Li's noble tour.

<sup>8</sup>The following was noted, some years ago, after looking over an English compilation, Little Arthur's History of France. "While this book, for children mainly, contains fifteen illustrations, one of these is a murder scene, eleven are representations of battles or other warlike subjects, and one has reference to an incident of war. There remains, then, but one picture, in addition to the map, which does not suggest to enquiring youth, that man is, above all things else, a fighting animal."

GROWING OLD.

They call it going down the hill
When we are growing old,
And speak with mournful accents
When our tale is nearly told;
They sigh when talking of the past,
The days that used to be,
As if the future were not bright
In immortality.

But it is not going down,
'Tis climbing higher and higher,
Until we reach the mountain
To which our souls aspire;
For if the natural eye grows dim,
It is but dim to earth,
While the eye of faith grows keener
To see the Saviour's worth.

For though in truth the outward man
Must perish and decay,
The inward man shall be renewed
By grace from day to day;
Those who are planted by the Lord,
Unshaken in their root,
Shall in their old age flourish
And bring forth clearest fruit.

It is not years that make men old,
The spirit may be young
Though fully three-score years and ten
The wheels of life have run;
God has himself re-ordered
In his blessed Word of Truth,
That they who wait upon the Lord
Shall oft renew their youth.

And when the eye, now dim with tears,
Shall open to behold the King,
And ears now dull with coming age
Shall hear the harps of heaven ring,
And on the head now hoary
Shall be placed a crown of gold,
Then shall we know the lasting joy
Of never growing old.

WHEN MOTHER SITS DOWN BY THE FIRE.

MARY BURR BANES.

When the five o'clock chime brings the easiest time
That is found in the whole of the day;
When Larry and Gus and the others of us
Come in from our study or play;
When we push the big chair to the hearth over there,
And pile the wood higher and higher,
And we make her a space in the very best place—
And mother sits down by the fire.

There's a great deal to say at the close of the day,
And so much to talk over with mother;
There's a comical sight or a horrible plight,
Or a ball game, or a meeting of other;
And she'll laugh with Larry and sigh with Harry,
And smile to our heads and desire;
At a triumph won or a task well done—
When sitting down there by the fire.

Then little she'll care for the clothes that we tear,
Or the havoc we strike on her taylor;
For the toil and the strife of our everyday life
She will wear as a little bit harder;
Then our lady is she, and her knights we would I be,
And her trust don't they deeds will inspire;
For we long then anew to be generous and true—
When mother sits down by the fire.

A Search for Truth.

[This pamphlet printed by J. E. Southall of Newport, Monmouthshire, England, is an autobiographical narrative of an ex-convict officer of the Salvation Army. It is reprinted with slight omissions.]

"DEAR FRIENDS:—Some of you have been concerned at the change in my manner of life, and have thought I was backsliding from my Christian profession, and seeing that no man liveth to himself alone, I have felt constrained to give you some account of what had led to the change, in order that none may be discouraged by what they have thought to be my unreasonable rejection of some common customs. I am the more inclined thereto because I have removed from the midst of some of my acquaintances before there was much opportunity for explanation. In the change I humbly believe I have been under Divine direction, and my quotations of scripture chapter and verse are made in the interest of those who believe the Holy Scriptures to be the one rule for the Christian. For myself, I accept the Holy Spirit of Christ as the primary and universal rule, and this accords with the scripture statement, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God," they are the Sons of God, and others. That is the Spirit who inspired the Holy Scriptures, and consequently will never be contrary to them.

"In my boyhood and afterwards, I came in close contact with many professors of the various sects of religion who seemed to have no confidence in the reality of their ground of faith, but almost all spoke and acted as if their forms and ceremonies were carried out, so that, if in the final event the Bible proved true, they would be all right, and if not, there would be no harm done; and indeed with solemnity I write it, religion was often treated like a system of fire insurance. Yet in my soul I knew that there was such a thing as real religion, and I often yearned for power to overcome the evil in my nature, but as I look back in the light of subsequent events, I believe that many of the sermons I heard, and books I read, tended to convince rather than assist me. In despair I got careless of restraint, and allowed myself to run into evil courses, although hypocritically professing Christianity, and many times entering into controversy with others on religion. At last I heard some new converts of the Salvation Army detail their experience, in which they spoke with confidence of a personal spiritual communication with Christ, and I felt that I had found some who knew God.

"I went from them with a fresh hope and desire for purity, that I too might know and serve God. For months my mental struggles were intense, I knew I was in a hopeless stony nature, but I felt that it would be a terrible thing, for flesh and blood, to let God have his way with me. I felt that, to obtain the pearl I must give up all to which I clung; in short, I must pay the price. I again went to a S. A. meeting, and in the craving for onward and upward, instead of looking to the Light of Christ within, I went to the "penitent form": I was bidden "only believe," but I felt they were blind guides, as I knew what was required, and went away still miserable.

"Some months later I heard the word "converting" used in a quotation from Holy Scripture, and it was so applied to my mind that I was enabled to submit my will to the discipline of God's Holy Spirit, that He might truly convert me from evil to righteousness.

"Alone, I dealt with God. Smoking was a terrible habit to me, which I had attempted to combat in vain, but faith, which is the gift of God, was given me, and I was enabled there and then to destroy my smoking apparatus, and the taste for tobacco has never returned, the taste for strong drink was also taken away—and now came a still greater conflict: It was required of me that I should confess and make restitution for wrongs which I had done. It was terrible, and I could only get so far as to say that I was helpless, but that I would submit at such time and as far as He would give me power to do so; this was accepted, and the peace in my soul was sweet.

"The entire history of my spiritual struggles need not be given. I found few who could sympathize with me, and all my conflicts were without human intervention. Yet with all this I was very busy as to the outward; I wanted others to know something of salvation, and too often I ran without being sent. Among other things I induced the Salvation Army to open meetings in our neighborhood, and was prominent in the meetings. For a time I was carried on by the excitement, and bore an appearance of satisfaction even after I had begun to have misgivings as to the spirituality of the S. A. system; nevertheless, I felt a living desire to be heart what God would have me to be; and in my first I prayed "Lord make me real," even when my mouth uttered other words. I was now required to make the confession and restitution which had been shown to me before, and I felt that it was more than I could endure, especially after having recently made such an outward profession, and had made acquaintance with Christians around. Long and fierce was the struggle in which I had weligned made shipwreck of faith, but finally I was, through grace, enabled to humble myself as in the dust; my confessions, etc., were received with surprise, but I was favored beyond expectation, and I came out of the conflict spiritually stronger than I had been. I continued my human best to convey to others the tidings of salvation, but was, to a very large extent, using the borrowed words so depreciated by the ancient prophets, although from time to time I felt that I was blessed in what I did. Gradually my eyes were opened to see the errors of the S. A. system, that even though some souls were brought to a degree of spiritual light, they were not left directed to the Spirit of Christ within them, but while in the tender soil were impressed with the importance of submission to the Salvation Army discipline and the rule of its officers, and so my growing soul has, I believe, thus gone back into the darkness; others by a spurious or bastard birth have made a fair show for a time, but gradually disappeared; and in this City of which I knew most, not five per cent of those who professed as salvatists, are now professing Christians.

"On the subject of prayer I felt especial concern, as I was satisfied that we can only pray truly as we are directed by God's Holy Spirit; but by certain people being called on to pray according as the desire of the other might suggest, the Spirit's leading was defeated, and practically there grew in every individual a deplorable formality, and regular attendants knew what words to expect in most of the prayers. I shrink sometimes to hear persons addressing the Trinity, and asking that souls should be brought out in that particular meeting, and telling God that His honor was at stake, as they had published the condition, viz.—Asking in Faith. I need not detail how the Army system works out, suffice to say that subsidiary officers are in dread of displeasing their superiors by showing decrease in numbers or finances, and hence are tempted to highly color and exaggerate their reports and statistics, and the spirit of emulation is continually appealed to by Staff Officers and in the 'War Cry.' I first expostulated with officers and then with William Booth, but my remarks were treated as signs of back-sliding, and eventually I could only find peace in withdrawing.

"My feelings, in the eager rush to carry the news of salvation everywhere, had been that unless men were told with the outward voice or else read from a book or paper of the way of salvation, they could not be saved from the punishment of hell; but several scriptures were gradually opened to my mind, as Rom. ii: 14 and 15; Luke xii: 47 and 48; and I felt that God was just, and would not damn souls without mercy, because of mine or another man's failure to keep up a regular round of preaching, singing and praying. This gradually took shape in my mind, but was still in a crude form, when I obtained an old copy of 'Barclay's Apology.' The teaching of Barclay answered to the Witness within me in most things, and in time I came to see the symmetry of the Truth, as owned by Ancient Friends.

"For some time after I left the Salvation Army, I taught a class in the Primitive Methodist school, spoke in their meetings on some occasions, and was much pressed to enter into membership with the people; it would have been pleasant to do so, but I dared not, as I felt I should not long be free to acknowledge that kind of worship which is done in man's will; and although I know good men in various sects who know God and the power of his resurrection in their souls, yet I feel that it is in spite of their religious surroundings, and not a consequence. Later on I felt that for me, it would be wrong to continue to attend formal worship, and found it right to sit in quietness in my own house and wait upon God after the manner of Friends, even though with no human companion.

"I felt for a long time that it would be pleasant to be near Friends (or Quakers) with whom I could hold converse, but as I came in contact with them and their modern literature, I found a mere shadow of the spiritual religion of Fox, Barclay, Penn, etc., and which had so answered to the Witness in my own soul. I found Friends' quiet singing more to my taste than the singing in most sects, but afterwards learnt that machine music was adopted by them in some places, and it led me to examine the subject, when it was shown me that music and singing as such, could not be worship, although an individual may, under the influence of the Spirit, express himself in song, or otherwise, as it shall please the Great Master of Assemblies to direct him.

"I now briefly state, viz.:—the principles which I believe are held by true Friends.

"Every man born on this earth, and while yet a dweller thereon, has such light given him that, if he will, he may escape perdition, and the Light named, is a manifestation of Christ in the soul. God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth.

"He is mentioned in Holy Scripture under various names, characters, and similitudes, to enable our finite minds to grasp some idea of his majesty, power, and glory.

"He is omnipresent, so that any place is suitable for worship if we can come into the 'silence of all flesh,' hence no building or place is holier or better than another. It is not allowable to uncover the head to honor any building, or man, or woman, because that is an act of worship due only to God. Oral expression of worship, prayer, or discourse, should be under the direct influence of the Holy Spirit, and any words spoken under his directions to whom all hearts are open) shall be as seeds falling on prepared ground; and to such words shall the ancient promise apply, 'My word shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please.'

"Absolute truth is required of all, whether in names, descriptions or assertion, hence in naming months, or days, I cannot give to them the names of heathen gods, the existence of which I do not believe, even though it be a custom with the world generally (Josh. xxiii: 1, Ex. xxiii: 13, Ex. xxiii: 2). Neither can I address one person as 'you,' seeing that 'you' is plural. Also truth requires the disuse of flattering words as 'Sir,' 'Worship,' 'Honor,' 'Reverend,' 'Mr.,' 'Mrs.,' 'Miss.'

"True baptism is Spiritual, i. e., a baptism into the nature, power, and influence of Christ, all types and shadows being done away now that the Jewish law is abrogated.

"Communion with Christ is Spiritual, and does not require the consumption of bread and wine, which was the outward part of the Passover Feast which Jesus directed his disciples (who were Jews) to continue, with a new meaning so often as that National Feast was partaken by them.

"The Word of God is Christ, and not the Scriptures, although they are words in all or in part written according to the Will of God. The Scriptures can never bring salvation, which must be by spiritual contact of the soul with Christ, with or without a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. In some cases 'word' is applied to some special command or message from God, but never to the Bible as a concrete book.

"It is wicked to take an oath, whether for private or public purposes. All oaths are forbidden by Christ, who said that our communications should be yea or nay, viz.:—Simple assertion without undue adjective, interjection, or forcible language.

"War, and the spirit that begets war, are contrary to the Spirit of Christ, and are utterly evil, and therefore unnecessary.

"As the Gift of God cannot be purchased with money, neither can spiritual gifts be dispensed by man in his own will. So it is evil for men to sell their supposed ministry for a money payment, and those who contribute thereto partake of the evil.

"That pride is evil, and it is wrong to deck our bodies and houses with mere ornament and trimming, yet cleanliness, decency, and order are desirable and necessary to every Christian.

"The Jewish law is of no effect as a compulsory institution, but many of its precepts, when voluntarily complied with, prove advantageous from a moral and sanitary point of view. Self-denial is absolutely necessary in the Christian life.

"For what I have written I alone am responsible, being at this date unconnected with any organized body or church."

"We should not forget that 'the kingdom of heaven is within'; that it is the state and affections of the soul, the answer of a good conscience, the sense of harmony with God, a condition of time as well as of eternity."—J. G. Whittier.

A Vaccine Farm.

In Marietta, Pa., in Lancaster County, where the richest farming land in that great State is found, is situated a model establishment known as the Lancaster County Vaccine Farms. Here is a series of buildings in which five hundred head of cattle could be under treatment at the same time if necessary—as might be the case in a great epidemic like that of 1872 should gain headway in the country. The animals selected are young heifers ranging from one to two or a half years, raised by the surrounding farmer for their future milk cows. These animals are rented to the vaccine propagators, being brought to the stables and prepared, and passed through the vaccinating process, and recovered to some health, and returned to their owners in about thirty days.

The animals are brought either in wagon built expressly for the purpose or are driven. They are thoroughly groomed and allowed to recover from the agitation of their journey. The temperature is taken morning and evening and they are tested with tuberculin for tuberculous. If any are found with this disease a price is fixed and they are at once killed, so as to remove all danger of infecting the locality. So careful has been the watch, and so resolute the destruction, that the whole region is wonderfully free from diseased animals of any kind. The accepted candidates are then removed to a stable that is as light as a lady's parlor, the floors being of a concrete that is washed into trapped drain pipes, and they are flushed so often as to be perfectly clean. The diet is that which experience has shown will produce the most perfect health, and just as great care given during the inevitable "sickness" that follows vaccination; for it is found that if moist food or unpalatable water is offered, an animal will often refuse to eat or drink for twenty-four hours, and at certain critical seasons this will result in the failure to form a proper vesicle and so far is unprofitable, pecuniarily viewed.

The operating room is flooded with sunshine but protected from the ingress of flies by window screens. When the animal is secured by the proper appliances, the operator, dressed in a clean suit of white duck, washes his hands in a bichlorid solution and scowries a spot that has previously been washed with bichlorid solution and shaved twice, and dried with a clean towel. The knife used has been carefully sterilized, and every precaution taken that no particle of dust shall get into the wounds. The lymph is carefully rubbed into the wounds, and the operator waits for the disease to run its course.

The vesicle is in a proper condition for the removal of the lymph in from five to seven days. A "crust" is formed that our fathers thought was the right material to use in the old-fashioned, human, arm-to-arm process. There are possibilities of this crust being contaminated by particles of dust, and if this dust is from dirt hay, the potent bacterium of lockjaw may be there. This is removed, and beneath it is a layer that is at once removed, for it often contains the bacteria of pus, which while worthless as vaccine, can set up a distressing inflammation in a new subject. All the area about the vesicle is washed with bichlorid before beginning the removal of the lymph. The ivory "points" on which it is taken are soaked in alcohol, placed on a screen and a lighted match applied, and afterward placed in a hot-air sterilizer, and arranged in wooden clamps holding, dry. Then as the lymph oozes up from the bared and cleansed vesicle, it is painted with terized brushes onto the points; and just as minute care is given to packing it for sale.

The operating room and the packing room are finished in wood matched to avoid cracks, carefully painted and varnished, and very frequently washed down with bi-chlorid solution. —The Independent.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Observing Nature.—When among the mountains of South Africa, Scott-Elliott had an attack of fever. He says, "I went into the hut and remember nothing till next morning, about ten o'clock, when the natives gave me a chicken and rum roots to satisfy a raging hunger.

"That day I crawled a few hundred yards into the jungle while my men were seeking the hings left up the hill, and sat down on a fallen log to watch the forest. Such moments can be but rarely permitted to a conscientious naturalist, whose whole time should be spent in tirelessly grabbing things not seen before, and ridding grasshopper after flighty and restless insects; but they are very pleasant when one can allow oneself a rest. A beautiful bird, which I believe to be a toucan, ran up and down a branch, using its broad, expanded tail as a balance. A troop of monkeys were feeding not far off, and seeing me perfectly still, came quite close. They were probably a species of Cercopithecus, with brown fur and white eyebrows and imperial. Their expression is very melancholy and depressed. Eight or nine of the older males came within five or ten yards, and regarded me severely; then they would slowly produce an enormous smile with an extremely comic effect. This is intended to frighten the observer, and is quite a common habit of monkeys. I have seen, e. g., the Colobus monkey doing the same thing.

"These things only happen when one has no run and is in a very patient condition. To those who are not by nature naturalists, it is a useful hint to remember that if one wishes to observe the habits of any living creature, from a humble bee to an antelope, the essential is to remain absolutely still. The very slightest movement directs the attention of any wild thing to the place, and it at once becomes suspicious. When quite still, they do not in most cases distinguish the difference in color. It is just as hard for us to see an insect when it is quite quiet, as the slightest movement reveals it if one watches patiently.

Bark Cloth.—The fig producing this cloth is very widely cultivated all through the Victoria region, and up to six thousand feet on Ruwenzori. On one of the rare occasions in which I managed to arrive unexpectedly in a Wawamba Valley, we heard from every hamlet the knocking of the heavy wooden mallet with which they beat out the strip of bark which is taken from a tree. They usually cut away a nearly complete cylinder from as high as they can reach to the ground. This is spread upon the trunk of a tree, and every portion is gently and regularly hammered till it becomes almost twice as wide as before. The cloth so formed is rather coarse in texture, but of a very nice brownish terra-cotta color. It is very easily torn, and becomes often completely spoiled by a single shower.—A Naturalist in Mid-Africa.

Silver-Trick Drawings, State and National.—"The Waste of Personal Liberty" versus the Warnings of Abstinence for the Public Good.—There is a good deal of earnest, even angry complaint from some of our large cities, notably New York and Philadelphia, that there are thousands of children for whom there has been no public school accommodation provided. The prevalence of prohibition, or, we will say, of personal abstinence for the individual good and the public good, would give the country in one year; 3,000 new public school houses in cities, costing $10,000 each, and 10,000 for the towns and the country districts, averaging $4,000 each, with 5,000 kindergartens and day nurseries for the children of the poor, at $2,000 each; 1,000 industrial schools, costing $50,000 apiece, supplemented by 2,500 public libraries at an average of the same liberal figure. As our abstinent people would be in a generally better condition to attend places of worship, we could provide 500 new church edifices in cities at $40,000 each, and 3,000 in the outlying districts at $10,000 each. Our hearts being then presumably enlarged, we would be able to supply for the relief of unfortunate, indigent and suffering humanity, 200 public hospitals, costing $500,000 each, 100 houses for incurables, at $75,000 each, 500 hospitals for consumptives at $100,000 each, 50 orphan asylums at the same cost, 100 training institutions for nurses at $50,000 each, and 1,500 poor women's employment rooms and soup kitchens at $1,000 apiece. Although our prisons and penitentiaries would no longer have even one occupant per cell, our fund could spare $100,000 apiece for 150 preventive and reformatory institutions, not forgetting the provision of public baths and gymnasiums, 200 houses for incurables, at $75,000 each, and to build 200 public parks adjacent to the cities, of 1,000 acres each, costing $400 per acre, together with 200 farm colonies of the same area, at one-fourth the expense per acre, for the "submerged tenth." Nevertheless, we would have still a very snug sum in hand that would have otherwise gone upon the nation's one thousand million dollar liquor score, wherever something else-able might be done in improving the country roads.

The legislature of Pennsylvania has been strenuously implicated for one million dollars, to make a routing beginning toward the improvement of the roads of that commonwealth, but with the billions of the waste-fund which we have been speaking, there could be constructed substantially surface-stone roads, of fourteen feet width, costing $4,000 per mile, on each side of the three trans-continental railway systems, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans, or a total length of 24,000 miles of mechanized roadway, after which, starting afresh, we could build a grand canalized-avenue, six times the width of the above, and costing $24,000 per mile, the whole ten thousand miles' circuit of the United States.—J. W. Lovell.

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 19, 1896.

It is instructive to observe how earnestly the Apostle Paul exhorted those formerly on whom rested the care of the congregation at Ephesus, "Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the church of God."

The duties of an overseer, in our own branch of the Christian church, are weighty and important, and they cannot be fully performed without watchfulness and devotedness to the cause of Christ; nor without the Divine help, which must be sought for and looked after in all labor that is designed to promote the spiritual welfare of others.

It is no light matter for any one to watch over the members of the Church; since he must give an account of his stewardship to the Great Master of us all. Those who are faithful herein, will be impressed with a sense of their own frailty, and of their dependence for preservation on a higher power; and hence will be enabled to enter into sympathy with those who are in danger of being drawn from the right way by the varied temptations which as a rule surround them; they will seek to strengthen, and to encourage faithful perseverance in well-doing.

If any of their fellow-laborers have yielded to the tempter, they will seek their restoration in the spirit of 1-st Paul's "Shepherd." We cannot not off his sheep because of their wanderings, because of their backslidings, because of their infirmities, because of their diseases, nay, not because of their hardness; but pursue them with his love, findeth them out, visiteth with his correcting hand according to their need, and with his sword, and methinks in his heart, that He hath made them tender and pliable once more. He pours in the fresh oil of his salvation and sweetly health them."

Those who are faithful overseers in our meetings have a just claim upon the sympathy of their fellow-members, and yet we would not at times they are subjected to uncharitable reflections and censure from some of the more lukewarm or thoughtless, who have little sense of the weighty nature of the service devolving upon them; and are therefore more easily drawn into unjustifiable criticism, and into an erroneous construction of their language and actions.

Would that all under our name, whether younger or older, were concerned to "walk in Truth, the service, enjoyment and possession of it" in their hearts, and so to walk as to bring no disgrace upon it, but to be a good say in the places where they live, and thus "walk sweetly, meekly, tenderly, peaceably and lovingly one with another."

A few months ago we gave notice of the issue of a new edition of Stephen Grellier's Journal in one volume of over nine hundred pages. Price, one dollar and a half bound in cloth, and two dollars bound in half morocco.

The Friends who have charge of the Book-store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, having stated that this price, moderate as it might be, had been objected to by some purchasers, the Book Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, at its meeting on the 11th inst., concluded to lower the price, and authorized their agent hereafter to sell the cloth bound copies at one dollar each, and these in half morocco at one dollar and a half, with the hope that this change would lead to a more extensive sale of this valuable work, and encourage some, who know its worth, to purchase copies to give to others, to whom its perusal would have a beneficial effect.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 18th inst. three legislative resolutions relating to Cuba were introduced by Senator Cameron, Miss and Call. The first acknowledged the independence of the island and directed the Secretary of the United States Government to exert Spain to bring the war to a close. It was referred to the President to take possession of the island with military and naval forces of the United States, and to hold possession until the Cuban people organized a government. The third recognized the independence of Cuba as a free and independent Government, and extended to it all rights in the present and within the jurisdiction of the United States. The resolutions were reported to the Congress on the 17th inst. and the last was laid on the table Tuesday.

Reports from Washington state that the House Committee on Ways and Means will introduce once a tariff bill, with the expiration of the tariff act of an extension of the tariff, after the expiration of the tariff act of Mexico. The report of the committee was heard by the House on the 17th inst.

A complete list of returns on the 24th inst. (1896) is as follows: Bryan, 404,000; Polk, 22,000; Levering, 6,000; McKinley, 100,000; Polk, 124,000.

The Public Ledger says editorially: "Nobly will support for a moment that the overwhelming vote—104 to 7—by which the House passed the bill forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquor in the Capitol between the members' antipathy to alcohol. The tastes and habits of the average Congressman are too well known to admit any such supposition."

At Fort Smith, Ark., a dispatch says that a marked inclination of the desperate in which the drinking habit is now held in this country."

A Pierre despatch says that it has been learned that owing to a blunder in the preparation of the ballots the vote by which the South Dakota Constitution was adopted is having to be counted on a second day, it is said. Among the amendments was one repealing the prohibitory article.

By the last census there were 73,045 men in the United States, of whom 40,741 were paper and 32,304 were women. This embraces only those who were inmates of almshouses.

At Fort Smith, Ark., despatch says that the Dawes Commission and delegates of the Choctaw Nation have reached an agreement looking to the division of their lands and the ultimate abandonment of the tribal system.

Evangelist Moody said in New York last week: "I know that you would say in favor of the Sunday newspaper, that it is the Monday paper that causes Sunday work, and so on. But there are 200,000 boys selling papers on Sunday. Would you like to take your boy one of them? For myself, I never read a Sunday paper; I wouldn't have one in my house. You may talk about Temperance, but I believe right down in my heart that the Sunday paper does me more harm than Tammy any ever did. Why, look at this one item. There were 23,000 divorcees last year in this country. The Sunday papers describe everything of that sort at great length. Tell me that doesn't put the idea in many a man's head to go and get a divorce? Let your wife see a man and a woman, dressed up on Sunday when he has plenty of time, and the devil tempts him to do the same thing. There were 3000 murders in this country in 1890; in 1895 there were 12,000. They are increasing all the time. I have fought this thing right along. We never had a Sunday paper till the war came, and we got along very well. I think you would find that if this sort of thing have been lowering their tone ever since. I believe if this Republic gives up the Sabbath we are going to have anarchy."

A special despatch from Morgantown, W. Va., says that the most expensive purchase of coal lands ever made in the world was consummated there on the 30th inst. The tract contains 40,000 acres of land, all in Preston County, lying between Oakland, Md., and Granton, W. Va. The price paid was $2.00 an acre. T. L. Merrill, the well-known civil engineer and geologist, who has completed a map of the tract, says it is unquestionably one of the richest coal fields in the world, the vein at least being 300 feet thick and of splendid quality for coking. The field will be tapped by two railroads. A line from the Baltimore and Ohio will go out from some point along the main line, and the Cheat River Railroad, which will be built next year from Point Marion, a few miles north of Morgantown, to the region where the syndicate is directed to purchase the land. It is the intention of the syndicate to erect a number of soaking plants at different points and make a coking region which will rival in size the big Connellsville region.

A Florida correspondent of the Savannah Morning News says: "Major W. E. Martin, of the Plant System, with headquarters at Tampa, is now negotiating with the agents of a Japanese colony for a tract of 10,000 acres of land upon which the colonists desire to establish a colony of 10,000."

A school of 300 of binish, snappers and sail water turtles have attracted large numbers of grand amateurs to the waters of Lake Umbagog.

It is known that the long new deposits of Arkansas are more extensive than has heretofore been believed. Instead of pebbles, it is alleged, they have been found, and veins varying in width from four inches to six feet. In places almost pure iron is found, suitable for making iron and steel.

It is reported that the great fire which destroyed the grand opera house in Fayette Street and in Eastern Washington has been almost destroyed by a city fire.

Belated reports from points in South Dakota say that six and probably eight persons perished as the result of the recent blizzard. Two thousand sheep were killed and 100,000 head of cattle.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 427, which is 25 more than the previous week and 57 more than the corresponding week of 1895. Of the whole number 221 were males and 206 females; 66 died of pneumonia; 49 of consumption; 30 of heart disease; 24 of diphtheria; 19 of apoplexy; 17 of cancer; 15 of convulsions; 14 of cramp; 12 of uremia; 12 of bronchitis; 12 of typhoid fever; 12 of infection of the brain; 11 of Bright's disease; 9 of mania; and 9 of old age.

FOREIGN.—The London correspondent of the New York Tribune writes: "The Chronicle emphasizes the fact that a new international conference on the silver question will be impracticable unless preceded by the adoption of a definite schedule of rates by the United States to the Powers. The meaning of this is that England, even with a group of bimetallics in the Government of the day, will not take any interest in proposals for a conference unless the question of the ratio, which is sought to establish between gold and silver, is clearly and definitely stated. This is a most important point of view for the legislators to bear in mind. English monometallics, in arguing the case with bimetallics, invariably ask: 'What ratio do you propose?' And when no answer is returned they dismiss the whole subject with a contemptuous gesture. If a ratio be named in proposals from Washington, a definite basis of action will be outlined, and the conference will probably be inaugurated."

The London representative of the New York Times observes: "We have it officially now, that Russia and France invited England to co-operate in a general partition of this empire, and that England declined on the ground that the division of China is opposed to British interests. Obviously, it is still more of first importance to have Russia and France, and not the Chinese coast without any international guarantees whatever. In sheer self-defence England ought immediately to reoccupy Port Hamilton. She stipulated the right to do this whenever the Chinese allowed any Russian advance on the north, and the British public has a right to be more exigent than of confidence to bear that it has been ordered."

The London correspondent of the New York Evening Post writes: "The report of Dr. Le Neve Foster, official mineralogist, brings England face to face with the fact of possible coal exhaustion. He says that the supply will not stand a yearly increase of three and a half per cent on the output, and that six years of the time probably will become apparent without a lifeline. Professor Jevons's estimate was that a century of the present rate of progress would exhaust English mines to a depth of 4,000 feet, which is 1,500 feet deeper than the deepest mine."

The Secretary of State for India has made this strong statement: "The Government of India cannot but acknowledge the great obligation under which it is laid by the benevolent efforts made by missionaries, who, self-denyingly and self-denyingly labor are introducing the Christian religion into the life of the great population of the Indian Empire."

By the collapse of a building in Xeres, in Andalusia, Spain, on the 11th inst., 110 persons were buried, 1,000 dead bodies and 46 seriously injured persons had been taken from the ruins at last accounts.

The Madrid newspapers are greatly excited over President Cleveland's references to Cuba and Spain. The Krupp syndicate is arranging to buy the Brazilian system of railways, and will pay 300,000,000 marks for it.

The bubonic plague, which has been prevalent in Bombay for some time past, is spreading rapidly. There were fifty-five new cases and thirty-nine deaths from the disease in one day. The mortality in the city for last week from all diseases was 1,000.

The annual "cattle crop" of New South Wales is about 400,000, with an annual consumption in Sydney of 110,000 head. The Queensland "cattle crop" is about 1,000,000 head, with an annual consumption of about 300,000 head.

An agent for the Cuban Junta at Jacksonville has received a letter from a friend in Cuba saying that General Maceo died by the treachery of the Spaniards, and his own staff surgeon, Dr. Zertucha, who betrayed him. It is said Maceo received a request from Marquis Alameda for a conference with a view to ending the war. Maceo, with his staff of thirty-four repaired to the appointed place, where they were surrounded by 600 Spanish soldiers, who shot every one except Dr. Zertucha. Minister DeLome desires that opinion of this report may be withheld until the Spanish side of the question shall be received.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1865.—Second Month 19th.—Deeply tried in meeting to-day, with words of a supplication, which were with me all the week. I feared they were not his words, and did not give up, but 'as on the point of doing so at last, when dear J. S. stood up with, "Come unto me all ye that labor," etc. I could seem to come to Him after that, and lay my burden on Him. "Lead me out of temptation, but deliver me from evil," my frequent prayer. Save me, Oh, Lord, save me for thy mercies' sake. Make me faithful in my daily walks, that I may have thy blessing. O, sit by, be pleased, thou Great Refiner!

26th.—Gave up to-day, and feel a degree of ease and quiet rest in Him, whom I really want to serve with my whole heart.

Third Month 5th.—One of my dear little ones has been called from earth. How I long to be directed what to say to make a profitable impression on the children's minds. Come with thy Holy Spirit, dear Lord, into my school-room. Little Sallie seemed so particularly conscientious and pious spirited.

12th.—Gave up to-day to what was before me. Lord, thou knowest the way that I take, preserve me in thy will only.

19th.—A quiet week, but much encouraged to persevere in calm trust.

26th.—Gave up again to-day in humble trust. "Search me, O, God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." "Friends are very kind to me, but O, Lord! I rest in thee. If I'm wrong, teach me in thy mercy. He has showed me this week of the "River of the water of life," and my poor soul has tasted it."

Fourth Mo. 2nd.—Quiet day, and strengthened in the Lord. He who regards the sparrows will look upon my confidants.

9th.—"Be not deceived, God is not mocked," was received to-day in meeting. Oh, I think it for me. O, make me more and more pure in every motive; mine eye single. I would turn thy reproofs; be pleased to pour out thy spirit upon me, make known thy Word unto me.

16th.—First day of Yearly Meeting. Very sorrowful from a sense of former iniquities, but encouraged to look to Him, who can save to the uttermost. O, Lord! make me like a little child, led by thy Holy Spirit, that I sin no more.

23rd.—My birth-day has passed, and was witnessed to by much searching of heart. The Lord has been good to me. This morning Ann Branson was at our meeting and spoke of Jonah. I felt it very much and gave up to what had been with me for weeks, but I had kept it, fearing it was my own cogitations instead of the pure leadings of my Saviour. I thank thee so much, my dear Lord. I cannot doubt so again, but be very simple and obedient. Help me to dwell with thee, my Beloved, with my mouth in the dust. I feel as though thou wast bringing me forth to the light.

Fifth Mo. 7th.—Dear Lord, I feel as though I had abundant cause to bless and praise and adore thy Holy name, for a little evidence this day that I am not following " cunningly devised fables," but the merciful leadings of thy good Spirit. O, help me to be obedient; lead me by thy power!

14th.—For some time it has seemed as if my Heavenly Father said, "Go to Woodbury Meeting." To-day, in sure obedience to what seemed right, I went, and was helped, though by his mercy, and to-night feel a song of praise and thankfulness. Please, dear Father, bless my kind brother and sister. Friends were very kind, but we returned directly home, after making a call.

21st.—Dear Father, Oh, I want more humiliation of soul, more watchfulness and prayer and fasting. Help thy poor child to bow down. Mary Lewis was at our meeting to-day—she belongs to the Hicksite meeting at Beverly—and spoke to us very well, in true Orthodox doctrine. We understand they almost persecute her at her own meeting. Her testimony was mostly to the young, very plain and stirring, and our Friends felt unity.

28th.—Ann Branson again at our meeting, and my Heavenly Father called me to say a little. "She afterwards used some of the same words, and my heart and faith have been again strengthened to trust in the Lord, and over all He says to me. Glory be unto thy Holy Name forever."

Sixth Month 4th.—Feel comforted to-day, by the living presence of my Lord, for it has seemed as though the Father looked upon my contrite heart. I mourn so over my inclination to vanity. I want to feel more humiliation, and my own unworthiness of the least favor. I have found it very hard to say, "Thy will be done," this week; though I have said it many times, still my fear comes back: He will help me. In Isaiah He said to me, "I am the Lord thy God, that divided the sea, whose waves roared." "The Lord of Hosts is his name, and I have put my words in thy mouth, and I have covered thee in the shadow of mine hand." Blessed Lord, I thank thee for this little evidence, and for all thy great mercies and favors the past week; a visit to Ann Branson, and from Abbie Wood to the school, and intercourse with other esteemed Friends. Give me, O, Father, a more and more earnest desire to glorify thy name.

6th.—Dear John Stokely recommended to dig and beg so as to get down to the seed of life, in meetings, and said, let our prayer be "Preserve me, O Lord, as the apple of thine eye, keep me in the hollow of thy hand, that I turn not to the right hand or to the left. Help me to work out by my soul's salvation, with fear and trembling, that all I say and all I do may be to thy glory and honor." I have spoken unadvisedly in school the past week so many times, and feel sorry. Preserve me, Oh, Lord, in mercy.

Seventh Month 2nd.—Vacation has commenced, and I am looking forward to going out of town, and my soul has so dreaded going to other meetings; but to-day my heart has been strengthened to believe the Lord will be with me, and that He really does call me. Thy favors are so very many to me, a poor worm of the dust. What shall I render unto thee, O, Lord.

Eighth Month 6th.—My heart is full of thanksgiving to the Lord for his mercy in being so near me, all my journey. I do not deserve it, for sometimes I have sinned; but thou, O Lord, hast forgiven and received me again to thy favor. Oh, help me the remainder of this vacation, dear Lord! Help me to fast and to pray.

On the twenty-second of Seventh Month, my dear Friend Miwera Carter departed this life, we humbly hope, to rest. I was thankful in being there just at that time. O, Father, bless my friends for all their kindness to me, a poor creature.

14th.—Last School-day was our Quarterly Meeting, and a very good one indeed, such a good, calm feeling, so much good counsel, and in the last meeting encouragement.

27th.—My visits for this meeting are over now, and the retrospect is not entirely pleasant, because I have not kept entirely under the cross, all the time. Oh, I have to mourn. Help me, O, my dear Lord, to bow down very low, each day under thy cross; keep me, that I slip not away, and grieve thy Holy Spirit. Oh, that I may "bear about in my body, the dying of the Lord Jesus," that I may feel his life also. I gave up to thy will in meeting this morning, and thou wast me Acts second chapter, twenty-eighth verse to comfort me with thy peace.

Dear William Green was at our meeting a week ago last Friday, and I feel so encouraged and thankful to my Lord for relieving me of doubts. I thank thee, O Father, that I can say by thy strength, "Here am I, do with me as best pleaseth thee."

Ninth Month 3rd.—I feel as if my whole will was not laid in the dust, as it should be, and I am trying to be entirely his.

Tenth Month 1st.—The Lord indeed takes me into the wilderness, but He speaks comfortingly unto me and feeds me with Heavenly food, when I try to walk faithfully before Him. He gives me the Valley of Achor, or secret trouble in Parkerville, Chester County.

indeed, but supports me, and assures me it is for my good, that I may be purified and love and serve Him, with a full soul. Oh, spare not anything evil within me, dear Lord, but in the end bless me and let me only praise Thee forever.

10th.—She thus writes to her young friend, L. H. B.:

"My Heavenly Father knows how much chastisement I need. He will have my heart and life. Pray for me, my dear friend, that I may dedicate it all to Him. I do indeed petition for thee, at times, that the Lord would bring thee to himself. Dear Laura, let us try each day to perfect holiness in his fear. Oh, He knows the path that is best for us to walk in. How sweet it is, to know our peace made, and kept daily with Him. Then He will hold our hand, and take us at last into that Heavenly City, where none can say, 'I am sick.'

"Glorious, honor, thanksgiving and praise be forever given unto Him, from our grateful hearts."

15th.—She writes in her diary: "A favored meeting this morning, wherein we were enjoined to 'Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world.' Help me so to repent, dear Lord, that I may indeed find thy grace and favor.

Bevern Braithwaite was at meeting this afternoon, and I feel as if I was to go back to the furnace and be all melted over again. What a mercy, O, Lord, that thou art willing to do anything with me. Behold the clay, form me as thou wilt, only make me holy.

Eleventh Month 12th.—Some cold and so indulged in temptation. It would have been better for me to suffer and then have felt the Divine life more abundant in me, and so have enjoyed more heavenly communion to-day.

Thou, dear Lord, hast helped me over mountains this week, and praise has filled my soul in the midst of affliction. I feel my heart fixed, trusting in God.

19th.—Still indulged too much. It seemed as though the waves of temptation raged around me. Oh, that my feet might be still more firmly planted in the bottom of Jordan. Do with me, dear Lord, what thou wilt, only make me faithful and steadfast, serving Thee.

Twelfth Month 3rd.—Helped to be more faithful and feel confidence in the Lord. My heart is more united and devoted to Him. Oh, I pray thee, dear Lord, give us a mild winter, on account of the poor, suffering "freedmen." Thou canst do it. Oh, hear my prayers for it in thy mercy to us all.

10th.—A week of considerable faithfulness in my daily walk and of many favors. O, Lord! Thou art good to me in spirit. When will thou turn my captivity outwardly. When shall I bring all the tithes and give thee the uttermost farthing, that thou mayst pour me out a blessing? Oh, continue thy mercy and help me to bear all the cross, until I am wholly thine indeed.

17th.—Almost overwhelmed with grief, but trusting in thee. Thou dost help me to be faithful, and I can to night give thanks at the remembrance of thy holiness, and that thou visitest poor man to make him partake thereof. Shall I not be willing to pass through any trial to be able in his hand to comfort others when similarly situated? Oh, dear Lord, thou knowest how much humiliation I need.

The glories of the world always lose their charms when Jesus is spiritually enjoyed.

Self-denials for Jesus Christ.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

The first lesson to be learned in the school of Jesus Christ is a lesson of self-denial. He placed it at the very gateway of his kingdom. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." The reason for this command is that "self" is naturally selfish and monopolizing, and Christ as King will not accept the mere corner of any one's heart. He demands the throne.

If self-denial is the first lesson to be learned, it is always the hardest grace to practice. It treads on our corns; worse than that, it often cuts us to the quick. The daily battle with every Christian is to subdue that artful, greedy house-devil, self; and the highest victory of our religion is to keep our Divine Master enthroned in our heart. "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?" Peter's noble answer to this test question ran on through a long life of toil and sacrifice, and ended up with a sublime martyrdom for his Master. The occasions in which you and I can make a sacrifice that deserves to be called heroic are very few; but in the little acts of our humble every-day lives we can put Christ above self, and we ought to do it, and to love to do it. The business man who is content with a smaller profit rather than even seem to be grasping or overreaching, practices a Bible self-denial. The Christian who suppresses a joke or a witticism because it might burlesque sacred things practices the same grace. When we speak out a bold but unpopular truth, we honor our Lord at the expense of cowardly self. It is easy to swim with the current; a dead fish can do that. Christ's injunction to his followers is to "come out, and be separate" from the world. That often requires us to cut loose and be accounted singular, and provoke a stare, or a sneer, or a scoff. Slavery to a false public sentiment and to worldly fashions is a subtle snare from which the Church is suffering most sadly. This world can never be converted by a compromise.

There are thousands of professing Christians who are unwilling to deny themselves the paltry gratification of a glass of wine on their tables or at a social entertainment. They cannot but know that this use of intoxicants is an evil example to others, and may cause a "weak brother to stumble." They know that they are aiding those drink-usages which underlie all the drunkenness and dramselling and misery which flow from the se usages. Because it is fashionable to partake of wine or other ensnaring drinks and to offer them to others, they do not hesitate to do both. They actually countenance and practice what is manufacturing drunkards! The Apostle laid out an infinitely nobler principle when he said: "It is good neither to drink wine nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth or is made weak." He enjoins self-denial for the sake of our fellow-men; and until those who profess to be followers of Jesus are willing to give up every indulgence that is a direct temptation to others, Christianity will be shorn of much of its power. When every pulpit trains its artillery against both deceiver and dramsop, when every Christian realizes that he is his "brother's keeper," when Sunday-schools teach total abstinence, and parents banish the temptation from their own doors, we shall see a revival of the temperance reform that will revolutionize society and save countless souls.

If we look facts squarely in the face we must acknowledge that the chief hindrance to the progress of Christianity is sheer selfishness; and the only real progress in saving our fellow-men lies in the road of self-denial. A witty minister once said to me: "I have no trouble in getting my people to do—everything they like to do." It is the duties which pinch the hardest that pay the best. The newspapers chronicle the donations of certain millionaires as "munificent;" in Christ's sight they are not as large as the hard-earned dollar which the poor needlewoman drops into the collection plate. Out of the stuns will come heroes and heroines who will find a seat alongside of Judson and John G. Patton and David Livingstone. All crucifixions of pride, and covetousness and love of ease, all immolations of self for Jesus' sake are a sacrifice that has the savor of a sweet smell. "Ye did it unto me" is the benediction with which Christ pays his servant on the great day of reckoning. He will be the richest who surrenders most for Him.

"Lovest thou me more than all these things?" is Christ's scale of measurement. Giving up in order to please Him counts as much as any taking up; in fact, the pinch on selfishness-order comes in the former way than the latter. Paul's keeping his body under for Christ's sake was as grand a service as his sermon on Mars Hill. One of the hardest things for our selfishness is to give up having our own way and to let God have his way. The essence of loyal obedience lies just there; and it is just there that selfish pride and willfulness must be met and conquered. We have got to say "no" to self before we can say "thy will, O Lord, be done." Whoever is perfectly willing to let Christ give every casting vote, has attained to the much-talked-about "higher life."

With Christ once enthroned in the heart, everything becomes tributary to Him. That is the searchlight to be turned on your heart; do you love Him more than your money? Then He will hold the key to your purse. Do you love Him more than your ease? Pray for the grace that pinches self! If it cuts down pride and cleans out covetousness all the better. This battle with self will go on to the last; and it is not to be mere "beating the air." Every victory makes you stronger. Whatever you and I may gladly lose for Christ's sake will be laid up for us as our eternal treasure in Heaven.—The Independent.

THE "QUIET DAY."—The "Quiet Day" suggested by the Evangelical Alliance was extensively observed, not only among pastors, but also in theological seminaries. The forenoon and afternoon were usually spent in prayer and conference by the pastors, and in the evening the officers of their respective churches met with them. Reports of the observance of the day may be summed up in such sentences as the following: "The day was one of profound thought, great solemnity, and much profit;" "Very profitable, spirit excellent, evening meeting with laity very strong;" "A holy day. None came but felt he had met God;" "I thank God you suggested the day;" "The unanimous testimony was that the service was one of deep spiritual blessing;" "The deepest spiritual interest was manifested, and no doubt other meetings will be the outcome;" "The services were of unparalleled interest. We could not but recognize manifestations of the special presence of the Holy Spirit." In a number of communities the "Quiet Day" led to active measures for the immediate organization of a local church alliance.—Christian Advocate.

Catherine Louisa McCheane.

The subject of this little memorial was the daughter of William C. and Caroline McCheane of Matlock, Derbyshire, and was born at King's Leath, near Birmingham on the evening of Second Month, 1876.

She was from a child, of a tender loving disposition, and early manifested a desire to do that she believed to be right.

When about ten years of age she had a severe illness, which appears to have been a time of Divine visitation to her, as she afterwards said, that she had then prayed for her Heavenly Father that she might recover, and she would try to live more closely to what she felt was right. From that time her character was more markedly religious, and the seriousness of her deportment, and the sweet peaceful expression of her countenance, showed that she was endeavoring to walk the steps of her dear Redeemer.

The following extracts from short memoranda made by her from time to time, will show something of the progress of the work of Divine grace in her heart.

1891—First Month, 25th.—“This morning woke with a sweet feeling of inward peace and comfort, with a heart full of gratitude to the giver of all good gifts, for the refreshing slumber I had had during the hours of night. My heart seemed to overflow with love to Him . . . and I felt, O! how good we ought to be who are favored with so many blessings from the outstretched hand of the good Shepherd, who has made all things for our happiness and comfort.”

28th.—“Oh, we ought never to grieve so long and tender a parent, who has loved us so very first, and is waiting for us to come to Him and taste of his goodness, who is such a merciful and gracious Father, the Omnipresent and Omnipotent. May I grow up in his holy care, and feel his presence very near and dear to me, day by day, on my journey through this assuring world, whose pleasures are transient, at the joys of the world to come are everlasting, and will never pass away.”

Ninth Month, 9th.—“I have been thinking that a poor frail creature I am, yet how graciously the Lord careth for me day by day during my journey through this life. I wish I was more grateful for his protecting care over me, than am so unworthy of his love and tender care.”

Ninth Month, 25th.—“It is sorrowful to behold how many are so full of their sensual pleasures and transient amusements that they forget to thank God for giving them a Light within to discern between right and wrong, and also slight the gentle loving voice which calls to them, and tells them in the secret of her own souls to cease to do evil, and learn to do well, and to turn from the foolish and live. It is a sweet and still small voice, and those who are lowly, meek and childlike hear this gentle voice calling to them, and they rejoice to hear it. Oh, that I may always be kept in a humble, lowly state of mind, that I may not turn aside to the vain things of this life, and say I am preserved from the allurements of the world, and all the evil things of it, and always listen to this voice in my heart.”

Alluding to the beauties of nature around her, she writes:—

“I have always been very much pleased to see the wonderful works of our Heavenly Father in other places, but never felt them as I have since I have been at Matlock. How beautiful is the scenery around us; how sublime! It seems like a glorious picture spread before our eyes to draw us to admire the handiwork of Him who made all so fair and lovely. Everything tends to draw forth feelings of gratitude and praise to Him, and to a realization of that verse in Scripture, ‘The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord.’”

In reference to the death of a near neighbor, she remarks:—

“Who knows how soon any of us might be called to put off mortality, as we shall all sooner or later have to do. O! I hope I shall be prepared when the great change does come.”

The sweetness of her mind seemed to increase during the last few months of her life, and her face was often lighted up with the love that filled her heart, from the Light of Christ in her soul.

For some days previous to her decease she had been ailing, but was not thought to be seriously indisposed, and in the morning of the day on which she died she spoke of getting up, but was advised to remain quiet.

While the family were assembled in their own house for the usual First-day morning meeting they heard sounds coming from her room, and on going to her were startled by her telling them that she was that day going to her Heavenly Father.

Medical advice was obtained as soon as possible, but acute pneumonia having set in, though all was done that could be for her recovery, it was unavailing.

The sweet state of mind in which, through Divine mercy, she was preserved when thus so suddenly summoned from this state of being, will be best seen from her own expressions. She said that when they first heard her she had been singing praises to her Heavenly Father, and desired her dearest ones all to come and take leave of her, and ardently and affectionately embraced each in turn, saying—“Farewell, dearly farewell, you must all come to me, all come to me; I go to my God through Jesus Christ. He has taken me to the beautiful land of everlasting bliss: I have been to the very gates of heaven.” “Don’t try to bring me back again—In my Father’s house are many mansions, and He has prepared one for me, where I shall dwell for ever, in that land of peace and joy.”

One of her sisters having gone out of the room to bring something for her, she asked to have her brought back, and again earnestly entreated all the family to come to her, saying—“Come to me in the realms of everlasting joy—Father, Father, take me, take me now to thy home of love—Thou art love.”

Speaking to her younger brothers, she said she had not, at times, lived so closely to her Guide as she might have done, and hoped, in that, they would not follow her example but keep close to their Saviour. Later on she entreated all to keep to meetings, and to “wait silently and in prayer” upon God, saying—“O, how I love my God, no tongue can tell how I love my God!” “O, my dear Saviour, how I love Thee!” with more to that effect.

She also remarked—“I have had a good meeting to-day.”

The melody of her voice while she was speaking was beautiful, and the heavenly covering of Divine Love was very precious and comforting. Over and over again she said—“He will take me to-day.” “Don’t hold me.”

Seeming to get a little better she feared she—
—This was not singing to any set music with which she was unacquainted, but the melodious overflowing of a heart filled with Divine love.

was coming back, but said—“If it is his will, it must be for the best,” repeating several times—“He will see it done.”

At one time a cloud seemed to me over her, and she was much distressed, saying—“O, what shall I do, I have lost my way, it is dark” and she prayed earnestly for help. Her mother encouraged her to trust in the Lord, who would never leave nor forsake her, and after awhile she broke forth in joyful tones—“O blessed be God, He hath shown me the Way, Christ is the Way, the Truth, and the Life! Oh, my God, Thou art very good! Jesus, dear Jesus, how I love Thee! Lo, I come to do thy holy will in heaven; then, let us sing praises to Thee for ever and ever, in everlasting peace and joy. Farewell, farewell all, in the love of the Lord, dearly farewell.”

A radiant smile illumined her face, and her heart seemed to overflow with love and earnest longing for the eternal welfare of the rest of the family, nothing of a temporal nature appearing to find a place in her thoughts.

She said it was better for her to go to her Heavenly Father now; that if she lived, she might be drawn aside into unfaithfulness.

She continued for about two hours thus remarkably enlarged, speaking mostly with a clear voice and with great emphasis. During the afternoon she frequently expressed a little, but could not say much at a time, and seemed quite resigned either to go or stay. At one time she said, she believed her Heavenly Father had been preparing her for this sickness for some time.

About six o’clock a decided change took place, and she passed quietly away at about twenty minutes before seven that evening, the first of Fourth Month, 1894, in the nineteenth year of her age.

Her remains were interred in the Friends’ burial ground, Bakewell, on Fourth-day the fourth of Fourth Month, 1894, in the presence of a considerable number of friends and others.

After her decease a letter was found in her pocket, written to a young friend, from which the following is extracted:—“Hast thou ever tried to be a disciple of Christ? I tried several times when I was much younger, and sometimes succeeded, and at other times was led away through unfaithfulness; I am going to try to be one of Christ’s disciples from now, and will try, with his help, not to displease Him in thought, word or deed. It says in the Bible that whatsoever we do, we should do it all to the glory of God. I want to ask thee if thou wilt try also with me for I think it is our duty to walk worthy of the profession to which we belong, for Jesus Christ’s sake, and if we try to please Him, He puts his love into our hearts, which stimulates us to walk in his fear, and mind his proofs.”

In publishing the foregoing particulars respecting our dear young friend, we desire that others, both older and younger, may be stimulated to follow on in the path of watchfulness and humility, that, like her, they may be prepared to enter the haven of rest, whenever the final summons may come.

“For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.”—Titus iii: 11, 12.

“Behold I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me.”—Rev. iii: 20.

KING FROST HAS COME.

The winter winds shut down the lid,
And Jack Frost turns the key,
And summer's treasures safe are hid
From storms that are to be;
A treasure chest,
Is old earth's breast,
Safe locked for you and me.

Then swift the wind's wild shuttles fly
To spin the blankets rare,
All's sit, and warm, and many ply,
Of snowflakes in the air.
A deep light,
And downy white,
She wraps round with care.

And so we spare a little while
Our treasures from our sight;
The verdure which makes summer's smile—
The flowers, the earth's delight—
And turn to see
What joys there be Around the hearthstone bright.

But just a scrap of summer's wealth,
A bit of summer bloom,
We'll win to brighten heart and health,
And cheer our winter room.
So, Heaven, which takes
Our dearest makes
Its own cheer mid earth's gloom.

IN THE FOREFRONT.

NUSAN COOLIDGE.

Once a small, childish dancing company,
We ran behind the ranks of older ones,
Half seen, half noticed, very proud to be Part of the gown procession with the drums;
Each making stride they never met us three,
Of our small status—that was small price to pay
For sharing in the glory of the day.

Where are the ranks that seemed to us so tall,
So full of fire and force and valor brave,
So full of sweet wisdom, knowing all
That man can know, or children doubly crave
To understand with their weak powers, and small?
It seems a little time since thus we ran,
Yet we, the children then, now lead the van.

The stately forms which towered like forest trees,
The limbs which never tired (as we supposed);
The wills which ruled our infant destinies
The strength beneath whose shadow we reposed, Authority, love, shelter—all of these,
Yielding like straw in temper to the brand
Of Time's fierce wind, have left us in the front.

'Tis we who are the stalwart leaders now (Or seem so to the little ones behind),
The tireless marchers whom the gods employ
With the keen vision, the all-judging mind,
The will which questions not of why or how,
But rules and dominates all lesser fates,
Regardless of their puny loves or hates!

How strange it seems to feel, who once were led!
To feel the pressure of the quick young race
Following and urging on behind our tread,
Rejoice and eager to usurp our place,
Crowding us forward—though no word be said!
'Tis but the natural law which stars obey,
Following in order due through night, through day.

O march which seemed so long and is so brief!
Whether by rough ways led or smooth greenward,
Under clear sun or lowering clouds of grief,
With minor, or with major, or with Lord!
Who art of mortal folk the full reward!
We will keep on content and fearlessly,
Nor seek for rest until we rest in thee.

THE MIRROR IS FISHING.—A mirror can be used to advantage in fishing. The mirror is fastened to the end of the line, below the hook. When a fish approaches it sees its counterpart in the mirror and imagines it to be an interloper; the duple cannot resist the impulse to at once swallow the tempting bait to prevent the other from getting it. Evening.

Intercollegiate Sports.

I was gratified to learn from a graduate of Westtown, that the Friend appointed to the recently-constituted position of Principal at that Institution, had expressed his non-concurrence with a proposal that during the period of the present brief vacation, some of the pupils might play a match game of football with the pupils of another school. Viewing the extravagances and excesses into which sports of this character run, it is greatly to be hoped that our young members may be willing to observe discretion in their pursuit, keeping them within the bounds which a reasonable Christian limitation would dictate. It is extremely easy to run into vanity and peril in this matter of amusements, relaxing exercises and entertainments, if we have no use whatever for the cross in their regulation, or, it may be their rejection.

When the writer of this note, quite a number of years ago, began to call attention to the grave peril, in various particulars, which indulgence in intercollegiate sports involved, or would involve (all of which has been verified), the illustrative instances to be pointed to were but a tithe of those which have since occurred. One of the latest warnings, happening last month, was the match game between Vanderbilt University and the University of Nashville. A mixed committee of the two Institutions has been investigating the causes of the trouble and summing up the damages. After speaking of the slugging and general fighting, the report concludes:

"The game closed a few moments later in an outrageous melee, discreditable to those students of each Institution who engaged in it, in which melee some players, some students, an official in the game, and spectators connected with neither Institution, engaged with fists and canes, some knives and pistols being drawn and displayed. Only the merciful providence of God prevented results worse than black eyes and sore heads."

Let us have continued regard to this "merciful providence" by keeping out of the intense partisan rivalry and unseemly newspaper publicity, with other evils, which follow in the train of intercollegiate sports.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

[We have received from an Armenian residing in the western part of Pennsylvania, the following translation of a letter sent to him by a fellow-countryman at Constantinople.

The letter which accompanied it states that the writer is a native of Van, a city of Armenia, about thirteen hundred miles east of Constantinople; that he had inherited considerable wealth from his father, and was a good business man, but had lost all his property through the Kurds and Turkish officers, and had been forced to go to Constantinople to procure a living. The letter may prove interesting to our readers as giving some insight into the conditions which surround Turkish Christians.—Ed.]

CONSTANTINOPLE, September 28, 1896.

DEAR FRIEND:—After having been in prison nine months and eleven days under indescribable torture, I obtained my liberty to-day at ten A. M., but do not know the reason for my release.

My idea in writing this, my first letter in my new and strange life, is that I should like to go to America if I get from thee a satisfactory answer, otherwise I intend to go somewhere else.

It is almost impossible for me to go to Van, where I have neither home nor family.

Having been ill while in prison, I still feel quite weak; I think of going to a hospital and hope I shall receive thy letter so as to be able to decide what to do by the time I have fully recovered.

In the first part of my letter I have used the word "indiscrutable," let me illustrate it by a few events.

When the police first took me in hand, I was a companion of seven other Armenian prisoners, in a small room which was hardly large enough for two. It was damp, filthy and foul, and we were severely whipped and compelled to listen to terrible oaths every day. We used to get as rations three loaves of bread, which was twelve or fifteen days old. However, one of us took sick and died, and three of our company were assassinated in a cruel manner under our eyes. We were hopeless of being released, and we had nothing to do but take care of each other's wounds.

Our first duty was to pray and worship God asking for Divine help, not for us, but for our brethren and children, and for all those who are under torture; being guilty of nothing—but suffering only for their national and religious name.

Our mothers taught us nothing more suitable for those days than this, "In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried unto my God. He heard my voice out of his temple, and my cry came before Him, even into his ears." So that when we were left by ourselves we could not find comfort in anything except in prayer.

Three of my companions were taken from my room, but I do not know anything about them, and am very anxious to hear what became of them.

This morning, about ten o'clock, they took me from my room and told me that I was free and ought to pray for the Sultan and to be obedient to the laws of the Government; but I do not know when I was not obedient, neither do I know how they had the right to murder all my family—among them my only son, who was only two years and eight months old.

It is not possible to explain fully my present circumstances, which are quite intolerable, but I presume the remedy of it is to get away from this wretched country. But it seems to me that it would not be wise to run away to America without knowing something about it. The error of doing that would cost me more than that of going to Russia or to some other neighboring country. Therefore I will be obliged if thou wilt do me the favor of answering this at the earliest opportunity.

Hoping this finds thee well, I remain,
Respectfully thy friend.

A GOOD story is told by the Daily News in connection with the late Sir Benjamin War Richardson's advocacy of Temperance. He had been on a visit to one of the three or four small towns in England which have no public house. Although there were four thousand people there, the doctor was nearly starving. One day a young medical man came to Sir Benjamin for advice as to taking the practice, an Sir Benjamin, placing his hands on the young doctor's shoulders, said: "Take my advice, a don't. Those wretched teetotallers not only sbr accidents, but, when wounded, heal so fast that there is neither pleasure nor profit after the first dressing." This story is quoted for the benefit of our temperance friends.

The Christiansburg Institute.

The readers of THE FRIEND, especially those of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, will remember at the time of the last Yearly Meeting, the Friends' Freedmen Association decided to place a Christiansburg Institute under the charge of Booker T. Washington, and guaranteed to him two thousand dollars in one year with which to conduct its affairs.

It will interest Friends to know that this undertaking was immediately entered upon by B. T. Washington, who placed Charles L. Marshall, one of his most trusted pupils and instructors, in charge of the Institute.

C. L. Marshall went up to the ground early in Seventh Month, and expressed himself as delighted with the situation and with the prospects of the Institution, which in his opinion overshadows great possibilities. He has proved himself an earnest, modest, intelligent and sympathetic worker. He has gained the confidence of the Executive Committee, and of Captain Charles S. Schaeffer, who has kindly agreed to audit each month the receipts and expenses of the Institution.

Partly through the kindness of certain mercantile firms of Philadelphia, a black-smith shop and also a wheel-wright shop are being opened, which beside being instructive to our pupils may be self-supporting.

Through the exertions of the women of the Executive Committee, a capital sewing machine and form for dress making, and the necessary principle instructions in that art have been supplied to the female scholars of the school.

Thirty or more pupils come to the school from a distance, and have been accustomed to find lodging in the neighboring town. That such pupils may be more under the direct oversight of the officers of the Institution is thought desirable by C. L. Marshall.

In this connection he writes as follows:

"Nothing offers better advantages for the moral and religious development of our young men and women than the establishment of a Boarding Department. Such a department has the power of throwing a strong arm of protection around boys and girls as will keep them in touch with pure religion, principles of right living and at the same time prevent their yielding to temptations which mean forever their ruin. A building that will shelter forty persons, with a dining-room, kitchen and laundry, is one of our greatest needs."

The school has twice been visited lately by a member of the Executive Committee. Letters from the Superintendent to this committee are as frequent as two a week, and are filled with expressions of earnest thought for the success of his undertaking.

Among his solicitudes thus expressed, is a desire that farming shall be thoroughly taught. We quote from a recent letter: "In my opinion there is no industry which could occupy so much of our time and attention as that of Scientific Agriculture."

Some little beginnings in this direction have been made by the control of from between an acre and a half and two acres of ground, and a donation of some agricultural tools from one of our Friends. Your committee think the possibilities and advantages in this direction should be borne steadily in mind as a practical suggestion, much benefiting the colored people of Virginia, and throughout the South.

The number of students enrolled at the end of last month was one hundred and thirty-two, which number is expected to largely increase during the winter months.

The Institution is looking to the Freedmen Association for most of its support—all except the small sum which comes directly from the State Aid.

The officers of Christiansburg are animated by trust in this Association, and confiding in it, with confidence doing their duty to their trust, as is thus expressed in C. L. Marshall's last letter:

"The officers, teachers and students are day by day made to feel more and more the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man through the generosity of the Friends' Freedmen Association, of Philadelphia.

Believing the Friends will individually and generally support the work of the Association by contributing to the pecuniary necessities of the school, the Executive Committee have circulated a postal card, asking that donations be sent to David G. Alsop, Treasurer, No. 409 Chestnut Street.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Is there Not a Cause?

What is it that hinders any from coming forward and showing more fully to the world on whose side they are. Is it because the time is taken up so much with the things of this world, that there is no room left or no time to listen to that still small voice in the secret of the heart, saying, "This is the way walk thou in it;" and if taken heed to, will reprove, rebuke and chasten and lead into the right path. "The ways of Zion do mourn because none come to the solemn feasts." I am reminded of what the blessed Saviour said on one occasion to those that were with Him, "Will ye also go away?" This seems to me very pathetic language, and the query arises, How is it with some of us to-day? Will there be a going away from Him, from his entreaties and visitations? from Him who waits long to be gracious; how is it clear ones who know something of these things and are not willing to surrender? Will ye also go away and let others come in and take your places.

Oh, be willing to be entreated, and close in with the day of your visitation, and let not the things and pleasures of this world be your snare. There are those of you that have bright talents which, if you were willing to give up unto your Lord and Master, He would make use of you according to his will, for "He that doeth the will shall know of the doctrine."

The command formerly was, "Put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do with thee," and it remains the same to-day, for the Truth changeth not. Then that there may be more of a willingness to enlist under the Lord's banner in the day of his power, and let not the many things that are going up and down, the different organizations and societies, and the influence of surrounding things which are calculated to lead away and weaken the good or quiet way, and thereby lose ground; the enemy of all good is ever on the alert, and if there is not care extended, there will be a going with the current, and not allowing ourselves to come under his preparing hand to be moulded and fashioned as He would, and thus become his useful instruments.

So let there be a care how we are spending our time, talents and means, for which we must give an account in the day of reckoning, and if any are found wanting in the balance of the sanctuary sad will it be. Therefore now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation, and when the blessed Saviour knocks at the door of thy heart my brother or my sister, do not refuse an entrance to Him who will richly reward for faithfulness. Those that are willing to be obedient to the little openings secretly shown to them what to do and what to leave undone, these are they that will grow from one stature to another, and finally become pillars in the Church to go no more out. "It is first the blade, and then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear." Religion is growth, but all things are not to be learned at once, but as we each come to experience the new birth we will be babes in Christ desiring the sincere milk of the Word. Jesus said, "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." So that as there is a willingness to be led and guided by Him who knows what is best for us, and He sees our sincerity, He will watch over and care for us, although there may be baptisms at times to bear for our purification, yet as we keep a single eye steadily fixed on Him, He will not utterly forsake his trusting little ones, but will watch over them with an eye of pity, even "As a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Remarkable Instance of Divine Preservation.

At our late Yearly Meeting of Ohio, as the time was drawing to separate, in order to return to our respective homes, a very solemn silence spread over the meeting, which was broken by a petition, vocally offered up to our Father in Heaven, that He might be pleased to watch over us, and preserve us in our homeward journey, and if it was consistent with his will we might be permitted to arrive safely home.

The meeting closed about twelve o'clock noon, on the first of Tenth Mo., and near four o'clock that afternoon a company of seven of us took the train for our homes in Iowa, a distance of about seven hundred miles.

Our train made a stop at Cambridge, Ohio, and after pulling out of that station, just before it had attained its full speed, we heard a report that sounded like that of the firing of a musket, and the ball entered the window at our right hand, scattering pieces of glass neatly across the car, and passed out at the window at our left hand.

One of our company, just a few minutes before, had picked up a paper, and was leaning forward reading by the light of a lantern that was sitting on the floor of the car, and another one had just laid down on the seat when the report was heard. Had they both been sitting upright as they were a few minutes before, their heads would have been directly in range with the two holes in the windows made by the ball from the musket.

I have been induced to write this account for insertion in THE FRIEND, from a desire I have felt of late to call our attention to the circumstances connected with the incident, and more particularly those of us who were exposed to such imminent danger, and to the wonderful interposition of Divine Providence in his protecting care over us.

A LOST ART.—If the art of being quiet is lost in the craze and rush and mad ambitious of the world, it is time it was sought and found again. To the Thessalonians, the Apostle, after telling them that they were taught of God to love one another, said, "We beseech you, brethren, ren, that ye increase more and more; and that ye study to be quiet, and to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, as we commanded you; that ye may walk honestly toward them that are without, and that ye may have lack of nothing." (1 Thess. iv: 10-12.) This seems to reveal the secret of quiet lives. Again in his first epistle to Timothy, ii: 1, 2, the Apostle says, "I exhort, therefore, that first of all, supplications, prayers, intercessions and giving thanks be made for all men; for kings, and for all that are in authority; that we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty." Again the Apostle Peter says that Christian women should be adorned, not with braiding of the hair or wearing of gold, or putting on of apparel, "but let it be in the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." (1 Peter iii: 3, 4.)

If God gives us a meek and a quiet spirit, and if we then work with our hands, pray for all men, and let alone ornament, folly and vain show, which tax our strength and serve merely to gratify the lust of the eye, we shall soon rediscover this lost art, the art of being quiet. And when we cease to do useless work, or indulge in useless fretting, and live devout, prayerful lives, we shall find quietness within our own hearts and peace within all our borders; for when the Lord "giveth quietness, who then can make trouble?" (Job xxiv: 29.)

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Reminiscence.

In the editorial of the Philadelphia FRIEND of Eleventh Month 28th, 1896, honorable mention is made of that worthy minister, Elwood Dean, reminding the writer very forcibly of some circumstances in his religious labors in which it was my privilege to participate. I may first say it was my privilege to know him and his valuable wife as pleasant visitors in my father's family ere he began to preach, and further, it was my privilege in common with my elder sister to go to their house and take turns in waiting on him in a severe fit of sickness, in the course of which he was brought to feel that if he was favored to regain a normal condition of health, he must devote at least a portion of his time to preaching the Gospel, and there is reason to believe that from this conviction he did not turn he dies away, far on being able to get out to meeting he began as a child learning to talk, to speak a few short sentences. I think the first considerable sermon that he preached was at my father's funeral. From shortly after that event he and I were widely separated, my settled home being in the State of Iowa, but still our intercourse was considerable, he several times visiting that land on Gospel errands, and perhaps never without being at my house. On one occasion I remember several transient friends being with us, our family reading being in the morning. He felt constrained to address us and presided in these words, "There is that at work in your midst that will eat out and destroy"—he said his feelings so we remain him that he covered his face with a napkin and went bitterly, then proceeded—"every vestige of Godliness! It is not checked! and guarded against!" Our transient company dispersed to their respective homes, and the rest of the day was pleasantly spent with he and his wife in making social calls on some of our neighbors.

At another time he and T. B. were making the canvass of the Society of Friends in this State, and he had given Friends to understand that he felt the time might be near at hand, when they might return home; but very early in the morning he informed their host and hostess that he felt constrained to make a visit if possible to some isolated Friends in a sparsely settled district, the farthest perhaps eighty miles distant, but by making a drive that day of from sixty to sixty-five miles, would land us at T. E.'s, his brother-in-law, also in a new begun place. Their host and hostess were old feeble Friends, unable to assist them. Their son across the road was called on. His zeal and will was sufficient, but circumstances forbid. He came over to my place just at the break of day, Christmas morn, and acquainted us with the unexpected turn and queried if I could not go and take the Friends. I had no reason to urge why it might not be so, only my team was not shod—in our neighborhood they did not need shoes, as they were not much drove. I rather consented than desired to go, and set off as soon as possible. Called at their lodging and took them in.

Ere the middle of the day we struck territory that was covered with snow and ice, and the road was in many places so smooth it was difficult for the poor animals to keep from falling. But there was no relief for us. No blacksmith's shops were likely to be met with; as a consequence night overtook us several miles short of our destination; but it was not stormy, but very cold. I saw my team was almost outdone, and I was seldom ever more exhausted with a day's work. At a late hour we reached the house of our friend Thomas Emmons, and who was greatly surprised at meeting us, and perhaps pilgrims were seldom more rejoiced to reach their destination than the preacher and his attendant, temporary though it was, for there lay before the preacher's mind another drive of fifteen or twenty miles to be performed in the near future. The following morning, considering the condition of my team, for some unknown cause, I felt restrained from continuing with them, quite to their discomfort. They said that they had no thought but that I would remain with them, and carry them back to Linn County. But I felt bound to leave them and return home, but deferred till afternoon to give my team more rest. Then we bade adieu with entire friendly feelings. I drove a few miles out of my way to a village, where my team could be shod, and I entertained by my relatives. The next day I reached home early in the evening, having driven something over fifty miles, still wondering to myself why it was so. But shortly after taking a wheel from the carriage to lubricate the spindle, found it so broken that it was a wonder that it had carried me safely home.

Then I could see that the hand of the Lord had been in it and we knew it not, for it seemed clear to my mind that if I had gone on in that sparsely settled district, with those dear Friends, they both being heavy, we should surely have been capsized or let down in a way to cause us great inconvenience, if not real suffering, for the weather was piercing cold.

In concluding this reminiscence, it is in keeping with the feelings of the writer to notice the fact that both Elwood Dean and Thos. Bunby, their wives, as also their host and hostess, from whence they started out that eventful Christmas morning—ventured because the call to Elwood was sudden and unexpected, and obedience on the part of each could not be considered other than a great sacrifice, both of time and personal comfort—as also the host and hostess that took us in at a late hour that cold Christmas eve, together with the life partner of the writer, who so willingly encouraged and assisted him in making that hurried and unexpected start on that eventful Christmas morn, and welcomed my return, are all passed on to the spirit world, leaving the writer only to relate the events of that eventful Christmas day, and to realize that by the passing of a few more Christmas anniversaries he too must be numbered among the silent dead.

A Tired Housekeeper's Lesson.

Several years ago I received a lesson from the dear departed editor of The Advocate and Guardian, H. E. Brown, that it may not be amiss to repeat.

I was a young mother then, and had three children, all babies together. My training as a housekeeper had not been good, as I had lost my mother in childhood, and my life up to the time of my marriage had passed at boarding-schools. A girl thus reared finds many trials in the cares, all new, of her household, children and servants.

The day that I speak of particularly had been a very trying one. Unexpected guests from out of town had arrived to luncheon, and every one knows what that may mean to a young woman who feels, perhaps too keenly, her own incompetence. The cook had not been at her best. The children had seemed (as they often do when we wish them to appear well) never quite as distracting, and I confess to the humiliation of losing my self-control.

The company had gone, and I was just beginning to congratulate myself that I could be as cross as I felt, when the doorbell rang, and I impatiently exclaimed, "A caller!" I stood waiting near the door, flushed and irritable, when my dear old friend entered. My greeting was not what it should have been, and she soon saw that something was amiss. Finally I burst into tears and said, "Oh, Mrs. Brown, I am so miserable! All goes wrong; every little thing conspires to annoy me, and, worse than all, I am not fit to be a mother. How can I govern my children when I am unable to govern myself?"

"My dear child," she answered, in a calm and peaceful tone that soothed my ruffled spirit, "I want to ask you one question: Are you abiding in Christ? That means living in Him resting upon Him all the time; not once in a while, but always, abiding continually in Christ. You will then be free from all little worries. He will lift you up to himself, where no storm can reach you. Abide in Christ."

I cannot tell you how sweetly and comfortingly she said these words: "Abiding mean continual, permanent, lasting. It is but your constant desire to abide in Him, and the whole habit of your life now so fretted will be changed into peace and joy."

Her coming seemed like an angel's visit, and the help that she gave me by this lesson at the moment that it was so needed has never been forgotten.

It is a mistake to imagine that forms of government in themselves are a nation's salvation. The real progress of a great country depends not so much upon the outward form of government as upon the inner conscience of its population, and the Christian integrity and wisdom of its legislators.—The London Friend.

A Tainted Drama and Press.

A mother recently bought theatre tickets for her two young daughters and two of their friends in order that they might hear a certain mous actress. Later she said: "I was shocked when I found out the character of the play. I did not suppose that Miss N. would appear in anything but a moral play; but this was so bad that the girls simply could not stand it. They did they could feel themselves blushing all over, and they came out at the end of the second act."

But what business had a Christian mother, knowing, as all of us know, the temptations of actors to present any play which contains "situations"—what business had she to buy tickets for an entertainment without understanding exactly what it was?

Another mother took her boy of fifteen to see a widely advertised French play. She did that the scenes and costumes were "so gorgeous." This was true. The play in question as a dream of color and of art, but its voluptuous beauty could not cover its sensuality. A lady who had chanced to hear it (to her great regret) said that she shuddered when she heard "the boy's visit."

"It could not fail to leave foul marks upon the soul of every one who listened to it," she continued. "Oh, if I only had an angel's wings and power, so that I could rub those marks from the heart of that pure child!"

It is possible that there is any mother who believes that any art impressions, any intellectual culture, which her boy might derive from a play or a book can atone for the loss of moral integrity suffered if, underneath the charming exterior, there is a vile and immoral story?

The indictments to be brought against some of our large daily journals are similar: though they take none of the pains to beautify and conceal their worst features, which the French take with their plays and books. These papers stand constantly on the very verge of obscenity, and taint every day, in blunt English, tales of shame and crime, elaborated to nauseous detail; tales which, from every possible motive, should be told, or mentioned only in the coldest and most distant manner. The sole effect of these sensational narratives is to corrupt society. Creators whom decent people never wish to know to see, are pictured, with their homes, their relatives, their very cats and dogs, in these widely read pages. Their silly or wicked deeds are edited at length under enormous "scare type" heads. Unspeakable men and women, most of whom fit only for our prisons and reformatories, are thus often made the topics of town talk, relating with their own importance, their piquant ambition of all their ilk to figure like themselves among the notorieties of the day.

No reputable merchant should advertise his wares in these ill-odored sheets. They should ever be allowed in any home. If they only exalted the silly, gave only twaddle for sense, not only made the insignificant appear important, they would still be odious but comparatively harmless. The literary sense would suffer, it is true. The brain of every reader would be a little weaker after seeing each issue—that could be all. But this is the least offense of a four or five "great journals" in the variousities of America who are the chief sinners; they are, as now conducted, powerful engines, deliberately planned to inflame the lowest curiosity and the basest passions of men, in order that the owners themselves may become rich.

regard only for our own welfare and that of our families would be a sufficient motive for us to keep these papers out of our homes and to deny them any sort of patronage; but there is a still higher one. No government of the people by the people can long survive, with such journals. Patriotism demands that every decent citizen of the Republic should denounce them, and should contribute to their starvation by every means in his power.—Kid Upon Clark, in The Independent.

FROM A LETTER OF MARY PISLEY.—"There is an evil that thou art guilty of which is visible to more than me, and that is thy slighting and neglecting week day meetings. If thou had appointed a day to meet any of those thy old noblemen of the earth, and thou slighted and neglected the appointment for weeks, you months together, would it not be a great affront and indignity to them? yea, and I am persuaded thou would not do it, for fear of offending them; and is the King of kings and Lord of heaven and earth, less noble, less discerning, when He is slighted and neglected?"

THE FRIEND.

TWELFTH MONTH 26, 1896.

In the British Friend of Twelfth Month, John William Graham, who recently spent some weeks in this country, has an article on "The Orthodox Body in Philadelphia." While giving them credit for "dignity in worship," and religious experience, he labors to discourage that adherence to the ancient usage of the Society as to plainness of attire, which is in measure maintained among its members. He intimates that it is liable to the same danger and formality and unspiritual externalism as attends the use of the sacraments; and compares it to the monastic habit and the salvation bonnet; and he thinks that wearing a uniform has the fatal effect of separating us from the world of men, among whom we ought to find fellowship, and from whom we ought to gather converts.

The article in question confirms our previous impression that its author is either not acquainted with the principles of true Quakerism, or that they are not congenial to his tastes and feelings. It is a sad circumstance that one who professes to be a member among Friends should ridicule a testimony that was borne by its earliest members, which the Spirit of Christ has required of thousands of their faithful successors from that day to this, and which experience has shown to have been as a useful hedge about them. We have never known of a Friend who placed his religion in the putting on of a plain garb, any more than in obeying any other of the things required by his Lord and Master. "It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful," and he who in the pride of his intellect rejects the simplest and most humbling requisitions, has little prospect of being favored with greater openings.

It is worthy of remark that the general tenor of the communications of our ministers is not to enforce plainness, although that is not altogether neglected, but to urge the necessity of that humble submission to the will of our Heavenly Father, without which there is no growth in grace or advancement in the highway of holiness.

The idea advanced by J. W. Graham, that wearing a uniform "has the fatal effect of separating us from the world of men," certainly does not apply to those of our members who dress in the style of Friends. It may prevent the young and inexperienced from mingling in assemblies which are calculated to weaken their religious sensibilities; but plain Friends do mingle largely with others in business and social intercourse, and their consistent support of our testimonies and principles gives them a place in the esteem and confidence of their acquaintances which leads these to look with favor on their principles.

We sincerely desire that this article of J. W. Graham may not have the effect of influencing any of our young members, in whom the Spirit of the Lord is at work, to reject the pleadings of His Spirit, and this delay or prevent that full liberty from the thralldom of sin and Satan.

The attitude of J. W. Graham in the latter part of his article towards the separation of 1827, manifests either a sad want of appreciation of the condition of things at that eventful period, or a spirit of indifference as to the maintenance of some doctrine. The preaching in our meeting of sentiments at variance with the Scripture testimony, and that ever held by Friends, to the divinity and atonement of Jesus of Nazareth necessarily made it the duty of others to contend earnestly for the faith necessarily delivered to the saints. In this conflict there is reason to believe that the weakness of human nature was at times shown by a zeal not regulated by sound discretion. Yet this is not a justification of the charge made by J. W. G. that the attitude of the Yearly Meeting towards their former brethren was "a constant error." The initial steps of the separation were taken by the leaders of that party; and when this division had been consummated its adherents were no longer members of the same organization as those who remained, and therefore, according to the regulations of the Discipline previously in force, were not entitled to the privileges of membership.

It is a comfort to believe that the feelings engendered by the contests of a former generation have largely passed away; and that especially within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting there are many who can heartily sympathize with those who are members of the body that separated in 1827, and who feel a religious concern to maintain orthodox doctrine among their people. These dear Friends we can own as brethren beloved, and sincerely desire that a blessing may rest on their efforts to oppose the spread of Unitarian opinions among their fellow members.

The attempts made to depreciate the importance and rectitude of the struggle for the Truth maintained seventy years ago, remind us of a statement made many years ago by a distinguished Friend, to the point, "I see very little difference between being un- and ourselves and having no testimony against un-soundness in others."

In rebutting the insinuations against the Friends who adhered to the original principles of the Society, which J. W. G. has introduced into his article, it may be well to refer to the course taken by those valued and experienced ministers of the Gospel, Thomas Sulist and Ann Jones and Elizabeth Roberts, in 1842, and who were very useful in strengthening the hands of our Friends, and encouraging them to resist the invasion of principles which would lay waste a belief in the divinity and atonement of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. The Journal of Thomas Sulist bears full and repeated testimony to the character of the issues then at stake, and to the duty of contending for the fifth ones delivered to the saints. He was well qualified to judge in such matters, both from his extended religious experience and from his personal observation, having been present at both New York and Ohio Yearly Meetings when the separations occurred there, and also having at different times listened to the unsound communications of some of their ministers.

It seems to us that the article of J. W. Graham too much ignores the sense of Divine re-quiring which lays at the foundation of practical religion.

A letter recently received from a concerned Friend in a Yearly Meeting where the fast element has met with considerable encouragement, speaks of the "so called sanctified band," as causing some uneasiness. They favor congregational singing. At some of their holiness meetings some profess to fall into a trance, and remain in that condition for hours, and then give in their experience, professing to have visited both places or states in the future world.

The writer of the letter says, "If the young people within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting only knew what I have seen in this fast movement, they would shun the very appearance of such an evil, which would destroy name and remnant of our once highly favored Society. The doors now stand open in many places for all these innovations to enter. By little and little they come upon us."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The census of the vote of New York State gives Levering 16,007. The total vote cast in all the States was 33,924,653. This is a gain of 1,321 more than in 1892. The vote for Knickerbocker is 109,145; for Bryan 67,858; for McKinley 60,759. The vote for Bryan and Sewall and that for Bryan and Watson are combined in the total vote given for Bryan. Only twelve States reported a separate vote for Watson and Bryan. His aggregate vote was 46,757. The Sound Money Democrats for Palmer and Tricker were 122,036. The Prohibition vote for Levering was 123,374. The National or Free Silver Prohibitionists cast 33,229 votes for Bentley. Matthews, the candidate of the Socialist Party, received 33,242.

An important objection upon Senator Allen's resolutions to take up the Dingley Bill for debate was started in the United States Senate on the 10th inst. by Senator Vest, and was participated in by Senators Allen, Chandler, G. Hoar, Free, Hale, Alford, Sherman, and a number of others. The result of the debate was a complete success on both sides of the Chamber in the fact that the Dingley bill could not possibly be passed at the present session, and that the enactment of a new tariff law will have to cover over a new session of Congress, to be as favored as early as possible.

The Senate in its action on Foreign Relations by a practically unanimous vote ordered a favorable report to be made to the Senate on the 23rd, on the Cameron resolution authorizing the independent use of the Republic's money, and providing that the United States shall not officially deal with the Government of Spain until she has recognized the Republic as Spain and Cuba. This resolution was approved on a yeas and nays of 95 to 3. A vote of 101 yeas and 23 nays was also recorded on a yeas and nays of 68 to 31, on the resolution authorizing the President to employ the agents of the system who shall be able to read and write their own names, their language, but be provided made against the separation of families. This

The metal gallium is much more precious than gold. It is quoted in the market at $5000 an ounce avoirdupois. Traces of it occur in some zinc ores, some of which must be worked over in order to obtain a trifling quantity. Gallium is a very remarkable substance. At the ordinary summer temperature of 86 degrees Fahr. it becomes liquid like mercury.

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1866.—First Month 7th.—One week of the new year is past. Have I been devoted? I am trying to "bind the sacrifice with cords unto the horns of thy altar" this night. Give me what thou wilt, take what thou wilt away."

28th.—The Lord is so good to me, leading me and giving me peace. Praise be unto thy holy name; help me to bear my cross, dear Lord, more faithfully.

Second Month 4th.—Oh, my God! my God! how precious unto me are the flowings of thy life and love in my soul this night. Thanks be unto thee through my Saviour. Oh, my Lord, that shall I say of thy mercy to me ward. Thou givest strength and might to thy children.

From a letter to L. H. B., Second Month 7th, 1866, the following extracts are taken:

"Thy poor friend feels herself so much as day in the hands of the Great Potter, ready to be used in any way, that I seem sometimes to rave no will at all; if He sends loving Friends to me I am thankful, but if He takes them away, He always leaves himself and helps me to put my whole trust and confidence in Him that all things will work together for the ever-acting good of his children. I did not know, my dear, but He saw that I had done thee all the good such a poor, weak vessel could, and had closed up our outward communion. But thou hast indeed been remembered before my Lord many a time, and my heart's desire now is for thy sanctification. We need so much purifying, so much humbling, that human nature often shrinks from the suffering; but 'as thy day, so shall thy strength be,' my precious one, and faithful is He that calleth you, who also will do it." My eye fell upon a promise so comforting the other night, this, I think: "The Lord is faithful, who will establish you and keep you from falling." What else shall I say unto thee, but to hold fast unto the end, it is that crowns all. It is indeed true that we can come unto Him and cast our burdens upon Him, and He lighten us."

Third Month 11th.—Very much indeed to be thankful for. My Heavenly Father has answered some of my prayers, unworthy as I am, even to draw nigh and ask. I asked for a mild winter, so the freedmen need not suffer so much, and thou hast given it to us two degrees warmer than for fifty years. Praises, high praises, be unto thy holy name.

Fourth Month 8th.—Oh, Lord, thou hast been so good to me, so many mercies, so many blessings, so much answer to prayer. Oh, I humbly pray thee to help me to serve thee more earnestly.

Fourth Month 19th.—My birthday, and the last day of the Yearly Meeting. We have had such a good, Heavenly time. There were no strangers on our side. Probably half of my life at least is now passed, and I can humbly say, "Hitherto the Lord has helped me" so much. I was brought low and He helped me. Oh, that I may walk more continually with my Lord in spirit, and dedicate myself to Him.

25th.—In a note to her friend, L. H. B., speaking of a change of residence, she adds, "Well, my dear, how are all the heavenly flowers in thy heart? Are they cultivated day by day, and do the white lilies of innocence send forth odors and incense, night after night, as thou seekst communion with thy Holy One? Or do the wintry storms sometimes so frown around thee, that thou canst find no sweet odor for thy Lord. Solomon's Songs, fourth chapter, sixteenth verse, often comes to my mind, and I am sometimes willing to submit to any wintry wind, if so be the summer comes after with its singing of birds, even thankful praises to my God. Let us, dearest, try to live the life of the ransomed, and so have part in that beautiful riddle, Isaiah, thirty-fifth chapter, tenth verse. Farewell in the same endearing love as ever."

"D. B."

Fifth Month 20th.—Moving into Twelfth St., and visiting has so engrossed my time and strength, that my notes here have been neglected, and now I have but a poor account to give of myself, having left the daily cross and weight of spirit too much. Oh, how great is thy mercy and goodness, dear Lord, to help me to come back and work in my own vineyard this day. Thou knowest my cross and sufferings, O Lord, may I not hope for a little crown at last, through thy unmerited mercy and loving kindness. We were assured to-day that the "sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared to the glory that shall be revealed."

Sixth Month 3rd.—Silent meeting all day, wherein I was led to covenant to be more faithful, watchful and dedicated during the coming week. How delightful it would be to feel no condemnation in the end. "I, even I, am He that blot out my transgressions for my own sake, and will not remember thy sins," comforted me this morning.

TO L. H. B.

"Sixth Month 14th, 1866.

"My mind went so much to thee yesterday, that I thought it was time to write, and at night I opened thy dear little book at pages one hundred and forty-two and forty-three, and concluded these are just the words to comfort Laura. Thou wilt find them in 'Thoughts of Peace.' There are indeed many sweet extracts and assurances in it, as I open it occasionally and think of thee. I do desire our Father to strengthen thee and bear thee up in thy sore affliction. Oh! dearest L., what wouldst thou do without thy 'Rock,' thy precious Holy and Eternal One, to lean upon now. How merciful is our Lord to have sought thee and brought thee to his fold; and to give thee of the pure holy life in Him. Suffer nothing, my dear, to shake thy faith in the Lord's superintending care and goodness to thy soul, as long as thou art faithful in thy allegiance to Him.

"How I desire for thee, that the pleasures of this world, from which thou hast in degree been redeemed, may never captivate and enslave thee. A whole and dedicated heart, dearest Laura, lay upon his altar. The Lord hath need of more earnest souls. Some words, in the thirty-first Psalm, comforted my heart this evening, though feeling very unworthy to take it all to myself: 'Thou art my Rock, my Fortress, therefore for thy name's sake lead me and guide me.' 'Oh, love the Lord, all ye his saints, for He preserveth the faithful!'. . . In two weeks my nice little school will probably close. Next second-day we intend to spend at Dewey's lane. B-believe me, thy ever affectionate, Seventh Month 15th.—She writes to her brother and sister from Newark, N. J., where there was no Friend's Meeting. "How I would like the privilege of going to meeting this morning. Drawing nearer to God alone is not quite like the fire, caused by many living coals, though I humbly believe regarded by our Father, who looks at the heart's desire to adore Him."

"D. B."

30th.—She writes in her diary: Been to Newark for two and a half weeks, and was preserved amidst peculiar temptations. Thanks be unto thee, O, my God. Thine everlasting arms are round about, unworthy as I am. Fill my soul, dearest Father, with heavenly love, that I may win souls to Thee, Oh, my Lord and King.

Ninth Month 2nd.—Been helped indeed by my blessed Lord, through what caused me so much anxiety (a visit in Chester County), but have not been entirely faithful in fasting and prayer. Oh, I want to commence this day, to try earnestly to walk without one sin, a stain on the robe which He cleanses for me, through washing in his blood. Help me, Oh, Lord.

16th.—Lord, thou hast helped me when I felt so low and poor and full of temptation. Oh, bless me, even me, wilt thou not, and give me the desires of my heart, if consistent with thy holy will. Oh, prosper thy works in the hearts of thy children. Look upon thy people with an eye of favor and renew our life in thee.

TO L. H. B.

"Ninth Month 15th, 1866.

"My heart has gone forth again and again to thee, these many weeks past, in tender love and sympathy. I know thou hast a right to expect me to write, but opportunity did not seem to present until now. It seemed to me, I did thee so little good in thy last visit, and I have to leave thee to the Lord, humbly desiring that the Lord would solve all thy difficulties. I know He is good, and that his tender mercies are over all his works. Thy sister, too, has been called to her everlasting home. I hope you have a convincing evidence of her happy entrance there. How sad it must be to have no word from those we love. Dear Ruth Anna Eiche! How sad I should have been to have had no word from her, and how merciful our Father and Lord was to accept her last dedication. I am so thankful. She sat just in front of me in meeting, and was sometimes like a little screen to me. Thou canst understand? It would be selfish to wish to recall her to that blessed home, where we humbly trust she is rejoicing in the light and mercy of her Redeemer. The prayer of my soul is, 'Gather more, gather all into thy heavenly kingdom, O thou glorious, holy and eternal One!' Dear Laura, how is it with us? Are we living day by day with our armor on. . . . I understand that dear E. Pitfield's memorial is to be read in our next Monthly Meeting. Perhaps thou would like to come. It will be next Third-day. I loved her so much. Sometimes in her communications she would quote, 'Simon, Simon, behold Satan has desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not,' generally adding that the dear Master prayed for us still, even for his tempted children. Is it not precious for us to think of, even now, my dear? I have no doubt thou often has thy conflicts, but hold on upon the anchor, 'The Lamb and his followers shall have the victory.' Thy deeply attached friend,

"D. B."

Eleventh Month 11th.—This day my uncle Paul Swift was interred. I hope he has entered the kingdom, having passed through much tribulation and bodily suffering for two years, which affected his mind somewhat.

How has it been with thee, O, my soul, these two months? Not all the time without sin. When shall I be free? When shall I be entirely crucified? No will but to thee, Oh, Lord, thou hast been so merciful to me, and accepted my contrite heart many times. This day have felt a renewed engagement to enter into covenant to follow the Lord faithfully.

Twelfth Month 7th.—I can indeed sing of thy mercies, O, Lord, for they have been so many. O, blessed Lord! I would praise thee. Help me to serve thee better.

30th.—The last First-day in the year.—I am not so dedicated as I should be. I come unto thee with full resolution, oh, Lord, to try to serve thee better. Accept my feeble prayer and thanksgiving for the multitude of thy mercies.

First Month 27th, 1896.—Turn thy hand yet more and more upon me, O, Holy Father, until I am what thou wouldst have me to be. Show me, oh, Father, how to worship thee in meetings with my whole soul. I am a child, teach thou me thy way.

(To be continued.)

A LETTER from an English Friend says of the late Darlington Conference, that it "has been another occasion for the reading of papers, and making of speeches, with which we cannot have much in common. It is a great feature of the present day to be using the intellect in religious matters by writing or preparing beforehand, instead of waiting for fresh springs, but that kind of thing cannot have much root. The general tendency is very harmful."

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting.

This body of Friends assembled at Moorestown, N. J., on the seventeenth of Twelfth Mo., 1896. The day was fine, though cold, and the attendance was large. We were favored with a good meeting, in which some sound advice was given in Gospel authority.

A concern to visit in Gospel love, some of the meetings of Ohio Yearly Meeting was spread before it, by one of our ministers; and was freely and fully united with by both men's and women's meetings, for, according to the recent change in the discipline, such concerns now require the concurrence of both branches of the church.

Beyond this, there was little or nothing in the business, out of the usual order. But a somewhat striking feature was the number of persons, not recommended ministers, who felt called upon to address the meeting, perhaps half a dozen or more, giving ground to hope that the Head of the Church was still preparing servants to act as his ambassadors, who might fill the places of those dignified instruments who have latterly been removed from among us.

One of the pleasant and profitable things connected with these gatherings of Friends is the opportunity for social intercourse which they present. Among the incidents related in conversation was the remark made by one who had filled a position in a large hospital, who referred to a hot spell of weather a few years ago, when several persons overcome with the heat were brought in as patients. It happened that a patient confined with a broken limb was located in the receiving room. After the heated term had ended this man said to the physician in charge, that he knew several of the men who had been brought in as sun-stroke patients, and he had noticed that all of them who were drinking men had died. He had been in the habit of drinking liquor, but had made up his mind to quit the practice, having seen its effect in lessening the power of the system to throw off disease.

The experience was also related of one who had been in the habit of smoking tobacco. Under the convicting power of Divine Grace he had become a religiously minded man, but this habit, acquired in his younger years, still clung to him. One day, after breakfast, he lighted his pipe and started to walk from his house to his shop. On the road he was suddenly stopped, and heard a voice distinctly say, "Thou must give up the use of tobacco." Startled, as he was, and believing it was a Divine command, he felt that he was so much a slave to the habit, that he did not know that he would be able to obey. While thus he-tating, the command was repeated, "Thou must give up the use of tobacco," with the addition of "Now," and coupled with the admonition, that the evil effects of his example were counteracting all the good that otherwise might be done by his preaching. He was so affected that he shook like an aspen leaf; but still hesitated to yield obedience. Then the voice came a third time, as clear and distinct as he ever heard an outward voice, "Thou must give up the use of tobacco," and the impression fastened on his mind, that if he refused to obey he could never gain admission to the kingdom of heaven. Like the Apostle Paul, he was not disobedient to the Heavenly vision, but threw his pipe over the fence, and lifted up his heart to God, entreating Him for deliverance from the chains of his appetite. He never after indulged, and when asked how long it took him to overcome the desire for this plant, he said, "About three minutes." J. W.

To the Very End.

[We have received from a concerned Friend the following criticisms on an expression used in the account of D. B. Webb, which for number of weeks has been publishing in THE FRIEND. While the words "to the very end," literally accepted, may convey too strong an impression of the fears and exercises to which even the devoted servants of the Lord are subject, yet the experience of many such servants shows the Lord often permits them to be tried by a sense of desertion, and by fears that they may lose the standing to which they have attained. These trials, no doubt, tend to keep them humble, and to preserve them in that watchful state which our Saviour enjoined upon his disciples, "Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation," is a good watchword for all.—ED.]

In the first chapter of the very instructive "Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb," my attention was arrested by one little expression contained in the following sentence, which probably alludes to the later years of her life:

"When she sought Him He was always to be found, and she died soon wonderfully clear of the doubts and fears of which so many of the Lord's dedicated ones have largely to partake to the very end."

I apprehend it was unintentional in the compiler to convey the impression that the Lord's dedicated ones to the latest period of their lives were tried with uncertainty, but it seemed to me that such might be inferred from the expression.

We have the recorded testimony of a cloud of witnesses who have experienced for a longer or shorter period before their departure, a blessed, unmixed assurance that a happy immortality awaited them whatever trials and close proofs they had previously known, indeed we may not find one instance of such as these being left at last to doubts and fears. This particular feature in the Christian's experience it has long seemed to me is the greatest consolation that can be realized in this world.

Twelfth Month, 1896.

The Presbyterian, of Philadelphia, says:—"Nothing should interfere with home duties. Even great service for humanity cannot compensate for their neglect. Works of charity and business for the Church are of great price and should be attended to in their place and measure, but never at the sacrifice of loved ones entrusted to one's care and training. Home has the first and pre-eminent claim. Children are a God-given heritage. They must be rightly cultured and disciplined, as well as properly provided for. Father and mother must be able to say at the great day: 'Here are we, and those whom thou hast given us.' Platform oratory serves an excellent purpose, but it is a poor substitute for a home neglected in its gratification. Committee meetings and temperance and missionary work are valuable, but not at the sacrifice of family interests. Give your home the first attention; then devote what time, talent and effort you can to outside agencies."

While there is a valuable lesson contained in these remarks, it must not be forgotten that the * R. A. B., being hard of hearing, sat on the front seat facing the gallery, and D. B., before being recommended as a minister, sat behind her.

Lord has the right to dispose of his children as He sees right. It may please Him to send the father or mother of a family to a distance from the home circle; and it is in his power so to bless the sacrifice that those who are left behind will be better cared for than the parent will be able to effect without Divine assistance.

FROM "THE LONDON FRIEND."

John Woolman, Tailor.

In our thoughts of Woolman we sometimes forget the fact that this Quaker saint was the village tailor of Mount Holly. We remember his service to which he was called in his own Society, for the freeing of the slaves; we remember, too, the extreme simplicity of his character, which gives much of its fragrance to his Journal; but it is not well that we should forget his daily calling.

Woolman has left us in no doubt as to his own attitude towards his trade. He regarded it as his "calling" in that simple and all-embracing mysticism which makes his character: "I believed the hand of Providence pointed out his business for me." The utterance is significant, because this man felt for the hand of God in every deed of his daily life, and one might almost say, especially in his trade. In the "Testimony" of Friends at Burlington concerning him, it is written:—"He was very moderate in his charges in the way of business, and in his lesures after gain; and though a man of industry, avoided, and strove much to lead others out of extreme labor and anxiety after perishable things; being desirous that the strength of our bodies might not be spent in procuring his unprofitable."

Every Friend who has read the Journal—and we can hardly believe that any earnest Friend has not done so—must be familiar with Woolman's strong conviction that trade is in reality a great religious service for the followers of Jesus, the carpenter of Nazareth. It is not only that all service is sacred, but that trade arrived on for motives of gain is the source of one of the oppression which in his vision lies, like a suffen gloom, over the dawn of Divine light and love. Human misery is the great problem which men have to deal with, yielding themselves as ready instruments to the hand of Divine love; and that misery was to his mind chiefly caused by the spirit of oppression, which poisons the river of commerce, and makes of it an overflowing stream of unrighteousness.

This thought becoming clear in his mind and emanating a profound conviction through his life, it was also revealed to him that a man's rading might and should be of itself an "int'ing language," and, pursued in the spirit of Jesus, should remind men of his love. Surely it is not impossible that a sacramental meaning would even now attach to the trade, carried on by a Christian spirit. The dealing out of the common bread by Jesus to his disciples had a typical significance; and is it not the highest evidence to believe with Woolman, that the hopekeeper's transactions, which are a handling of the common goods of the community, may be so symbolical of love and its great gift to men?

This idea of the true character and importance of his trade is continually expressed in his writings. In trade Woolman perceives the roots of war as well as of slavery. Where our treasure is, there also is our heart; we are blind to honor and pity when we refuse to place our savings in the keeping of God, and when our algers are the antithesis of our Bibles. That is a doctrine which is simple and honest, and it is part of the unwritten creed of Quakerism. With a beautiful tenderness of conscience, Woolman besought his friends to look upon their furniture and their garments, "to try whether the seeds of war have nourishment in these our possessions." Just as many Friends refused to sanction slavery by avoiding the use of West Indian sugar, so Woolman sought to dis-countenance oppression by abstaining from any traffic which was based thereon.

"It is evident that all business which hath not its foundation in true wisdom is not becoming [to] a faithful follower of Christ, who loves God not only with all his heart, but with all his strength and ability." Such thoughts as these convinced Woolman that it was right for him to live in a contented poverty, or rather an austere but happy simplicity. For many reasons he loved simplicity; in materials it stood to him for honesty both to his customers and to those engaged in manufacture. He refused to trade in frippery and those things which "minister to the vain mind in men." All showy articles which made up for poor material by an extravagant avowal of splendor were distasteful and hurtful to him. These things could only encourage his customers to cumber themselves with much labor for the meat that perishes. Moreover, he was thoroughly alive to the economic meaning of luxury. He saw in the wasteful extravagance of the cultured and intellectual classes of society, the want and ignorance of the workers. And to his own simple industrious mind it was absolutely wrong to waste the energies of life upon trivialities—it was the worst form of idolatry, the sacrifice of living men before the golden idol of mammon.

John Woolman himself was a man of natural capacity, with a talent for "merchandise," and his business prospered in Mount Holly (a village some miles east of Philadelphia); but after much prayerful consideration he decided to give up his retailing and devote himself solely to tailoring. This conclusion was reached with an earnest sense of duty. Although there is little mention of his home life in his Journal, there is enough to assure us that he did not lightly put aside the thought of his wife and children's future. But he felt that he had no right to bind himself in the cumber of merchandise for the sake of his children, when he had other work given him to do. He definitely withdrew from the vain endeavor to exempt them from "those cares which necessarily relate to this life," believing for them as for himself, that his Heavenly Father knew their need, and that if they might rather be led to seek for the treasure of his kingdom, "all these things" should be added unto them.

It must not be inferred from this that Woolman was an idle man. He was naturally industrious, but he perceived that the continual "creaturely activity" of his trade, however holy, tended to disturb the inner peace of his soul, and made him somewhat less sensitive to the leadings of the Spirit of God. And while he valued industry and thrift, he was fully aware of the temptation which lies in them—the Martha-like busyness which has no time, for its much serving, to sit at the feet of the Master. Mere thrift and industry may render men callous to the appeals of humanity; that they have often done so, is sufficiently notorious; labor is given and taken as a drug to dull the mind, and make men capable of slavery.

So, although he loved his trade, and prospered in it, John Woolman did not extend it. He had other work to do—work to which he was called as surely as to his needle and thread. No parochial genius, he went forth into the world and preached the Gospel. When he reached London, at the time of the Yearly Meeting in 1772, he was met by a vivid vision of the need and condition of the people. But the Yearly Meeting received him coldly and it was suggested that perhaps our friend would now feel himself liberated from this service and return to his home. But Woolman could not go back; neither might he live in England at the expense of Friends who had no unity with him. With a wonderful patience and simplicity, he trusted that Friends might be "willing to employ him in such business, as he was capable of, that he might not be chargeable to any."

It is not men who are in-ensable to love and happiness who suffer most; and there is every reason to believe that Woolman was peculiarly sensitive to pain and pleasure. He had the natural temperament of a poet; but his strenuous spirit was not fretted by the pettiness and vulgarity of trade; he was one of those great souls who preserve their tranquillity and independence of character in the market-place of life.

HENRY BINNS.

(Luton Hall.)

Honesty in a Malay.

William Taylor relates that his friend Henry Reed, in a voyage from England to Australia in 1849, stopped at Cape Town. When the ship came to anchor, a Malay boatman tipped his hat to H. Reed:

"A boat, sir?"

"What will you charge to take me and my family ashore?"

"Thirteen dollars, sir."

"Thirteen dollars! Why, that is too much."

"No, sir; it is the regular price, and I can't do it for less."

"Very well," said H. Reed, "we will go with you."

When safely landed he paid the Malay thirteen dollars, about two pounds and fourteen shillings. The next morning a messenger called on H. Reed at his lodgings and said, "The Malay boatman who brought you ashore yesterday is at the door, and wants to see you."

"Dear me," thought H. Reed, as he was going to the door, "that fellow is not satisfied with his extortionate gains of yesterday, and wants to make another draw on me to-day."

"What do you want, sir?" demanded Reed.

"You made a mistake yesterday in the money you paid me," replied the boatman.

"Not at all, sir; no mistake about it. You asked me thirteen dollars for your work, and I paid you, and you'll not get any more," and added to the sentence in his own mind, "These boatmen are alike the world over."

"No," said the Malay, "you are quite mistaken; I charged thirteen dollars—"

"Yes," rejoined H. Reed, "and I paid it, and you ought to be satisfied."

"But," continued the son of Mohammed, "I meant Dutch six-dollars, and you paid me three times as much as I asked, and I have brought your money back"—handing him the money. "Thirteen six-dollars are nineteen shillings and sixpence, instead of two pounds and fourteen shillings."

H. Reed was satisfied to receive back his money, but especially delighted to find such an example of honesty where he least expected it.

A BUNCH OF BITTER-SWEET.

SARAH W. WESTEY.

O, Bitter-sweet, with thy berries red,
How dear thou art to me!
Reminding me of days long dead,
When life was full and free.

O, Bitter-sweet, with thy berries red,
A lesson thou teachest me!
When summer's past and all else dead,
Thou still canst radiant be.

O, Bitter-sweet, with thy berries bright,
I would be like to thee:
When hope is dead and all there is no light,
I yet would nestle be.

A YEAR AGO.

A year ago!

A year ago I had my baby here,
With hair of gold, and eyes so blue and clear;
A year ago I heard his pattering feet,
And listened to his childish babble sweet,
Now he has gone—gone whither? Who can say?
I only know he left me that sad day,
A year ago.

And is that all?

Is there no comfort for the aching heart?
No balm to ease, no hand to bind the smart?
Are all my hopes lost in a bleak no-morn,
And is my baby wandering forth alone?
My baby, whom I loved and tend-d-ds,
And soothed to sleep with mother-croonings low,
A year ago!

Nay, heart, not all!

For, see! beyond, in countries not unknown,
My baby waits, well loved, and not alone;
A strong Hand guides him, lest his feet should fall,
And loving ears are quick to hear his call;
He waits full happy, safe from all alarms;
For Jesus took my baby in his arms
A year ago.

—Exchange.

[Our aged friend Robert Knowles, of Paulina, Iowa, has forwarded to us the following narrative of a religious visit paid by Henry Knowles, more than fifty years ago.—Ed.]

Sixth-day, the sixth of First Month, 1843, I attended meeting at Loui-ville, where I met with our friend Joseph Edgerton and companion. First and Second-days visited their families. Third-day attended meeting at Leray, appointed by Joseph Edgerton; afternoon at Indian River—both favored meetings. At the close I gave notice of being at their week-day meeting. Fourth-day attended Indian River meeting to good satisfaction; Fifth-day attended Leray meeting again, in which Truth rose into dominion, and the Lord was exalted over all, blessed be his name, and his children praised Him. We are nothing; He is all in all. In the evening had a meeting in the school-house about eight miles on our way toward Canada, to which came Joseph Edgerton and companion from Ohio, and Lydia Hallock and husband from Vermont, in which we had a favored baptizing meeting together, many testimonies being borne to the truths of the Gospel, in which the inhabitants rejoiced, and we poor pilgrims were strengthened to hold on our way—six of us bound for Canada.
